Univ. of Toronto
Library

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2008 with funding from Microsoft Corporation

http://www.archive.org/details/p2weeklyreviewde02newyuoft

P
LE
R.W

I

THE WEEKLY REVIEW

DEVOTED TO THE CONSIDERATION OF

POLITICS, OF SOCIAL AND ECONOMIC TENDENCIES, OF HISTORY, LITERATURE, AND THE ARTS

VOLUME II

January—June, 1920

IN TWO PARTS: PART II

157553
3/12/20

THE NATIONAL WEEKLY CORPORATION
140 NASSAU STREET, NEW YORK, N. Y

INDEX TO VOLUME II

JANUARY—JUNE, 1920

(Numbers 34-59)

BRIEF COMMENT—AT HOME

PAGE

ALASKA'S Salmon Fishing Industry, Legislation Needed ... 347
America—What the Name Signifies ... 501
American Academy at Rome, Funds Needed ... 475
American Legion: "Bonuses" ... 166, 239, 317, 445, 503, 586
Imposition of Its Standards (Franklin D'Olier) 2
Proposals for Aid from the Government ... 317
Armenia, American Mandate For ... 557
Aviation: Congressional Appropriation ... 120, 219

BASEBALL and the Needs of the World ... 143
Better Times, Smallest Newspaper in the World ... 269
Bird Act, Migratory, Sustained by Supreme Court 419
Birds, Extermination in America (Hornaday) ... 663
Birds, Refuge for (Rockefeller Foundation's Gift) 447
Bolshevism, Cause of ... 418, 587
Chicherin and Raymond Robbins ... 96
Deportations, Government's Policy Toward ... 95
Favored in Siberia (Major-General Graves) ... 531
Hapgood's (Norman) Reply to Harvey's Weekly's Charges ... 95
May-day Plot ... 474
Refutation by the New Republic and Nation ... 120
Books ... 71
Bryan's Speeches ... 41

CINCINNATUS Legend and Gov. Frazier of the Non-Partisan League ... 269
Child-Welfare Laws ... 447
Church and War (Freeman) ... 587
"Civic Responsibility," Compulsory Training for (F. E. Spaulding) ... 375
Clothes, Style of Men's (Custom Cutter's' Decision) ... 297
Coal Miners and Operators Indicted by Federal Grand Jury ... 318
Congress: American Recognition of "Irish Republic" (Colby Interrogated) ... 557
Armenian Mandate, Immediate Action Upon Necessary ... 557
Aviation Appropriation ... 120, 219
Bonus Bill, House Passing of ... 586
Bonus Raised by Proposed Retroactive War-profits Tax Bill ... 445
Bonus Two Billion Dollar Bill, Progress of ... 503, 586
Glass's Recommendation for Starving Europe ... 41, 119, 166
Paper Consumption, Bill for Restraint of Needed ... 473
Protest Against Their Irish Resolutions (Yale Faculty) ... 614
Resolution Proposed to Recognize Irish de facto Government (Sherwood) ... 21
Seed Distribution, Abandonment of Policy of. 268
Conkling's Hatred of Blaine, Cause of ... 663
Cost of Living: Coöperative Societies, Statistics on ... 503
Lowering of the Price of Food (Restaurant Men's Assn.) ... 297
Potatoes, Increase in Production of ... 530
Potatoes, Means of Obtaining Price Reduction 473
Reduction of, Overalls and Old Clothes ... 418

DEBS and Free Speech ... 475
"Disclosures" and Radical Papers ... 531
Dreiser (Theodore), Importance of ... 375

ECONOMICS: Budget System Needed ... 70
Deflation (Federal Reserve Board's Report) 192
Glass's Recommendation to Congress for Relief in Europe ... 41, 119, 166
High Prices, Cause of (Kansas City Star) .. 374
Taxation of Non-residents (Supreme Court Decision) ... 218
Truths and Advertising ... 97
Education: Child-welfare Laws ... 447
Colleges, Amherst Memorial Fellowship ... 2
Colleges, Degree Requirement—Specific Knowledge of Our Form of Government ... 167
Colleges, Final Examination for Degrees (Harvard) ... 97
Colleges, Harvard, Teachers and Production (Lowell's Report) ... 240
Colleges, Pranks and Newspaper Reporting .. 318
Colleges, Professors' Salaries (University of Wash.) ... 167
Colleges, Women's Funds Needed ... 219
Educational Section of the Review ... 269
New York Post-Graduate Medical School ... 447
Unionization of College and University Teachers (Prof. Lovejoy) ... 97

FARMERS and the "Questionnaire" ... 120
Fifth Avenue Noises ... 346
Fifth Avenue's Beauty ... 347
Fifth Avenue's New Traffic Rules ... 297
Finance [See Economics]
Fraud: Election (Senator Newberry's Conviction) ... 295
Free Speech: Radicals' Attitude Towards ... 374, 475
Republican Platform On ... 641
Rev. P. S. Grant's Opinions ... 69, 120
Socialist Review's Idea of ... 587
Suppression of, Deb's Attitude Toward ... 475
Freeman, The ... 295
Freeman, The, and the Nation ... 446
Freeman's, The View of the Church ... 587
French and English Good Feeling, Ruhr Situation a Menace to—Our Attitude Toward .. 373

HOOVER as the Head of European Relief Work 642
Housing: Apartment House Leases (New York) ... 42
Tenement Problems, Prizes for ... 42

IDEALISM and Disillusion ... 374
Indian (American) Rights Association—Pima Indians' Case ... 614
Interchurch World Movement, Fund Campaign .. 319, 587
Ireland and European Squabbles ... 95
Irish Propaganda Encouraged by New York City and State ... 70
Italy Accuses America of Spreading False News .. 445

KEYNES and Miller (David Hunter) Controversy Over German Indemnity ... 141, 142

LABOR: Attitude in Australia Against Sabotage 587
Farmers' Complaints ... 120
Gompers, Overthrow of (Manchester Guardian) 558
Gompers's View of Toilers' Rights ... 614
Hiring Capital (Sir George Paish) ... 42
Injunctions, Attitude Toward (John A. McMahon) ... 97
Party Dissensions ... 642
Shorter Hours and Undiminished Production Exemplified by American Multigraph Co. (Cleveland) ... 530
Soviet-Labor Code, Insurgent Press's Attitude 446
Task of (Sir Auckland Geddes at Atlantic City) ... 474
The Right to Strike (Gompers vs. Allen) ... 586
Unionization of College and University Teachers (Prof. Lovejoy) ... 97
Wages and Number of Employees, Statistics (Labor Market Bulletin) ... 218
Lansing's Influence on Notes Sent to England and Germany, The Nation's View ... 217
Laski's (Harold J.) Prediction of Revolution ... 615
Law: Reform Urged in Anachronistic Features by Bar Association ... 167
Reforms (New York State Bar Association). 167
Liberator and Mexico ... 475
Library (American) Association, Work of ... 71

MAETERLINCK in America ... 2
Marshall's (Vice-President) Democratic Letter ... 165
Mexico Under Carranza, the Liberator's View of 475
Minority and Majority Rights (Hobson in the London Nation) ... 503
Morton, Levi P., Career of ... 530

NATION (The): Attack on .. 142, 217, 239, 446, 642
Nation's (The) Plea for Newspaper Moderation ... 142
National Thrift Week ... 22
Negroes: Lynching and the Law (Lexington, Ky.) ... 142
New Republic and the "Red and White Terror". 120
New Republic Misquotes Wood ... 529
New Republic's Attitude Toward the War ... 69
New Republic's Fondness for "Disclosures" ... 531
Newspapers and News Suppression ... 501, 585

OSLER'S (Dr. William) Death ... 2

PAPER, Newsprint, Consumption of ... 473
Peary's (Admiral) Death ... 193
Periodicals, American and English Contrasted ... 347
Personal Liberty and Legislation ... 347
Politics: And Investigations (New York) ... 346
Bryan's Re-entrance Into ... 1
Commissioner of Accounts' Attack on Hornaday of the N. Y. "Zoo" ... 297
Conventions, Interest of ... 613
Democratic Convention, Character of ... 661
Democratic Platform, Issues of ... 661
Election Campaign Expenditures (Senator Newberry's) ... 295
Reasons for Voting for Johnson (Detroit Weekly) ... 446
Republican Convention ... 613
Republican Convention, Task of ... 473
Republican Platform ... 473
Republican Platform On Free Speech, Free Press and Free Assembly ... 641
Republican Platform, Prize Contest For ... 70
Scheme for Electing the President (Judge Willis Brown) ... 218
Vice-President Marshall's Letter ... 165
Pope's Mitigation of Protest Against the King's Seizure of his Temporal Power ... 614
Presidential Candidates: Betting Odds Against .. 613
Harding and Coolidge, Careers of ... 641
Harding, Comment by French and English Press ... 641
Hoover vs. Johnson on the Treaty ... 529
Hoover's Ability to Reduce Government Expenses ... 417
Hoover's Chances of Nomination ... 141
Hoover's Statement of his Opinions ... 141
Johnson and the Chicago Convention ... 585
Johnson and the Primaries, Result of ... 445
Johnson's Convictions ... 613
Johnson's Definition of Radical ... 558
Republican Candidate (Penrose) ... 192
Vice-Presidency, Importance of (Johnson's Comment) ... 417
Wilson and the Treaty ... 445
Wilson's Renomination, Chances of ... 661
Wood and Hoover ... 95
Wood Misquoted by New Republic ... 529
Wood's Fitness for Presidency ... 417
Wood's Primary Campaign ... 585
Wood's Resignation from the Army ... 21
Primaries and Senator Johnson ... 239
Primaries, Value of ... 641
Primary and Funds ... 585
Profiteers: Department Store Head, Arrest of [New York] ... 662
"Progressives" and Grover Cleveland (The Nation) ... 642
Prohibition: Enforcement of ... 71
Entering Wedge for Further Restraints of Personal Liberty ... 347
Michigan and Enforcement ... 193

RADICAL: Meaning of [Senator Johnson] ... 558
Press and the People ... 615
Radical's Position and the Liberal's ... 418
Radicals vs. Liberals ... 663
Railing on "General Principles" ... 615
Railways: Esch-Cummins Railroad Bill ... 191
Esch-Cummins Railroad Bill, Labor Provisions 191
Freight Rates' Increase and the Nation ... 239
Revolutionists and Violence ... 531
Rhymes: [Clinton Scollard and F. P. Adams] .. 559
Roosevelt Memorial Association. Woman's ... 240
Russian Bolsheviki Methods Exposed ... 345

SALVATION Army's Campaign for Funds ... 418
Science Offers Prize for Inter-planetary Communication ... 121
Sir Oliver [Lodge] Exchanged for "Pussyfoot" Johnson ... 167
Social Force vs. Law [London Nation] ... 502
Socialism: Albany Bills against, Constitutionality of ... 417
Berger and the War ... 21
Debs Compared to Liebknecht [Survey] ... 447
Gov. Smith Vetoes Heresy-hunting Bills ... 557
Republican Platform Stand on Discrimination Against ... 641
Speaker Sweet's Charges Against the Five Socialist Assemblymen ... 69
State [Non-Partisan League] Cincinnatus and Their Governor ... 269
Voting For ... 219
Socialist Parties, Dissensions of ... 642
State, the Passing of the ... 295
Straw Hats [Men's] Convention Governing Wearing of ... 559
Strikes: Heating Plant Operators [New York] .. 121
Railroad, Justification as Regards Wages ... 373
Railroad, "Outlaw" Character of ... 373
The Right of [Gompers vs. Allen] ... 586
Sugar, Hoover's Plans for Its Supply ... 501

TENANTS of New York Apartment Houses ... 42
Treaty and Covenant: America's Responsibility and Wilson [Fortnightly Review] .. 585
Bryan's Speech ... 41
George Washington Invoked Against .. 95
Hoover's Position on Treaty Attacked by Johnson ... 529
Issue in Presidental Campaign ... 217, 239, 445, 501
Keynes vs. Miller [David] Hunter 141, 142

PAGE
League's Financial Resources and Wood's Campaign ... 446
Lenroot Reservation and Canada ... 166
Lord Grey's Letter ... 119
Lord Grey, and the Senate ... 119
New Republic's Attitude ... 69
Non-Ratification of, Responsibility for. 267
Ratification Outlook Dark ... 217, 267
Ratification Without Reservation, Opposition of Taft and Bryan to Wilson's Plan ... 501
Root Represents Us at the League ... 192
Wilson and Italy's Claims ... 166
Wilson Urged by Prominent Citizens to Accept Treaty on Best Terms Obtainable ... 317
Wilson's New Proposals and the Treaty 445
Wilson's Opportunity to Return the Treaty to the Senate ... 295
Wilson's Responsibility for Non-Ratification of ... 661

UNITED States Army: "Bonuses" .. 166, 239, 317, 445, 503, 586
General Wood's Resignation ... 21
United States Navy: Admiral Sims's Charges .. 69
Result of Inquiry Into Charges Against ... 374
Sims's Controversy with Daniels, Report Necessary ... 662

VICE Investigations in New York ... 345, 346

WAR Memorial, Hudson River Bridge ... 642
Wilson Administration: Colby's [Bainbridge] Appointment as Secretary of State ... 217
Crane's [Charles R.] Appointment as Minister to China ... 218
Wilson's Dismissal of Secretary Lansing 165
Wilson's Re-election and the Treaty 239, 445
Wilson's Renomination, Chances of ... 661
Wilson's Responsibility Towards the Treaty ... 585
Wilson's Sickness and Republican Sympathy [Senator Williams] ... 318
Wilson's Uncompromising Idealism, Results of ... 374
YUKON Salmon Fishing Industry, Legislation needed [Archdeacon Stuck] ... 347
ZIONISM: Funds For ... 70

BRIEF COMMENT—ABROAD

ARMENIA, American Mandate For ... 557
Australia, Unions and Sabotage ... 587
Austria-Hungary: "Lasko's" Death and the New Republic ... 120
Union With Czechoslovakia ... 70

BELGIUM: Industrial Conditions [Guaranty Trust Co.] ... 22, 559

CANADA: Financial Prosperity, Aid to [Sir Vincent Meredith] ... 143
Treaty, Voting Rights [N. W. Rowell] ... 166
Tribute to Prince of Wales's Visit [Sir Vincent Meredith] ... 143

DENMARK: Elections for the Folketing—Results ... 474
Plébiscite in Slesvig, Results of ... 296, 346
Reinstatement of Mr. Hansen as Commissioner for Slesvig Affairs, Significance of .. 375

ECONOMICS: Glass's Recommendation to Congress for Relief in Europe ... 41, 119, 166

FINANCE: [See Economics]
France: Agreement with Kemel Pasha ... 643
Aviation, War Statistics ... 42
German Diplomacy vs. French ... 346
German Indemnity and the Hythe Conference ... 558
Lille, Funds for ... 121
Merchant Fleet, Needs ... 296
Millerand Tries to Dissolve the General Federation of Labor ... 530
Millerand's Cabinet Victory ... 96
Politics, Briand vs. Millerand ... 96
Prize for Inter-Planetary Communication [Academy of Sciences] ... 121
Ruhr Situation a Menace to Its Good Relations With England ... 373
Russian Policy [Millerand] ... 586
Socialist Programme for Reconstruction 502
France's Part in the Controversy Over the German Territory on the Left Bank of the Rhine .. 296

GERMANS in Czechoslovakia at Prague, Behavior of ... 586
Germany: Condition of [Dr. Paul Rohrbach] ... 96
Effect of the Reconciliation of France and England at San Remo ... 446
Elections for Reichstag—Results ... 614
Ex-Kaiser's Trial ... 41
German Diplomacy vs. French ... 346
Hermann Muller's Cabinet ... 318
Indemnity, Arrangement at Hythe ... 558
Indemnity [Keynes vs. Miller, David Hunter]. 141, 142
Our Attitude Towards ... 41

Plébiscite in Slesvig ... 296
Prince Joachim Albrecht's Trial ... 643
Prussian Militarists' Counter-Revolution, Purposes ... 267, 268
Prussian Militarists' Revolution Against the Ebert Government ... 267
Relations with Eastern Europe [Dr. Rohrbach] ... 240
Spa Conference, Demands of German Delegates at ... 558
War Criminals, Demand For ... 165

GREAT Britain: Anglo-Persian Treaty ... 419
Asquith vs. Lloyd George's Policies ... 318
Birds, Extermination of—Fight for Preventive Measures ... 419
General Strike to Force Nationalization of the Mines, Vote on ... 268
Krasin's Visit, Real Purpose of ... 662
Lloyd George's Russian Policy [Krasin's visit] ... 586
London Mercury's Articles, Informality of .. 347
Lord Grey's Letter on the Treaty ... 119
Polish Policy [Bonar Law] ... 558
Ruhr Situation a Menace to Its Good Relations With France ... 373
Saturday Review, Snobbishness of ... 347
Sir Auckland Geddes on Reconstruction, Optimism of ... 474

HARDING'S Nomination, English and French Comment on ... 641
Holland: Ex-Kaiser's Trial ... 41
Hoover and European Relief Work ... 642
Hungary: White Terror and Allied Commissioners' Representations to the Horthy Government ... 643

IRELAND: American Recognition of Republic [Colby] ... 557
Government of Ireland Bill Amendment Group [Stephen Gwynn] ... 474
Home Rule Bill [Lloyd George's], Stephen Gwynn's Amendments ... 474
Resolution Proposed in Congress to Recognize de facto Government [Sherwood] ... 21
Sinn Fein Propaganda Encouraged in New York City and State ... 70
Sinn Feinism and the League ... 70
Sinn Feinism Denounced by Colonel Lynch .. 22
Italy: America Accused of Spreading False News of Italy ... 445
American Academy at Rome, Funds Needed. 475
Attitude Towards the World [Premier Nitti] 142
Coalitions, Value of [Nitti's Resignations] ... 643
Fiume and Jugoslavia's Need of a Seaport .. 192
Fiume and the Fourteen Points ... 191
Fiume, Policy of Moderation Advocated [Premier Nitti] ... 142
Nitti's Resignation and Return ... 530
Pope's Mitigation of Protest Against the King's Seizure of His Temporal Power ... 614
Socialism—Leader of, Enrico Malatesta ... 475
Wilson's Uncompromising Attitude on Dalmatia ... 166

JAPAN: Occupation of Vladivostock, Responsibility for ... 503
Shantung Settlement, China's Distrust of Japan ... 662
Japanese Portraiture of Europeans [Neophilologus] ... 531

MEXICO: Revolution Depicted by Ibañez ... 530
The Liberator's View of [Irwin Granich] .. 475
Minority and Majority Rights [Hobson in the London Nation] ... 502, 503

PERSIA: Anglo-Persian Treaty ... 419
Poland: Success of Offensive Against Russia ... 502, 558
Ukranian Debt to ... 502

RUSSIA: Aggressive Campaign Against—Results of ... 502
Bolsheviki and Outside Interference ... 193
Bolsheviki Kill Madame Ponafidine ... 615
Bolsheviki Régime and Free Speech [N. Bukharin] ... 375
Chicherin's Note to President Wilson ... 96
Co-operatives and the Soviet ... 142
Exposure of Bolsheviki Methods ... 345
France's Policy Toward [Millerand] ... 586
Japanese Occupation of Vladivostok ... 503
Kalinin's Death and Soviet Changes ... 167
Keeling's [Mr.] Change of View of Soviet Russia ... 345
Kolchak, Result of Allied Aid to ... 193
Kolchak, Testimonial to [Hans Vorst] ... 96
Krasin's Visit to England, Real Purpose of .. 662
Lloyd George's Policy Towards [Krasin's Visit to England] ... 586
Semenov and Japan ... 1
Semenov Succeeds Kolchak ... 1
Semenov's Value [New Republic] ... 21
Siberia's Pro-Bolshevik Tendencies [Major-General Graves] ... 531
Soviet Government, Social Democrat's View [British Labor Delegation] ... 643
Soviet Government's Issue of Platinum Notes 219
Soviet Labor Code ... 446, 559
Tolstoy and Bolshevism ... 22
Unity of Russia [Dr. Rohrbach] ... 240

SAN Remo Conference, Lloyd George vs. Millerand ... 417
San Remo Peace Conference, Reconciliation of France and England ... 446
Shaw [Bernard] and Prize Fighting ... 42
Spa Conference ... 558
Sweden: Socialist Cabinet ... 419
Switzerland: Votes Conditionally to Join the League ... 1
Syria: Independence of ... 268, 296

TREATY and Covenant ... 1, 41, 70, 119, 141, 142, 166
Signing of ... 41
Turkey: Allied Policy Toward ... 240, 268
And Conditions in the Near East ... 268
France's Agreement with Kemal Pasha ... 643
Reasons for Turkey Retaining Constantinople 218

EDITORIAL ARTICLES

AGRICULTURE, the Basic Industry ... 196
Albany, The Issues in the Fight at [Socialism] ... 121
America and the Plight of Europe [Economic] ... 123
American Isolation [Treaty] ... 589
America's Duty ... 532
Article X ... 143
Asquith's Return, Mr. ... 222

"BLOOD and Iron," What Has Come of [Germany] ... 244
Bolsheviki, Poles and ... 477
Bonus, Justice and the ... 351
Branting, Prime Minister ... 451

CAMPAIGN Arguments ... 299
Centralia Murder Trial, The ... 321
Chicago, The Chances at [Presidential Candidates] ... 376
Chicago, The Problem at [Presidential Candidates] 588
Chicago, The Result at [Presidential Candidates] 644
Church and the World's Need, The ... 172
Classics, President Butler on the ... 76
College Efficiency, The "Student-Hour" and ... 198
Colleges For? What Are ... 125
Colleges, The Women's ... 223
Cost of Living Exhibit, A ... 477
Cow to Consumer, From ... 591

ECONOMIC Restoration, The World's ... 71
Eighteenth Amendment, The Protest Against the [Prohibition] ... 242
English Tradition, America and the ... 147
Europe, The Outlook in ... 26
Exchange Question, A B C of the ... 145

FAILURE, A Lamentable [Soldiers] ... 197
Faith That Is in Us, The [Socialism] ... 506
Farmers' Questionnaire, The ... 299
Father of Victory The [Clemenceau] ... 75
Fighting the Symptoms [Cost of Living] ... 243
France and England ... 322

GERMAN Elections, The ... 590
Germany, By-Governments in ... 507
Gompers [Mr.] vs. the Bolshevists ... 124
Governor Smith's Opportunity [Socialist Bills] .. 421
Greek at Oxford ... 424
"Greek for the Greek-minded" ... 645
Greeks and Poles ... 665

HOLLAND and the ex-Kaiser ... 100
Hoover ... 98
Hoover's Candidacy, Two Aspects of Mr. ... 560
Housing, Population and ... 666
Housing Problem—Ethics or Economics? The ... 349
Hungary, Peace for ... 563

"IDEALISM" at its Worst [Treaty and Wilson] 241
Idealism in Vacuo [Treaty and Wilson] ... 505
Industrial Conference, Labor and the ... 320
Irish Surprises ... 272

JACKSON-Day Bombshell, The [Treaty] ... 44
Johns Hopkins, The Case of ... 24
Johnson and the Chicago Convention ... 504

KAPP'S Ballon d'Essai [Germany] ... 301

LABOR in Politics ... 146
Labor and the Industrial Conference ... 320
Labor Move, A Hopeful ... 6
Labor, What Kansas is Doing About ... 269
Law or the Cadi, The [Lever Law] ... 617
Lawmakers Found Wanting ... 448
Liberal? What is a ... 219
Longevity, A Question of ... 379

MERCHANT Marine, Our ... 533
Mock-Hysteria [Socialism] ... 43

"NATION" Will Say—, The [Reds] ... 23
Navy Awards, Those ... 6
Newberry Verdict, The ... 450

OLD Familiar Charge, The ["Little Americans"] 664
Overallers Are in Earnest, If the [Profiteering] ... 449

PAGE

POEM? What Constitutes a ... 246
Poles and Bolsheviki ... 477
Population and Housing ... 666
Preservation of Our Wild Life, The ... 378
President, The ... 168
Prices and the Gold Standard ... 169
Price-Slashing, The Wave of ... 560
Profiteer—Hunting and Political Economy ... 195
Prohibition a Fact, Federal ... 616
Property, The Defence of ... 3
Prophet, A Rock-Bottom ... 619
Public? Is there a ... 646

REDS, The Raid on the ... 22
Review," One Year of "The ... 476
Russia, Information from ... 376
Russia, Still Fumbling With ... 101
Russia, The New Policy Toward ... 72
Russia, The Problem of ... 25
Russia's Substitute for "Wage Slavery" ... 273

SHEPHERDS and Song in the Day's News ... 667
Siberia in Despair ... 5
Sim's Memorandum, Admiral ... 74
"Social Unit," Mrs. Tiffany on the ... 7
Socialism Convention, The ... 534
Socialist Programme, Hillquit on the ... 193
Socialists at Albany, The Expulsion of the ... 348
Soothsayers, The World and the [Sir Auckland Geddes's Address] ... 664
Soviet Drive for Peace, The ... 220
Squaring Grandfather ... 479
Steel Strike, End of the ... 46
Stock Dividend Case, The ... 271
Stock Dividends Again ... 561
Strike, Limitation of the Right to ... 170
Sultan, Ousting the ... 351

"TOWN Meeting Hall," New York's ... 99
Treaty Manoeuvers ... 532
Treaty, "The Review" and the ... 420
Treaty, the Wreck of the ... 297
Turkey and the Powers ... 45
Turkish Treaty, The ... 535
Turks and Germans ... 423
"Two-thirds of Both Houses" [Prohibition] ... 47

VATICAN, The ... 422
Voice of America, The ... 616

WAR, Forgotten Derelicts of [Siberian Prisoners] ... 24
Welfare or "Hell-fare"? ... 245
White House, The Anomaly at the [Wilson] ... 319
Winter, Outwitting ... 196

SPECIAL ARTICLES

ADVERTISEES, The ... 264
Air, Empire Building by—Cairo to the Cape. C. Hicks ... 494
Aliens and the Political Party System. J. Spargo 175
Anatole France as Preacher. H. L. Stewart ... 595
Atavus, The. W. Holbrook ... 606

BARRIE, Galworthy, and Others. W. Archer .. 633
"Batter Up!" ... 624
Bolsheviks' Horn of Plenty, The. J. Landfield .. 428
Bolshevism, Asia, Europe, and, P. Rohrbach ... 455
Bolshevism in Holland. A. J. Barnouw ... 247
Books, Packing the. E. J. Pearson ... 675
Books That Appear in the Spring. E. L. Pearson ... 402
British Civil Service, The Whitley System in the E. S. Roscoe ... 611
Budget, Two Plans for a National. R. Hayden .. 513

CANADIAN Ambassador at Washington, A. J. K. F. ... 568
Certificate Borrowing and the Floating Debt. J. H. Hollander ... 552
Chéradame on Lloyd George. A. Chéradame ... 647
China, Behind the Financing of [Parts I, II, III and IV]. C. Hodges ... 275, 302, 324, 353, 452
Church Unity. Theologian ... 287
Colophons of American Publishers ... 66
Composing Room Colloquy, A. W. Holbrook ... 568
Constantinople and the Straits. P. M. Brown .. 224
Constantinople and the Turks. D. B. MacDonald 325
Co-operatives, Co-operating with the [Russia]. J. Landfield ... 107

DIPLOMACY, Pre-War American. L. Rogers 199
Drama, The Revival of the Classic. J. M. Beck ... 386
Dreiser, Theodore, Philosopher. P. E. M. ... 380

EINSTEIN and the Man in the Street. A. G. Webster ... 115
Erzberger-Helfferich Trial and the Aftermath, The. C. Gauss ... 277
Experimental Allegiances [Parts I and II] (The State). W. J. Ghent ... 275, 303
Europe? How Can America Help. G. Emerson. 498
European Rehabilitation, Export Credits and. G. Emerson ... 659
Exporter in "Wonderland", The American ... 688

FED? What Must the World Do To Be. T. H. Dickinson ... 200
Fiume, The Problem of. A Geographer ... 173

France, The Social Revolution in. R. Buell ... 566
France Through Agriculture, The Reconstruction of. A. Rostand ... 637
France, The Transportation Problem in. A. Rostand ... 305
French Plays—Carlo Liten and "Les Blues de l'Amour" ... 90
French Premier, M. Millerand, The. O Guerlac. 456
French President, The New. O. Guerlac ... 113

GERMAN University Days, Gone. G. R. Elliott ... 384
Germany, The Military Coup in. P. Rohrbach .. 540
Germany, The Outlook in. Examiner ... 356
Germany, The Political Parties in. Dr. P. Rohrbach ... 592
Germany Recover? Can. Dr. P. Rohrbach ... 104
Germany's Future Relations with Eastern Europe P. Rohrbach ... 250
Goncourt Prize, The. A. G. H. Spiers ... 599
Great Lakes, Unlocking the ... 235

HEINE'S Buried Memoirs. M. Monahan ... 438
Holland, Bolshevism in. A. J. Barnouw .. 247
Holland, Dramatic Art in. J. L. Walch ... 577
Human Cost of Living, The. D. H. Colcord ... 127
Hungary A Chance, Give. Examiner ... 508

INDIA Act, The Government of. A. J. Barnouw ... 80
Ireland, A Glimmer of Hope for. H. L. Stewart 102
Iris in Kansas City. Maytime ... 624

JAPAN'S After-War Boom, The Collapse of. C. Hodges ... 584
Japan, President Wilson's. C. Hodges ... 149
Jazz a Song at Twilight. C. Wood ... 468
Jobs for New Brooms [New President's Job]. E. G. Lowry ... 672
Johnson in Fact and Fancy, Hiram W. J. Landfield ... 537
Journals, The Jazz. W. J. Ghent ... 30
June, Early. E. G. H. ... 683

KING'S, Old. A. MacMechan ... 185

LABOR and Capital, Problems of: Employers' Associations. M. L. Ernst ... 361
II, Honest Ballots for Unions and Employers' Associations. M. L. Ernst ... 408
III, Compulsory Filing of Collective Bargaining Agreements. M. L. Ernst ... 442
IV, Chartering vs. Incorporating Employers' Associations and Trade Unions. M. L. Ernst ... 610
Lady of the Violets, The [Suffrage]. M. C. Francis ... 129
Lawrence, The Company Stores at. Staff Correspondent ... 286
Loans, America's Foreign. T. F. Woodlock ... 344
League of Nations, Switzerland and the. O. Nippold ... 541
Lodge, The Case of Sir Oliver. J. Jastrow ... 225
London Stage, On the. W. Archer ... 38

MAETERLINCK, The Case of Maurice. J. Jastrow ... 381
Metropolitan Museum, The Jubilee of the. F. J. Mather, Jr. ... 510
Mexico, The Plot Against. W. J. Ghent ... 536
Monroe Doctrine as an Adventure in Foreign Policy, The. E. J. Benton ... 670
More [Mr. P. E.] and The Wits. S. P. Sherman 54
Moscow's Campaign of Poison. Examiner ... 77

NATURE Lover, The. W. Beebe ... 406
Naval Inquiry, The. S. P. ... 426
"New Republic's" Exhilaration, The [Russia] J. Landfield ... 150
North Dakota, A "Gold Brick" From. Eye-Witness ... 621

OUT of Their Own Mouths [Bolshevism]. J. Landfield ... 48

PAINTING in Washington, Contemporary. V. Barker ... 62
Paish [Sir George] A Talk With. C. H. Meltzer. 53
Palestine, The Problem of. E. B. Reed ... 564
Palestine, The Problem of—A Rejoinder. E. M. Friedman ... 650
Piotr Ivanovitch, The House of [Russia]. J. E. Conner ... 593
Poland, Aggressive. L. Pasvolsky ... 480
Political State, Abolishing the. W. J. Ghent ... 126
"Politicians' Union," The Troubles of the. E. G. Lowry ... 248
Presidential Inability. L. Rogers ... 481
President's Secretary, The. Spectator ... 177
Print-Seller, My Friend the. L. Williams ... 550
Professor, The Unreconstructed. P. M. Buck, Jr. ... 154
Profiteer Hunting, On. H. Hazlitt ... 466
Propaganda and the News. W. J. Ghent ... 453
Pygmalion, The Tragedy of. R. Demos ... 368

RADICAL in Fiction, The. F. Tupper ... 483
Railroads? Life or Death for the. T. F. Woodlock ... 28
Reactionaries, Helping the. W. J. Ghent ... 354
Religious Revivals—Old and New. S. West ... 332
Republican National Convention, The. J. Landfield ... 649
Russian Peasants, The Plight of. J. Landfield ... 276
Russian Village, How the Soviet Came to a ... 153

SCHOOLS? Can We Improve Our Public. C. F. Goodrich ... 50
Scientific Research, Organization in. J. R. Angell 251
Ship's Library, The. R. P. Utter ... 404
Shoe Men, Our American ... 89
Sinners and Little Ones, Big. A. Replier ... 668
Slaves of the Machine [Labor]. D. H. Colcord 8
Social Unit at Cincinnati—Is it a Soviet? The. K. E. Tiffany ... 11
Soures, George, an Athenian Satirist. A. E. Phoutrides ... 211
Stock Exchange and the "Corner in Stutz," The. T. F. W. ... 524
Switzerland and the League of Nations. O. Nippold ... 541

THIRD Internationale, The. A. J. Barnouw [Holland] ... 328
Transportation Problem in France, The. A. Rostand ... 305
Trembling Year, The. R. P. Utter ... 491
Turkey and Armenia, Lorn Bryce on. James Bryce ... 425
Turks, Constantinople and the. D. B. MacDonald ... 325

UNCULT, The. W. Holbrook ... 201

VOYAGE, Impressions de [I, II and III]. C. F. Goodrich ... 440, 522, 606

WASHINGTON Gossip ... 29
Whitley System in the British Civil Service, The. E. S. Roscoe ... 611
Winter Mist. R. P. Utter ... 210
Woodpiles, Of. R. P. Utter ... 260

YOUNG Nations, Worries of the. T. H. Dickinson ... 620

CORRESPONDENCE

ADRIATIC Problem, The. Square Deal ... 329
Amendment be Unconstitutional? Can a Constitutional. G. S. Brown ... 359
Amendments, Amending the. Optimist ... 179
"America's Duty." Altruist ... 597
Anglo-Persian Treaty, The. Y. B. Mirza ... 432
Anti-Saloon League, The High-Handedness of the. E. J. Shriver ... 228

BECK'S Letter, Reactions to: A. F. Beard; C. D. Higby; J. S. Moore; G. H. Putnam .. 430, 431
Bonus, A Woman's View of the. B. D. C. ... 458
Bonus, The. E. L. C. Morse ... 458
Book Reviewing, The Hazards of. L. G. McPherson ... 331
Budget," "Two Plans For a National. J. P. Chamberlain ... 569
Business, Salvaging the Facts of. D. W. Hyde, Jr. ... 570

"CAHIERS de la Quinzaine," The. M. Péguy. 131
Church, Loose Talk Within the. T. M. Banks ... 279
Church of England, Mr. Roscoe and the. L. J. B. 52
Clemenceau and the Left Bank. A. O. Lovejoy .. 359
Col. Lynch's Catholicism. G. L. Fox ... 106
Concert Stage, Atmosphere on the. G. Vernon .. 13
Confiscation by Amendment. E. J. Shriver ... 130
Congress's Right to Declare Peace. E. S. Corwin 388
Conservation of Wild Life. E. W. Nelson ... 544
Constitution, What Might Happen to the. E. J. Shriver ... 202

DANTE Centennial, The Sixth. H. Cochin ... 570
Dead in France, Our. Abbé F. Klein ... 674
Deflation Through Taxation. M. C. Burke. 32
Dreiser and the Broadway Magazine, Mr. T. Dreiser and. A. N. Meyer ... 597
Dreiser's Battle for Truth, Mr. A. N. Meyer .. 486

EDUCATION, The Work of the South in Women's. L. P. Posey ... 307

"FAITH that Is in Us, The." J. F. Morton, Jr. 542
France to Pay Her Debts, The Ability of. Jules Meline ... 543
Freedom of Opinion. M. F. Clarke ... 152
French Opinion of the A. E. F., A. A. Chevrillon 32
French Students, The War and. E. Lavisse ... 517

GERMAN Despair. G. M. Priest ... 32
Germans in Disguise. E. Corman ... 152
Germany, Fuel in. W. J. Lowenstein ... 280
Germany the Logical Claimant. B. W. Kelly ... 598
Gold as Commodity and as Money. H. A. Briggs 598
Government by Subterfuge. H. T. Newcomb ... 151
Greenbacks, The Trouble with the. L. A. Hollenbeck ... 13

HOME Rule Proposals, The New. A. B. Johnson ... 390
Hoover, Zachary Taylor and Herbert. X ... 457
Housing Problem, The. F. L. Olmsted ... 652
Human Cost of Living, Reducing the. L. F. Loree ... 330
Human Cost of Living," "The. B ... 227

INTANGIBLE Advantages ["Defence of Property"]. J. de L. Verplanck..... 152
"Intellectuals," The. W. F. Bissing..... 625
Investors, Protection for. B. R. Andrews..... 331

"JEST, The". A. E. T..... 626
Jew and Arab. F. J. Bliss..... 485

KAISER'S Case, The. O. Nippold..... 625
Keynes and Dillon. A. O. Lovejoy..... 279
Kingsley, List to Charles. W. B..... 673

LANSING'S Statutory Rights, Mr. J. M. Beck. 253
Liberty, The Decline of. G. W. Martin..... 202
Lodge and Sinn Fein, Senator. H. B. Warren.. 517
Lodge and Wilson, Senator Weeks on. J. W. Weeks..... 516
Lodge, High Praise for Senator. J. M. Beck..... 358
Lodge Reservations, The. M. Storey..... 569
Lodge's "Fight Against Wilson." L. B. Swift.. 485

MEDICINE, Compulsory. J. Hutchinson, M. D. 389
Mexico Intervention in. E. L. C. Morse.. 83
Mexico, Misstatements About, C. W. Knoblauch.. 543

NEWBERRY Trial, The. W. E. V..... 431
Newberry Verdict, The. H. H. Smith..... 459

PAISLEY," "Keep Your Eye on. J. M. Dixon. 330
Party Membership and the Vote. F. B. Simkins..... 569
Pedagogy, Pelf and. O. Heller..... 203
Pilot at the Wheel, No [Wilson]. F. Rogers..... 83
Professor, Keeping Tab on the. C. H. Benjamin. 486
Public Schools and the Colleges. W. H. Buck.. 131
Purchasing Power, The Theory of. J. L. Laughlin 306

QUANTITY Theory, The. J. L. Laughlin..... 674
Queen Anne's Time, The Wits of. S. B. G..... 517

RADICAL or Conservative—a Perverse Dilemma. A. A. Goldenweiser..... 130
Railroads?" "Life or Death for the. S. H. Bingham..... 130
Reading, More and Better. C. H. Milam..... 152
Referendum, The Power of the. Optimist..... 228
Relaxed Vigilance, A Case of. T. R. Boggs..... 459
Religion, The Outlook for. C. H. Eshleman..... 202
Religious Liberty. W. H. van Allen..... 331
Retroactive Income Taxes. C. R. Smith..... 652
Revolution, Inviting. H. W. Lawrence, Jr..... 52
Revolutionist, How to Meet the. H. Barry..... 254
Russian Problem, The. J. de Lancey Verplanck.. 179

"SOCIAL Unit," Queries Concerning the. W. H. Sheldon..... 83
Socialism, The Pope on. L. F. L..... 516
Spirit, Intermolecular Space and the. E. Berliner..... 360
Strike, The Right to. W. Haynes..... 673
Survival After Death as Related to Physics. T. F. W..... 598

TAX Burden, Business and the. G. Calhoun..... 626
Tax, The Excess Profits. P. Dexter..... 388
"Two-thirds of Both Houses." B. Tuska..... 105

UNIVERSITIES and the Danger Point. A. M. Brooks..... 203
University for New Jersey, An English. T. Stanton..... 106

WELFARE Work at Akron, Industrial. G. Orb 228
What Shall We do to Be Saved? [Hoover]. M. L..... 82
Wild Life Preservation. W. T. Hornaday..... 431
Winchester, C. T. H. T. Baker..... 459
Worms, The Noise of. A Noisy Worm..... 179

ZIONISM, Prince Feisal on. F. Frankfurter.. 625

POETRY

AT the Front in Poetry. O. W Firkins..... 33

LAODICEANS, The. M. C. Smith..... 651
"Louvain Is a Dull, Uninteresting Town". R. Withington..... 177

ON Record. R. Burton..... 249

POEM? What Constitutes a..... 246
Poetry, Prize Contest..... 576

STORMBOUND. W. N. Bates..... 623

THESE Dead Have Not Died. H. T. Baker..... 336
Tides. S.. N..... 356

MUSIC AND ART

APHRODITE..... 261
Atmosphere on the Concert Stage. G. Vernon..... 13

BEDOUINS. J. Huneker..... 370
Birthday of the Infanta, The..... 261
Blue Bird, The..... 186

CHICAGO Opera Season, The..... 92
Cleopatra's Night..... 137
Concert Stage, Atmosphere on the. G. Vernon.. 13

DRAMATIC Art in Holland. J. L. Walch..... 577

ETCHERS and Etching. J. Pennell..... 87
Eugene Onegin..... 340

HUDSON River Bridge as War Memorial..... 642

KOVEN, Reginald de..... 92
Krehbiel (Henry) and Ernest Newman Discuss Music..... 62

L'AMORE dei Tre Re..... 136
Lexington, At the—The Blue Bird—Caruso's Indisposition..... 186
L'Heure Espagnole..... 136
Louise..... 162

MADAME Chrysanthème..... 136
Mary Garden and "Louise"—The Concert Season..... 162
Massenet's Memorics and Music..... 18

NEW York Opera War, The—Hints to Librettists..... 116

PAINTING in Washington, Contemporary. V. Barker..... 62
Parsifal..... 212
Print Seller, My Friend the. L. Williams..... 550

QUAKER Singer's Recollections, A. D. Bispham..... 289

RIP Van Winkle..... 136

VENUS of Milo, Exhibiting of..... 577

ZAZA..... 92

DRAMA

AMERICAINS Chez Nous, Les. M. Brieux..... 577
At the Lexington—"The Blue Bird"—Caruso's Indisposition..... 186

BEAUTIFUL Sabine Women..... 441
Beyond the Horizon..... 185

CRAFT of the Tortoise and Other Plays, The.. 368
Cruche, La..... 18

DRAMAS for the Reader..... 607

FAIR..... 658
French Labor Unions and the Stage..... 548
French Plays—Carlo Liten and "Les Bleus de l'Amour"..... 90

GEORGE WASHINGTON..... 288
Glittering Gate, The..... 442
Grain of Mustard-Seed, The..... 633

HAMLET..... 555
He and She..... 262
Holland, Dramatic Art in. J. L. Walch..... 577
Husbands for all..... 634

IBSEN in England. M. A. Franc..... 213

JACINTO BENAVENTE: Theatre and Liberty. 161
Jane Clegg..... 288
"Jest, The." A. E. T..... 626
John Gabriel Borkman..... 494

LETTER of the Law, The..... 264
London Stage, On the. W. Archer..... 38

MAKER of Dreams..... 497
Mary Broome..... 18
Mary Rose..... 633
Masks. G. Middleton..... 632
Master Builder, The..... 65
Medea..... 338
Merchant of Venice, The..... 684
Musique Adoncit les Coeurs, La..... 18

NIGHT Shade..... 658
Night's Lodging, A..... 65

PASSION Flower..... 161
Piper..... 338
Poetic Play, Prize Contest..... 576
Power of Darkness..... 137
Proletarian Theatre (Die Neue Schaubühne)... 550
Pygmalion and Galatea..... 497

REVIVAL of the Classic Drama, The. J. M. Beck..... 386
Richard III..... 312

SACRED and Profane Love..... 312
Shakespeare at Stratford, Produced by Mr. Bridges Adams..... 634
Skin Game, The..... 633
Social Plays of Arthur Wing Pinero, The. Vol. II. Letty—His House in Order..... 213
Sothern and Marlowe at the Shubert Theatre..... 554

TAMING of the Shrew, The..... 554
Théatre Parisien, The..... 186
Three Plays from the Argentine, Edited by E. H. Bierstadt..... 605
Twelfth Night..... 554

UNCLE Sam. V. Sardou..... 576
Unreviving London Stage and Its Revivals, The. W. Archer..... 465

FINANCE AND ECONOMICS

AMERICA and the Plight of Europe..... 123
America's Duty..... 532, 597
America's Foreign Loans. T. F. Woodlock..... 344

BUDGET System Needed..... 70
Budget', "The Plans For a National. J. P. Chamberlain..... 569
Budget, Two Plans for a National. R. Hayden.. 513

CANADIAN Financial Prosperity, Aid to [Sir Vincent Meredith]..... 143
Certificate Borrowing and the Floating Debt. J. H. Hollander..... 552
China, Behind the Financing of [Part I. & II.] C. Hodges..... 302, 324
Congress Proposes Bonus Raised by Retroactive War-Profits Tax Bill..... 445
Current Investment Publications..... 556

DEFLATION [Federal Reserve Board's Report] 192
Deflation Through Taxation. M. C. Burke 32

ECONOMIC Restoration, The World's..... 71
Economic Truths and Advertising..... 97
Europe? How Can America Help. G. Emerson 498
Exchange Question, A B C of the..... 145
Export Credits and European Rehabilitation. G. Emerson..... 659

FRANCE to Pay Her Debts, The Ability of. Jules Meline..... 543

GERMAN Indemnity, Arrangement at Hythe.. 558
German Indemnity [Keynes vs. Miller]. 141, 142
Glass's Recommendation to Congress for Relief in Europe..... 41, 119, 166
Gold as Commodity and as Money. H. A. Briggs 598
Greenbacks, The Trouble with the. L. A. Hollenbeck..... 13

HIGH Prices, Cause of [Kansas City Star]..... 374
Housing, Population and..... 666
Housing Problem—Ethics or Economics? The..... 349

INVESTORS, Protection for. B. R. Andrews... 331

JAPAN'S After-War Boom, The Collapse of C. Hodges..... 584

LABOR Hiring Capital [Sir George Paish]..... 42

PAISH (Sir George), A Talk With. C. H. Meltzer..... 53
Prices and the Gold Standard..... 169
Price-Slashing, The Wave of..... 560
Profiteer-Hunting and Political Economy..... 195
Profiteer Hunting, On. H. Hazlitt..... 466
Purchasing Power, The Theory of. J. L. Laughlin..... 306

QUANTITY Theory, The. J. L. Laughlin..... 674

RETROACTIVE Income Taxes. C. R. Smith 652

SOVIET Government's Issue of Platinum Notes 219
Stock Dividend Case, The..... 271
Stock Dividends Again..... 561
Stock Exchange and the "Corner in Stutz", The T. F. W..... 524

TAX Burden, Business and the. G. Calhoun.. 626
Tax, The Excess Profits. P. Dexter..... 388
Taxation of Non-Residents [Supreme Court Decision]..... 218

OBITUARIES

DE KOVEN, Reginald..... 92

MORTON, Levi P..... 530

OSLER, Dr. William..... 2

PEARY (Admiral)..... 193

SOURES, George..... 211

WINCHESTER, C. T. H. T. Baker..... 459

EDUCATIONAL

BACK to the Republic. By H. F. Atwood..... 471
Beginning of Education, The. W. Haller.. 579

CHILD Welfare Laws..... 447
Classics, President Butler on the..... 76
College Efficiency, "The Student Hour" and..... 198

PAGE
College Entrance Requirements................ 294
Colleges, Amherst Memorial Fellowship........ 2
Degree Requirements—Specific Knowledge of Our Form of Government............ 167
Final Examinations for Degrees [Harvard].. 97
Colleges For? What are....................... 125
Harvard, Teachers and Production [Lowell's Report] 240
Professors' Salaries [University of Washington] 167
Colleges, The Women's........................ 223
Women's, Funds Needed.................... 219
Conservation of Birds and Trees [University of the State of New York's Coöperation with Public Schools] 416
Corporation Schools 471

DEAD Culture and Live Business. W. S. Hichman 290
Democratic Education 579

EDUCATION for the Cotton Industry. G. Orb.. 415
Education, The Work of the South in Women's. L. P. Posey................ 307
Essay Competition Between England and America 343

FLOWER Garden Guide. Mrs. Massey Holmes 688

GREEK at Oxford.......................... 424
"Greek for the Greek-Minded".......... 645

JOHNS Hopkins, The Case of................ 24

MANCHESTER Grammer School, The. A. A. Mumford 523
Moral Basis of Democracy, The. A. T. Hadley.. 636

NATURAL History of the Child, The. Dr. C. Dunn 688
Need of Education in Fundamental Economic Truths. 97
New York Post Graduate Medical School........ 447

PEDAGOGY, Pelf and. O. Heller............ 203
Physical Education and Scholastic Efficiency. [L. W. Hill]........................... 416
Police and Education.......................... 344
Propaganda and Education. P. M. Brown...... 342
Professor, Keeping Tab on the. C. H. Benjamin. 486
Professor, The Unreconstructed. P. M. Buck, Jr. 154
Public Schools and the Colleges. W. H. Buck.. 131

RESEARCH and Organization. A. G. Webster 686
Review's Educational Section..........269, 290

SCHOOLS? Can We Improve Our Public. C. F. Goodrich 50
Scientific Research, Organization in. J. R. Angell 251

TEACHERS' Salaries, Statistics of [Dr. Evenden] 580
Thesaurus Linguæ Latinæ...................... 636

UNIONIZATION of College and University Teachers [Prof. Lovejoy] 97
Universal Training. W. S. Hinchman.......... 412
University President, The Professor....... 410
University Training for Business............... 634

WAR and the Rhodes Scholarships, The. F. Aydelotte 470
Women's Education, The Work of the South in. L. P. Posey 307

BOOKS—AUTHORS

ADAMS, H. The Degradation of the Democratic Dogma 255
Ade, G. Hand-Made Fables.......................... 461
Agate, J. E. Responsibility: A Novel.......... 573
Aldington, R. Images 33
Aldington, R. Latin Poems of the Renaissance.. 33
Ammers-Küller, D. J. van. Maskerade........ 398
Aslan, K. Armenia and the Armenians from the Earliest Times Until the Great War...... 605
Atwood, H. F. Back to the Republic........... 471
Austin, M. Outland.............................. 158

BABSON, R. W. W. B. Wilson and the Department of Labor.................................... 333
Bain, F. W. The Substance of a Dream........ 682
Bacheller, I. A Man for the Ages............... 231
Barney, D. Chords from Albireo............... 519
Barron, C. W. A World Remaking or Peace Finance 464
Bartlett, H. Within My Horizon............. 548
Barton, W. E. The Soul of Abraham Lincoln.. 366
Bates, K. L. Sigurd, our Golden Collie........ 135
Baxter, A. B. The Blower of Bubbles.......... 363
Bazalgette, L. Walt Whitman: The Man and his Work 310
Begbie, H. The Life of General William Booth.. 680
Bellairs, C. The Battle of Jutland.............. 677
Benson, E. F. Up and Down.................... 257
Bercovici, K. Dust of New York................ 111
Beresford, J. D. An Imperfect Mother......... 654
Berliner, E. Muddy Jim.......................... 88
Bertrand, A. The Call of the Soil............. 257
Beveridge, A. J. The Life of John Marshall.... 204
Birnbaum, M. Introductions.................... 184
Bispham, D. A Quaker Singer's Recollections... 289
Bojer, J. Treacherous Ground.................. 520
Borgnis, M. A. Le Livre Pratique des Spirites.. 437
Bowen, M. The Burning Glass................. 463
Boynton, P. H. American Literature.......... 550
Bradford, Gamaliel. Portraits of American Women 60
Bradley, H. Sir James Murray.................. 311
Braithwaite, W. S. The Story of the Great War. 210
Branch, S. The Burning Secret................ 310
Bersol, B. Socialism vs. Civilization............ 491
Breduis, A. Künstler-Inventare................. 574
Brooks, C. S. Luca Sarto: A Novel............ 463
Bronson, W. C. American Literature.......... 550
Brown, Alice. The Black Drop................. 36
Brown, G. E. Book of R. L. S.................. 436
Browne, R. T. The Mystery of Space.......... 133
Bullard, A. The Russian Pendulum............ 207
Burgess, T. W. The Burgess Bird Book for Children 112
Burr, A. J. Hearts Awake..................... 362
Buxton, N., and C. L. Leese. Balkan Problems and European Peace........................ 395

CABELL, J. B. The Cream of the Jest........ 602
Cadmus and Harmonia. The Island of Sheep 487
Campbell, O. J. The Position of the Roode en Whitte Roos in the Saga of King Richard III 437
Cannan, G. Pink Roses.......................... 58
Cannan, G. Time and Eternity.................. 489
Caron, C. M. L'Admiral de Grasse............. 88
Chancellor, W. E. The Health of the Teacher.. 464
Cheng, Sih-Gung. Modern China.............. 281
Chesterton, G. K. Irish Impressions........... 284
Chevrillon, M. A. Près des Combattants........ 184
Clark, C. My Quarter Century of American Politics 460
Clemenceau, G. Au Pied du Sinai.............. 631
Clutton-Brock, A. Essays on Art.............. 576
Cobb, I. S. From Place to Place.............. 363
Cone, H. G. The Coat Without a Seam........ 519
Connor, H. G. John Archibald Campbell, Associate Justice of the United States: Supreme Court, 1853-1861 601
Conrad, J. The Rescue...................604, 629
Cory, H. E. The Intellectuals and the Wage-Earners 229
Cotterill, H. B. Italy from Dante to Tasso.... 544
Couperus, L. Ecstasy: A Study of Happiness.. 85
Cournos, J. The Mask 231
Cross, T. P. Bibliography and Methods of English Literary History 17

DANE, C. Legend 334
D'Annunzio, G. Tales of My Native Town 435
Davies, M. C. Youth Riding.................... 362
Davies, T. H. Spiritual Voices in Modern Literature 160
Daviess, M. T. The Matrix..................... 463
Davis, W. S. A History of France from the Earliest Times to the Peace of Versailles.. 285
Dawson, R. Red Terror and Green............ 600
Dawson, W. H. The Evolution of Modern Germany 572
De Bekker, L. J. The Plot Against Mexico...... 206
Desmond, S. Passion: A Human Story........ 573
Dickey, M. Youth of James Whitcomb Riley.... 159
Dodd, A. B. Up the Seine to the Battlefields.. 681
Don Marquis Prefaces.......................... 37
Doyle, A. C. Vital Message.................... 134
Dresser, H. W. Open Vision.................... 631
Dunn, Dr. C. The Natural History of the Child 688
Dunsany, Lord. Tales of Three Hemispheres.... 111
Dybowski, J. Notre Force Future.............. 131

ELIOT, S. A., Jr. Little Theatre Classics, Vol. II 608
Escouflaire, R. C. Ireland an Enemy of the Allies? 676

FABRE, J. H. Field, Forest and Farm......... 113
Ferguson, J. L. Outlines of Chinese Art.. 16
Fisher, J. A. Memories and Records........... 654
Fitzgerald, F. S. This Side of Paradise......... 392
Fontainas, M. A. La Vie d'Edgar A. Poe....... 259
Ford, H. J. Alexander Hamilton............... 678
Fort, C. Book of the Damned.................. 184
Franc, M. A. Ibsen in England................. 213
Frank, W. Our America........................ 434
Frankau, G. Peter Jameson: A Modern Romance 573
Frederick, J. G. Modern Salesmanship......... 184
Frederickson, J. D. The Story of Milk......... 184
Frost, S. Germany's New War Against America. 14
Fuller, H. B. Bertram Cope's Year............. 394

GALE, Z. Miss Lulu Brett................... 394
Ganz, M. Rebels: Into Anarchy and Out Again 231
Gardner, C. William Blake, The Man.......... 181
Gass, S. B. A Lover of the Chair.............. 157
Gibbs, P. How it Can be Told................. 394
Gilmore, G. W. Animism, or Thought Currents of Primitive Peoples........................ 337
Glasgow, E. The Builders...................... 36
Goldberg, I. Studies in Spanish-American Literature 335
Gompers, S. Labor and the Common Welfare.... 333
Gosse, E. Some Aversions of a Man of Letters.. 487
Gosset, Abbé. Une Glorieuse Mutilée.......... 522
Graeve, O. Youth Goes Seeking................ 132
Graham, S. A Private in the Guards........... 232
Grenfell, A. and K. Spalding. Le Petit Nord, or Annals of a Labrador Harbour............ 679
Grey, E. Recreation 518
Guild, T. H. The Power of a God and Other One-Act Plays 370
Gwynn, S. John Redmond's Last Years........ 390

HADLEY, A. T. The Moral Basis of Democracy 636
Hamilton, E. Elizabethan Ulster............... 284
Hankey, D. Cross 112
Harland, M. The Carrington's of High Hill.... 183
Harrison, A. Before and Now.................. 600
Harrison, M. The Stolen Lands................ 364
Heinrich, Professor. Dinant, Eine Denkschrift.. 548
Hendrick, E. Percolator Papers................ 37
Henry, S. Villa Elsa........................... 436
Henslow, G. Proofs of the Truths of Spiritualism 337
Herbert, A. P. The Secret Battle.............. 257
Herford, M. A. B. A Handbook of Greek Vase Painting 159
Herford, O. This Giddy World................ 112
Hindenburg, von. Aus Meinem Leben.......... 337
Holding, E. S. Invincible Minnie.............. 602
Holdsworth, E. The Taming of Nan............ 207
Holland, F. Seneca 521
Holliday, R. C. Broome Street Straws.......... 88
Hopkins, N. M. The Outlook for Research and Invention 488
Hoppin, J. C. A Handbook of Attic Red-Figured Vases 59
Howe, M. A. de. W. George von Lengerke Meyer, His Life and Public Services............ 308
Hudson, W. H. The Book of a Naturalist..... 112
Huizinga, D. J. Herfsttij der Middeleeuwen.... 435
Huneker, J. Bedouins 370
Hyndman, H. M. Clemenceau: The Man and His Times 34

IBAÑEZ, B. V. Woman Triumphant........... 520
Inge, W. R. Outspoken Essays........... 396
Inman, S. G. Intervention in Mexico.......... 206
Irwin, I. H. The Happy Years................. 363

JAMES, G. W. Wonders of the Colorado Desert 61
Jean-Aubry, G. French Music of To-day.. 630
Johnson, S. The Enemy Within................ 283
Johnston, M. Michael Forth.................... 158
Jones, E. H. The Road to En-dor.............. 547

KARSNER, D. Debs: His Authorized Life and Letters 333
Kaye-Smith, S. Tamarisk Town................ 654
Keith, E. A. My Escape from Germany........ 632
Keller, G. Seldwyla Folks: Three Singular Tales 111
Kennedy, C. R. Army with Banners........... 400
Kernahan, C. Swinburne As I Knew Him...... 576
Keynes, J. M. The Economic Consequences of the Peace 155
Kite, E. S. Beaumarchais and the War of American Independence 436
Klein, F. En Amérique à la Fin de la Guerre... 337
Klickmann, F. Lore of the Pen................. 400
Kobrin, L. A Lithuanian Village.............. 363
Krehbiel, H. More Chapters of Opera.......... 62

LACROIX, L. Le Clergé et La Guerre de 1914. 572
La Motte, E. H. The Opium Monthly.... 400
Latzko, A. The Judgment of Peace............ 257
Lauvrière, E. Edgar Poe: Contes et Poésies.... 657
La Varre, W. J. Up the Mazaruni for Diamonds. 547
Leacock, S. The Unsolved Riddle of Social Justice 234
Leary, J. L., Jr. Talks with T. R.............. 656
Lemercier, E. Lettres d'un Soldat............. 259
Leslie, N. Three Plays......................... 464
Lindsay, V. The Golden Whales of California.. 518
Lippmann, W. Liberty and the News........... 571
Lockington, W. J. The Soul of Ireland........ 284
Loisy, A. Guerre et Religion.................. 572
Loisy, A. La Paix des Nations et La Religion de l'Avenir 572
Loisy, A. Mors et Vita......................... 572
Loti, P. Madame Prune......................... 366
Low, B. R. C. The Pursuit of Happiness....... 362
Lowell, A. Pictures of the Floating World...... 33
Lynd, R. Ireland a Nation...................... 461

McDONALD, W. Some Questions of Peace and War 230
McKenzie, F. A. Korea's Fight for Freedom.... 545
McLennan, J. S. Louisbourg from Its Foundation to Its Fall 1713-1758.................. 37
McPherson, L. G. The Flow of Value........... 282
McPherson, W. L. The Strategy of the Great War 17
MacFarlan, A. The Inscrutable Lovers......... 334
MacGill, P. Maureen........................... 679
Mackay, H. Chill Hours........................ 605
Mackenzie, J. S. Arrows of Desire............ 546
Mackie, R. A. Education During Adolescence... 433
MacManus, S. Lo and Behold Ye.............. 111
MacMasters, W. H. Revolt, An American Novel. 394
MacNamara, B. The Clanking of Chains........ 462
MacPhail, J. M. The Heritage of India......... 61
MacVeagh, E. C., and L. D. Brown. The Yankee in the British Zone........................ 436
Maeterlinck, M. Mountain Paths............... 15
Magnus, L. European Literature in the Centuries of Romance 209
Malins, Lieut. How I Filmed the War.......... 364
Marcosson, I. M. Adventures in Interviewing.. 135
Marsh, A. Z. Home Nursing.................... 464
Marvin, F. S. The Century of Hope............ 628
Masefield, J. Reynard the Fox................. 33
Massenet, J. My Recollections................. 18
Masters, E. L. Starved Rock.................. 519
Maurice, F., General. The Last Four Months of the War 627
Mayorga, M. G. Representative One-Act Plays by American Authors 607
Merrick, L. The Worldlings.................... 183
Middleton, G. Masks........................... 632

PAGE

Middleton, P. H. Industrial Mexico........... 206
Mills, J. S. and M. G. Crussachi. The Question of Thrace 550
Morris, E. B. The Cresting Wave............ 393
Moses, B. Spain's Declining Power in South America 285
Mumford, A. A. The Manchester Grammar School 523

NATHAN, R. Peter Kindred............... 392
Nevill, R. The Life and Letters of Lady Dorothy Nevill 132
Newman, E. A Musical Motley............ 62
North, A. The Forging of the Pikes........... 463

O'BRIEN, F. While Shadows in the South Seas 37
Ogilvie, P. M. International Waterways.. 603
Oldmeadow, E. Coggin....................... 310
Ollivant, A. Two Men: A Romance of Sussex.. 207
Olrik, Axel. The Heroic Legends of Denmark.. 366
O'Neil, G. The Cobbler of Willow Street...... 362
Oppenheim, E. P. The Great Impersonation.... 210
Orczy, Baroness. His Majesty's Well-Beloved.... 463

PAINE, R. D. Ships Across the Sea.......... 577
Palmer, F. Our Greatest Battle.......... 627
Paton, L. A. Life of Elizabeth Cary Agassiz.... 337
Patterson, J. E. The Passage of the Barque Sappho 15
Patterson, M. A Woman's Man................ 132
Peixotto, E. At the American Front.......... 113
Pennell, J. Etchers and Etching................ 87
Phillpotts, E. Storm in a Teacup.............. 207
Porter, A. K. The Seven Who Slept........... 609
Prescott, F. C. Poetry and Dreams........... 365

RAINSFORD, W. K. From Upton to the Meuse, With the 307th Infantry............ 464
Reade, W. The Martyrdom of Man............ 629
Reid, F. Pirates of the Spring................ 310
Rice, C. V. Shadowy Thresholds............... 362
Rihani, Ameen. Descent of Bolshevism......... 682
Rihani, Ameen. The Luzumiyat of Abu-'l-Ala... 17
Ritchie, Lady. From Friend to Friend.......... 522
Roget, P. M. Thesaurus of English Words and Phrases 61
Rose, R. S., and L. Bacon. Lay of the Cid translated into English Verse.................. 400
Rouvier, F. Un Ligne........................ 572
Russell, C. F. After the Whirlwind........... 108

ST. JOHN, C. M. Bibliography of Wordsworth 209
Sadler, M. The Anchor................. 489
Saleeby, C. W. The Whole Armour of Man.... 258
Sassoon, S. Picture Show.................... 520
Sayler, O. M. Russia, White or Red.......... 135
Sayler, O. M. Russian Theatre Under the Revolution 259
Scarborough, D. From a Southern Porch...... 87
Schlichter, S. H. The Turnover of Factory Labor 36
Scott, T. Silver Age.......................... 60
Serao, M. Souls Divided...................... 434
Sherrill, C. H. Have We a Far Eastern Policy? 655
Smith, C. A. New Words Self-Defined.......... 38
Smith, L. W. The Lamp of Heaven............ 370
Smyth, E. Impressions that Remained.......... 182
Spargo, J. The Psychology of Bolshevism...... 206
Stearns, H. Liberalism in America............ 229
Swinnerton, F. September..................... 85
Symonds, J. A. In the Key of Blue............ 575
Symonds, J. A. Last and First................ 575

TASSIN, A. The Craft of the Tortoise........ 368
Teall, G. A Little Garden the Year Round 392
Thomson, J. E. H. The Samaritans, Their Testimony to the Religion of Israel........... 311
Thurston, E. T. The World of Wonderful Reality 132
Tirpitz, Admiral von. My Memoirs............ 84
Tweedale, V. Ghosts I Have Seen............. 183

VAN VORST, M. Fairfax and His Pride...... 393
Von der Essen, L. A Short History of Belgium 335
Von Heidenstam, V. The Birth of God......... 609
Von Heidenstam, V. The Soothsayer.......... 608
Von Hertling, Chancellor. Ein Jahr in der Reichskanzlei 548

WADDINGTON, A. Histoire de Prusse...... 522
Walpole, H. Jeremy.................... 310
Walston (Waldstein), Sir C. English-Speaking Brotherhood and the League of Nations.. 682
Ward, A. W. Shakespeare and the Makers of Virginia 311
Ward, Mrs. H. Harvest....................... 679
Warren, H. L. The Foundations of Classic Architecture 208
Washburn, C. C. Order........................ 393
Webster, N. H. The French Revolution: A Study in Democracy 653
Wells, H. G. Love and Mr. Lewisham.......... 489
Wheelock, J. H. Dust and Light.............. 33
Whitehouse, V. B. A Year as a Government Agent 208
Whitlock, B. Belgium: A Personal Narrative.. 285
Widdemer, M. The Board Walk............... 363
Williams, B. A. The Sea Bride................ 15
Wood, F. J. Turnpikes of New England........ 311

ZAMACOIS, E. Their Son; The Necklace.... 111

BOOKS—SUBJECTS

ADVENTURES in Interviewing. I. M. Marcosson 135
After the Whirlwind. C. F. Russell 108
Alexander Hamilton, H.J. Ford............... 678
American Literature. P. H. Boynton........... 550
American Literature. W. C. Bronson........... 550
Anchor, The. M. Sadler....................... 489
Animism, or Thought Currents of Primitive Peoples. G. W. Gilmore................... 337
Armenia and the Armenians from the Earliest Times Until the Great War. K. Aslan.... 605
Army With Banners. C. R. Kennedy.......... 400
Arrows of Desire. J. S. Mackenzie............ 546
At the American Front. Captain E. Peixotto.... 113
Au Pied du Sinai. G. Clemenceau............ 631
Aus Meinem Leben. Von Hindenberg.......... 337
Averroes' Metaphysics. Translated by C. Quirós Rodriguez 337

BACK to the Republic. H. T. Atwood........ 471
Balkan Problems and European Peace. N. Buxton and C. L. Leese.............. 395
Battle of Jutland, The. C. Bellairs............ 677
Beaumarchais and the War of American Independence. E. S. Kite 436
Bedouins. J. Huneker........................ 370
Before and Now. A. Harrison................ 600
Belgium: A Personal Narrative. B. Whitlock.. 285
Bertram Cope's Year. H. B. Fuller............ 394
Best Short Stories of 1919 compiled by E. O'Brien 463
Bibliography and Methods of English Literary History. T. P. Cross................... 17
Bibliography of Wordsworth. C. M. St. John.. 209
Birth of God, The. V. von Heidenstam........ 609
Black Drops, The. A. Brown.................. 36
Blower of Bubbles, The. A. B. Baxter........ 363
Board Walk, The. M. Widdemer............. 363
Book of a Naturalist, The. W. H. Hudson...... 112
Book of R. L. S. G. E. Brown................ 436
Book of the Damned. C. Fort................. 184
Broome Street Straws. R. C. Halliday........ 88
Builders, The. E. Glasgow.................... 36
Bulletin de L'Institut Intermédiaire International. Publication Trimestrielle. Haarlem...... 57
Burgess Bird Book for Children, The. T. W. Burgess 112
Burning Glass, The. M. Bowen................ 463
Burning Secret, The. S. Branch............... 310

CAHIERS Britanniques et Américains. Edited by M. Georges-Bazile 61
Call of the Soil, The. A. Bertrand............ 257
Carrington's of High Hill, The. M. Harland.... 183
Century of Hope, The. F. S. Marvin.......... 628
Chill Hours. H. Mackay...................... 605
Chords from Albireo. D. Barney.............. 519
Choruses From Iphigeneia in Aulis and the Hippolytus of Euripides. Translated by H. D. London 33
Clanking of Chains, The. B. MacNamara........ 462
Clemenceau: The Man and His Times. H. M. Hyndman 34
Clergé et La Guerre de 1914, Le. L. Lacroix.. 572
Coat Without a Seam, The. H. G. Cone........ 519
Cobbler of Willow Street, The. G. O'Neil...... 362
Coggin. E. Oldmeadow 310
Collection of Mediaeval and Renaissance Paintings. Edited by Harvard Art Dept........ 160
Contributions to Medical and Biological Research Dedicated to Sir William Olser........... 391
Craft of the Tortoise, The. A. Tassin........... 368
Cream of the Jest, The. J. B. Catell........... 602
Cresting Wave, The. E. B. Morris............ 393
Cross. D. Hankey 112

DEBS: His Authorized Life and Letters. D. Karsner 333
Degradation of the Democratic Dogma, The. H. Adams 255
Descent of Bolshevism. A. Rihani............. 682
Dinant, Eine Denkschrift. Professor Heinrich... 548
Documents on the League of Nations. Compiled by Mrs. C. A. Kluyver................... 577
Dust and Light. J. H. Wheelock............. 33
Dust of New York. K. Bercovici.............. 111

ECONOMIC Consequences of the Peace The J. M. Keynes 155
Ecstasy: A Study of Happiness. L. Couperus.. 85
Edgar Poe: Contes et Poésies. E. Lauvrière.. 657
Education During Adolescence. R. A. Mackie.. 433
Elizabethan Ulster. E. Hamilton.............. 284
En Amérique à la Fin de la Guerre. F. Klein.. 337
Enemy Within, The. S. Johnson............... 283
English Dictionary on Historical Principles. Edited by W. A. Craigie................ 522
English-Speaking Brotherhood and the League of Nations. Sir C. Walston (Waldstein).... 682
Essays on Art. A. Clutton-Brock.............. 576
Etchers and Etching. J. Pennell.............. 87
European Literature in the Centuries of Romance. L. Magnus 209
Evolution of Modern Germany, The. W. H. Dawson 572

FAIRFAX and His Pride. M. Van Vorst..... 393
Father Duffy's Story.................... 160
Field, Forest and Farm. J. H. Fabre.......... 113
Flow of Value, The. L. G. McPherson.......... 282
Forging of the Pikes, The. A. North.......... 463
Foundations of Classic Architecture, The. H. L. Warren 208
French Music of Today. G. Jean-Aubry........ 630
French Revolution, The: A Study in Democracy. N. H. Webster........................ 653
From a Southern Porch. D. Scarborough....... 87
From Friend to Friend. Lady Ritchie.......... 522
From Place to Place. I. S. Cobb.............. 363
From Upton to the Meuse, With the 307th Infantry. W. K. Rainsford.............. 464

GEORGE von Lengerke Meyer, His Life and Public Services. M. A. De W. Howe.... 308
Georgian Poetry, 1918-1919.................... 520
Germany's New War Against America. S. Frost.. 14
Ghosts I Have Seen. V. Tweedale............ 183
Glorieuse Mutilée Usc. Abbé Gosset.......... 522
Golden Whales of California, The. V. Lindsay.. 518
Great Artists and Their Works by Great Authors. Compiled by A. M. Brooks.......... 259
Great Impersonation, The. E. P. Oppenheim.... 210
Guerre et Religion. A. Loisy.................. 572

HANDBOOK of Attic Red-Figured Vases, A. J. C. Hoppin........................ 59
Handbook of Greek Vase Painting, A. M. A. B. Herford 159
Hand-Made Fables. G. Ade.................. 461
Happy Years, The. J. H. Irwin............... 363
Harvest. Mrs. H. Ward...................... 679
Have We a Far Eastern Policy? C. H. Sherrill 655
Health of the Teacher, The. W. E. Chancellor.. 464
Hearts Awake. A. J. Burr.................... 362
Herfsttij der Middeleeuwen. D. J. Huizinga.... 435
Heritage of India, The. J. M. MacPhail........ 61
Heroic Legends of Denmark, The. Axel Olrik... 366
His Majesty's Well-Beloved. Baroness Orczy.... 463
Histoire de Prusse. A. Waddington........... 522
History of France from the Earliest Times to the Peace of Versailles, A. W. S. Davis.. 285
Home Nursing. A. Z. Marsh................. 464
Home, Then What?—The Mind of the Doughboy, A. E. F 311
How I Filmed the War. Lieut. Malins........ 364
How it Can be Told. P. Gibbs................ 394

IBSEN in England. M. A. Franc............ 213
Ideals of America. Prepared for the City Club of Chicago, 1916-1919............ 56
Images. R. Aldington 33
Imperfect Mother, An. J. D. Beresford........654
Impressions that Remained. Memoirs by E. Smyth 182
In the Key of Blue. J. A. Symonds............ 575
Industrial Mexico. P. H. Middleton............ 206
Inscrutable Lovers, The. A. MacFarlan........ 334
Intellectuals and the Wage-Earners, The. H. E. Cory 229
International Waterways. P. M. Ogilvie........ 603
Intervention in Mexico. S. G. Inman........... 206
Introductions. M. Birnbaum.................. 184
Invincible Minnie. E. S. Holding.............. 602
Ireland a Nation. R. Lynd.................... 461
Ireland an Enemy of the Allies? R. C. Escouflaire 676
Irish Impressions. G. K. Chesterton.......... 284
Island of Sheep, The. Cadmus and Harmonia.. 487
Italy from Dante to Tasso. H. B. Cotterill...... 544

JAHR in der Reichskanzlei, Ein. Chancellor Von Hertling 548
Jeremy. H. Waldpole 310
John Archibald Campbell, Associate Justice of the United States Supreme Court, 1853-1861. H. G. Connor........................ 601
John Redmond's Last Years. S. Gwynn........ 390
Judgment of Peace, The. A. Latzko............ 257
Judicial Settlement of Controversies Between States of the American Union. Edited and Collected by J. B. Scott.................. 58

KOREA'S Fight for Freedom. F. A. McKenzie. 545
Kostes Palamas: Life Immovable. Translated by A. E. Phoutrides.............. 309
Künstler-Inventare. A. Bredius................ 574

L'ADMIRAL de Grasse. Canon M. Caron...... 88
Labor and the Common Welfare. S. Gompers 333
Labor Situation in Great Britain and France, The. The Commission on Foreign Inquiry of the National Civic Federation.......... 180
Lamp of Heaven, The. L. W. Smith........... 370
Last and First. J. A. Symonds................ 575
Last Four Months of the War, The. General F. Maurice 627
Latin Poems of the Renaissance. R. Aldington.. 33
Lay of the Cid, translated into English Verse. R. S. Rose and L. Bacon................ 400
Legend. C. Dane............................ 334
Lettres d'un Soldat. E. Lemercier............. 259
Liberalism in America. H. Stearns............ 229
Liberty and the News. W. Lippmann......... 571
Life and Letters of Lady Dorothy Nevill, The. R. Nevill 132
Life of Elizabeth Cary Agassiz. L. A. Paton.... 337
Life of General William Booth The. H. Begbie.. 680
Life of John Marshall, The. A. J. Beveridge.... 204
Ligne, Un. F. Rouvier....................... 572
Lithuanian Village, A. L. Kobrin............. 363
Little Garden the Year Round, A. G. Teall.... 392
Little Theatre Classics, Vol. II. S. A. Eliot, Jr. 608
Livre Pratique des Spirites, Le. M. A. Borgnis.. 437
Lo, and Behold Ye! S. MacManus............ 111
Lore of the Pen. F. Klickmann............... 400
Louisbourg from Its Foundation to Its Fall, 1713-1758. J. S. McLennan 37
Love and Mr. Lewisham. H. G. Wells......... 489
Lover of the Chair. A. S. B. Gass............ 157
Luca Sarto: A Novel. C. S. Brooks.......... 463
Luzumiyat of Abiel-Ala, The. Ameen Rihani.... 17

MADAME Prune. P. Loti.................. 366
Man for the Ages, A. I. Bacheller........ 231
Manchester Grammer School, The. A. A. Mumford 523
Marcus Cornelius Fronto. Translated by C. R. Haines 605
Martyrdom of Man, The. W. Reade........... 629
Mask, The. J. Cournos 231
Mask. G. Middleton 632

PAGE
Maskerade. D. J. van Ammers-Küller.......... 398
Matrix, The. M. T. Davies.......... 463
Maureen P. MacGill.......... 679
Memoirs of the American Academy at Rome, Vol. I. & II..........134, 209
Memorials of Willard Fiske: The Editor. Compiled by H. S. White.......... 657
Memories and Records. J. A. Fisher.......... 654
Michael Forth. M. Johnston.......... 158
Miss Lulu Brett. Z. Gale.......... 394
Modern China. Sih-Gung Cheng.......... 281
Modern Salesmanship. J. G. Frederick.......... 184
Moral Basis of Democracy, The. A. T. Hadley.. 636
More Chapters of Opera. H. Krehbiel.......... 62
Mors et Vita. A. Loisy.......... 572
Mountain Paths. M. Maeterlinck.......... 15
Muddy Jim. E. Berliner.......... 88
Musical Motley, A. E. Newman.......... 62
My Escape from Germany. E. A. Keith.......... 632
My Memoirs. Admiral von Tirpitz.......... 84
My Quarter Century of American Politics. C. Clarke.......... 460
My Recollections. J. Massenet.......... 18
Mystery of Space, The. R. T. Browne.......... 133

NATURAL History of the Child, The. Dr. C. Dunn.......... 688
New Words Self-Defined. C. A. Smith.......... 38
Notre Force Future. J. Dybowski.......... 131

OPEN Vision. H. W. Dresser.......... 631
Opium Monopoly, The. E. H. LaMotte.... 400
Order. C. C. Washburn.......... 393
Our America. Waldo Frank.......... 434
Our Greatest Battle. F. Palmer.......... 627
Outland. M. Austin.......... 158
Outlines of Chinese Art. J. L. Ferguson.......... 16
Outlook for Research and Invention, The. N. M. Hopkins.......... 488
Outspoken Essays. W. R. Inge.......... 396

PAIX des Nations et La Religion de l' Avenir, La. A. Loisy.......... 572
Passage of the Barque Sappho, The. J. E. Patterson.......... 15
Passion: A Human Story. S. Desmond.......... 573
Percolator Papers. E. Hendrick.......... 37
Peter Jameson: A Modern Romance. G. Frankau.......... 573
Peter Kindred. R. Nathan.......... 392
Petit Nord, Le or Annals of a Labrador Harbour. A. Grenfell and K. Spalding..........679
Picture Show. S. Sassoon.......... 520
Pictures of the Floating World. A. Lowell.... 33
Pink Roses. G. Cannan.......... 58
Pirates of the Spring. F. Reid.......... 310
Plot Against Mexico, The. L. J. de Bekker.... 206
Poetry and Dreams. F. C. Prescott.......... 365
Portraits of American Women. G. Bradford.. 60
Position of the Roode en Witte Roos in the Saga of King Richard III., The. O. J. Campbell 437
Power of a God and Other One-Act Plays, The. T. H. Guild.......... 370
Prefaces. Don Marquis.......... 37
Prés des Combattants. M. André Chevrillon.... 184
Private in the Guards, A. S. Graham.......... 232
Proofs of the Truths of Spiritualism. G. Henslow 337
Psychology of Bolshevism, The. J. Spargo.......... 206
Pursuit of Happiness, The. B. R. C. Low.......... 362

QUAKER Singer's Recollections, A. D. Bispham.......... 289
Question of Thrace, The. J. S. Mills and M. G. Crussachi.......... 550

REBELS: Into Anarchy and Out Again. M. Ganz.......... 231
Recreation. E. Grey.......... 518
Red Terror and Green. R. Dawson.......... 600
Representative One-Act Plays by American Authors. M. G. Mayorga.......... 607
Rescue, The. J. Conrad..........604, 629
Responsibility: A Novel. J. E. Agate.......... 573
Revolt: An American Novel. W. H. MacMasters 394
Reynard, The Fox. J. Masefield.......... 33
Road to En-dor, The. E. H. Jones.......... 547
Rudyard Kipling's Verse, Inclusive Ed. 1885-1919 109
Russia, White or Red. O. M. Saylor.......... 135
Russian Pendulum, The. A. Bullard.......... 207
Russian Theatre Under the Revolution. O. M. Sayler.......... 259

SAMARITANS, Their Testimony to the Religion of Israel, The. J. E. H. Thomson.......... 311
Sea Bride, The. B. A. Williams.......... 15
Secret Battle, The. A. P. Herbert.......... 257
Seldwyla Folks: Three Singular Tales. G. Keller.......... 111
Seneca. F. Holland.......... 521
September. F. Swinnerton.......... 85
Seven Who Slept, The. A. K. Porter.......... 609
Shadowy Thresholds. C. Y. Rice.......... 362
Shakespeare and the Makers of Virginia. A W. Ward.......... 311
Ships Across the Sea. R. D. Paine.......... 577
Short History of Belgium, A. L. von der Essen 335
Short Stories from the Balkans. Translated by E. W. Underwood.......... 363
Side of Paradise, This. F. S. Fitzgerald.......... 392
Sigurd, Our Golden Collie. K. S. Bates.......... 135
Silver Age. T. Scott.......... 60
Sir James Murray. H. Bradley.......... 311
Social Plays of Arthur Wing Pinero, The. Edited by C. Hamilton.......... 213
Socialism vs. Civilization. B. Brasol.......... 491
Soldat de France, Un.......... 113
Some Aversions of a Man of Letters. E. Gosse.. 487
Some Questions of Peace and War. W. McDonald 230
Soothsayer, The. V. von Heidenstam.......... 608
Soul of Abraham Lincoln, The. W. E. Barton 366
Soul of Ireland, The. W. J. Lockington.......... 284
Souls Divided. M. Serao.......... 434
Spain's Declining Power in South America. B. Moses.......... 285
Spiritual Voices in Modern Literature. T. H. Davies.......... 160
Starved Rock. E. L. Masters.......... 519
Stolen Lands, The. M. Harrison.......... 364
Storm in a Teacup. E. Phillpotts.......... 207
Story of Milk, The. J. D. Frederickson.......... 184
Story of the Great War, The. W. S. Braithwaite.......... 210
Strategy of the Great War, The. W. L. McPherson.......... 17
Studies in Spanish-American Literature. I. Goldberg.......... 335
Substance of a Dream, The. F. W. Bain.......... 682
Supplementary Diplomatic Documents Published by the American-Hellenic Society.......... 17
Swinburne As I Knew Him. C. Kernahan.......... 576

TALES of My Native Town. G. D'Annunzio.. 435
Tales of Three Hemispheres. Lord Dunsany.......... 111
Talks with T. R. J. L. Leary, Jr.......... 656
Tamarisk Town. S. Kaye-Smith.......... 654
Taming of Nan, The. E. Holdsworth.......... 207
Tauchnitz Edition of British and American Authors.......... 209
Their Son: The Necklace. E. Zamacios.......... 111
Theodore Roosevelt: An Autobiography.......... 255
Thesaurus of English Words and Phrases. P. M. Roget.......... 61
This Giddy World. O. Herford.......... 112
Three Plays. N. Leslie.......... 464
Three Plays from the Argentine. Edited by E. H. Bierstadt.......... 605
Time and Eternity. G. Cannan.......... 489
Treacherous Ground. J. Bojer.......... 520
Turnover of Factory Labor, The. S. H. Schlichter.......... 36
Turnpikes of New England. F. J. Wood.......... 311
Two Men: A Romance of Sussex. A. Ollivant. 207

UNSOLVED Riddle of Social Justice, The. S. Leacock.......... 234
Up and Down. E. F. Benson.......... 257
Up the Mazaruni for Diamonds. W. J. La Varre 547
Up the Seine to the Battlefields. A. B. Dodd.... 681

VIE d' Edgar A. Poe, La. M. A. Fontainas.... 259
Villa Elsa. S. Henry.......... 436
Vital Message. A. C. Doyle.......... 134

W. B. WILSON and the Department of Labor. R. W. Babson.......... 333
Walt Whitman: The Man and his Work. L. Bazalgette.......... 310
White Shadows in the South Seas. F. O'Brien.. 37
Whole Armour of Man, The. C. W. Saleeby.... 258
William Blake, The Man. C. Gardner.......... 181
Within My Horizon. H. Bartlett.......... 548
Woman Triumphant. V. Blasco-Ibañez.......... 520
Woman's Man, A. M. Patterson.......... 132
Wonders of the Colorado Desert. G. W. James.. 61
World of Wonderful Reality, The. E. T. Thurston 132
World Remaking or Peace Finance, A. C. W. Barron.......... 464
Worldlings, The. L. Merrick.......... 183

YANKEE in the British Zone, The. E. C. MacVeagh and L. D. Brown.......... 436
Yanks. A. E. F. Verse.......... 85
Year as a Government Agent, A. V. B. Whitehouse.......... 208
Youth Goes Seeking. O. Graeve.......... 132
Youth of James Whitcomb Riley. M. Dickey.... 159
Youth Riding. M. C. Davies.......... 362

BOOKS AND THE NEWS

AMERICA and England.......... 528
BOYS' Books.......... 138
CANDIDATES, The.......... 340
EDUCATION.......... 188
FRANCE.......... 492
HEALTH.......... 164
LIBRARIES.......... 372
Living Expenses.......... 556
MOTOR Trips.......... 578
NEGRO, The.......... 20
New American Books.......... 443
PRIMARIES.......... 409
Profit-Sharing.......... 40
RECENT Books.......... 214
SEA STORIES.......... 314
Socialism.......... 65
Spiritism.......... 118
Sport.......... 472
THEATRE, The.......... 94
Turkey.......... 266
WILSON, Mr.......... 237
Woman Suffrage.......... 294

BOOKS OF THE WEEK

[Selected by Edmund Lester Pearson, Editor of Publications, New York Public Library]

ALL and Sundry. E. T. Raymond.......... 631
Follow the Little Pictures. A. Graham.... 680
IRISH Case, Before the Court of Public Opinion, The. P. W. Wilson.......... 656
LABOR'S Challenge to the Social Order. J. G. Brooks.......... 604
Letters of Travel. R. Kipling.......... 631
Life of Lord Kitchener. Sir G. Arthur.......... 680
MAINTENANCE of Peace, The. S. C. Vestal. 631
Mrs. Warren's Daughter. Sir H. Johnston 604
PEACE Conference Day by Day, The. C. T. Thompson.......... 680
Port of New York, The. S. C. Vestal.......... 631
SIMSADUS: London; The American Navy in Europe. J. L. Leighton.......... 656
Stranger, The. A. Bullard.......... 656
Swinburne as I Knew Him. C. Kernahan.......... 656
TALKS with T. R., from the Diaries of John J. Leary, Jr.......... 604

MISCELLANEOUS

AMERICAN Insight Into French Literature...548
American Library Association in France.. 402
Anglo-French Review.......... 490
BIBLIOGRAPHY of Whaling Books [New Bedford Library].......... 656
Bibliotheque Plon.......... 657
CLEMENCEAU'S Memoirs.......... 631
DUMAS'S Collaborator's (Auguste Maquet) Title to Fame.......... 577
ECKHOUD, Georges, Dismissal of from Brussels Academy.......... 491
Etudes Italiennes..........285, 490
FRENCH Criticism [Lecomte in Revue des Deux Mondes].......... 657
French Labor Unions and the Stage.......... 548
French Literature (J. G. Fletcher).......... 17
French Notes..........401, 490, 491
HEINE'S "Buch der Lieder".......... 491
Hungary's Intellectual Loss, Due to Being Deprived of Many Cities.......... 682
KEATS Memorial.......... 575
LOEB Library..........366, 605
MERCURE de France.......... 234
NEW Formations of Words [English] from Children's Speech Desired by Prof. Jespersen of Denmark.......... 38
PILGRIM Fathers, History Being Prepared by Dr. A. Eekof.......... 491
"Psycho-Analytic Confession". By Floyd Dell in the Liberator.......... 605
RAMSAY (Sir William), Memorial to.......... 490
Romain Rolland's Visit to Switzerland, Reason for.......... 438
SHAKESPEARE Identified as Edward de Vere (J. T. Looney).......... 464
Shaw Desmond, Personality of.......... 681
Silence, Plea for (Temps).......... 491
Simplified Spelling Abandoned.......... 365
Society for Pure English Founded by Dr. Robert Bridges..........60, 113
Stanton, Elizabeth Cady, Biography of by T. Stanton and Mrs. Stanton-Blatch.......... 632
"TEXT Criticism". By Professor J. A. Scott in the March Classical Journal.......... 632

THE REVIEW

Vol. 2, No. 34 New York, Saturday, January 3, 1920 FIFTEEN CENTS

Contents

Brief Comment 1
Editorial Articles:
The Defense of Property 3
Siberia in Despair 5
A Hopeful Labor Move 6
Those Navy Awards 6
Mrs. Tiffany on the "Social Unit" 7
Slaves of the Machine. By David Harold Colcord 8
The Social Unit at Cincinnati—Is It a Soviet? By Katrina Ely Tiffany 11
Correspondence 13
Book Reviews:
Germany—Misjudged or Found Out? 14
Sea Tales 15
Maeterlinck's "Presences" 15
Chinese Art 16
The Run of the Shelves 17
Drama:
"Mary Broome" at the Neighborhood Playhouse—The Theatre Parisien. By O. W. Firkins 18
Massenet's Memories and Music. By Charles Henry Meltzer 18
Books and the News: The Negro. By Edmund Lester Pearson 20

THEY reckon ill who leave me out—that is Mr. William Jennings Bryan's motto, or ought to be. His sudden emergence into conspicuous notice at Washington is no laughing matter. He probably does not desire to be the Democratic candidate for President, but he certainly has no objection to playing the part of king-maker—or at least king-breaker—as he did in 1912. Never was the time more propitious for him, in one respect. His specialty is the setting-up of "paramount issues," and the woods are full of paramount issues. The cheap dollar is as ready to his hand as the dear dollar was in 1896; there must be some cure-all formula for the labor problem which Mr. Bryan would find no difficulty in framing; the League of Nations is in a sad way—whatever the Senate may be on the point of doing about it—and all for lack of the right prescription from the right doctor; and the good old slogan "let the people rule" might be raised in a dozen new and striking ways. Mr. Bryan is an adept at making choice of slogans, and it will go hard but he will find one that will make him a big power in the Democratic National Convention. But we do not expect to see the cry "He tried to keep us out of war" raised in his behalf; perhaps, however, other people will have something to say about the way he served his country as Secretary of State, and played into the hands of Bernstorff and Dumba.

THE meaning of the latest events in Siberia is not yet plain. A fortnight ago, Kolchak formed a cabinet of the Left, and a policy was announced that proposed to subordinate the military to the civil authority. The object evidently was to fall back upon the Socialist Revolutionaries, but it was grasping at a straw, and indicated weakness. Now, according to the latest reports, what was earlier predicted in the Review has taken place, and Semenov has been appointed Commander-in-Chief. The first implication of this is obvious. The predominant military force in eastern Siberia is Cossack, and Semenov is the chosen Cossack leader. Upon the Cossacks must depend the country's defense.

BUT another conclusion may be drawn. Hitherto Kolchak has been bound by his devotion to the Allies, and they have failed him shamefully in his hour of need. In consequence Russians everywhere have come to view the Allies with suspicion and dislike. Semenov is bound by no promises and has been supported by Japan. He will now be free to make with the Japanese whatever agreements he sees fit. Whether Japan will come to his assistance with troops is problematical, but he undoubtedly counts on their aid. Seemingly it is now too late for this. When they could march in and achieve success by a parade of force, the case was different. Now it means a long and expensive war, and Japan will think twice about entangling herself in such a contest without American participation. She reasons that America would like nothing better than to see her thus entangled, wasting her energies. Still, the threat of approaching Bolshevism may force her to this course. In any case, with money and arms from Japan, Semenov will put up a good fight and probably hold back the Red horde.

THE National Council and the States Council at Berne have both, by a large majority, voted for Switzerland's accession to the League of Nations, a decision which will have to be ratified by a referendum of the electorate. This is not, however, an unconditional approval of the Covenant as drafted in Paris. Although Article I of that document provides for the accession of the once neutral states as original members on condition that they join the League "without reservation," Switzerland has made its entrance dependent on the acceptance of one affecting the tenor of Article XVI. The country does not wish to bind itself to any participation in a military action which the Council might deem necessary to protect the covenants of the League. This restriction, however, is contrary only to the letter of the Covenant, not to its spirit as explained by its makers. When in a conference of these with representatives of neutral countries objections were raised by the latter to the coercive measures contained in Article XVI, Lord Robert Cecil made the reassuring statement that "the economic coercion comes first and is always obligatory for all members, but the military measures, which come in the second place, are not absolutely obligatory. There will be no compulsion to take part in them, although there always remains a moral duty of participation." Besides, Switzerland's right to abstain from any military coöperation is already implied in Article 435 of the Peace Treaty with Germany, which recognizes the validity of the declaration of November 20, 1815, concerning the country's neutral status. The reservation, therefore, is a mere formality, intended to placate that part of the nation which, proud of its independence and devoted to its neutrality, views the League with no little suspicion. One other restriction bears the name reservation with more justice: The country makes its accession conditional on that of the five Great Powers, in other words, it will not join the League unless the United States does so first.

NOW cracks a noble heart—these are the words that best befit the news of Dr. Osler's death. Great physician, wonderful teacher, inspiring comrade and associate, unwearying worker for the general good, promoter to the last of medical progress—all these attributes fail to convey an idea of the man. A gallant and poetic spirit, as full of grace as of strength, he was a centre of light and life in every circle in which he moved. America and England will join in mourning one who adorned and benefited both countries, and whose last years were spent in devoted service for the cause to which both countries gave their best and dearest.

IN this human beehive of New York the poet of "La Vie des Abeilles" seems strangely out of place. The only spot where we could imagine him in his element is the top of the Woolworth building from which, in silent contemplation, he could watch the feverish wooing of Queen Dollar by the giant swarm below. But he has come to woo her himself. The papers give estimates of "the profits accruing to him as a result of his first American tour, in addition to which he will certainly receive augmented royalties on his many books." If he does, he will owe them to those real lovers of the poet who, turning away from this fashionable lecturer in evening dress suit, look for the real Maeterlinck in the works that he wrote. The mystic who gave to the world "Le trésor des humbles" is a different being from this idolized treasure of the proud, this "social lion and lecturer on the immortality of the soul," as the headlines proclaim him. Once he wrote some beautiful pages on the eloquence of silence, a language which will grow dearer to him day after day on his "12,000-mile Coast-to-Coast tour to confront lecture audiences and social welcomers in more than forty cities." There you have the poet's programme in arithmetic. Imagine Thomas à Kempis leaving his cell to read his "Imitatio" before the upper ten of fifteenth-century Paris and London. "The shy Belgian poet" the papers call him, and shy he well may be. The mystic's proper sphere is not the crowd but the solitude, "in angello cum libello," approving the wisdom of the earlier mystic's "ama nesciri."

IT has been obvious from the beginning that no organization of returned soldiers which presumed to set itself up as an "Invisible Empire" and impose its own "100 per cent. Americanism" upon those little groups who were quite intoxicated on something like 2.75 per cent. of the same could hope long to survive. Responsible leaders of the American Legion have reckoned with this danger from the outset. They have not always been able to prevent sporadic outbursts of it. The ex-soldiers have, it is only too true, taken upon themselves here and there to decide that concerts of German music must not be held and that certain sorts of opinion shall not have the privilege of a hall in which to air themselves. This sort of thing must stop. To understand is not to pardon. The American Legion exists, so far as it is not merely a pleasant association of old comrades, to prevent just those things which mob violence—"direct action" in the canting phrase—aims to bring in. A sound strategy d not suggest mob violence on its o part as the most effective step. Franklin D'Olier, the National Co mander, has now put the Legion cially on record—"let us be sure t no overzealous or thoughtless or fair act of our own occur to wea our influence for national betterm or alienate the support of true Am icans." Maintenance of a gove ment under law is not an easy ta It may be confidently hoped that more difficulties will be cast in way of it by those from whom much that is genuinely construc is expected. "Legion," in any of manifestations, must not be allo to get the upper hand of "America

THROUGH the generosity of anonymous donor there has b established the Amherst Memo Fellowship for the study of so economic, and political instituti According to its terms a fellow, a stipend of two thousand dolla year, will be appointed every sec year for a period of not more t four years. Although established perpetuate the memory of those A herst men who gave their lives fo ideal," the fellowship is open to g uates—and not of necessity re graduates—of any college or uni sity, and it is expressly provided at least one member of the commi which awards the Fellowship s have no connection with Amh College. This committee has been formed and is receiving ap cations. A foundation so bro conceived and so generously endo should before very long becom national institution. The fellows should be held by only the very ab of the country's young men, whose native capacity for leaders fortified by the extensive study w the fellowship places within t reach, will put them high am those to whom the world must for guidance in dealing with problems which press so heavily u it. Amherst is to be congratula on receiving into its hands an ins ment so well calculated to give best opportunities to the best mi in this vital department of study.

The Defense of Property

THE Presidential election of 1920, says the New York Tribune in a leading editorial, promises to turn on the issue of private property versus communism. In order to meet this issue, the Tribune declares that what is needed is a campaign of "thorough popular education":

> Private property must face the issue—must prove it is a good thing for all, or else perish . . . Personal ownership is not an end but a means to an end—the supreme end of increasing the sum of human happiness.

"The challenge can be confidently met," says the Tribune, and it plunges boldly into the task. The human family lives not on what has been accumulated, but on what is currently produced. Capital is essential to effective production; "with capital and capitalism gone, and little to divide, what would concurrently happen to the production which is the real meal ticket," and "whence would come the fund for improvements"? The "great works reared under the capitalist régime" would before long be worn out, and then "a further decline in production would occur, with a consequent tightening of all belts." Such is the Tribune's statement of the case for the institution of private property; and the article closes with this fervid exhortation:

> First, production; second, production; third, production—these are the three great arguments capitalism can present. Hammer them, hammer them, hammer them! Americans are intelligent enough, and their perceptions of self-interest keen enough, to see and act on the truth.

There is just enough truth in the idea that the institution of property is in imminent danger to make it well worth while to consider upon what grounds its defense must rest. The requirements of a campaign of "thorough popular education" are far more exacting than our contemporary appears to realize. It is something to point out the indispensable part which capital plays in production, for there are millions among the masses who have no conception even of this elementary truth. But it is far from enough; the teachers of socialism have educated thousands upon this subject far beyond the kindergarten stage, and these will have no difficulty, when the campaign is on, in making the masses understand that the abolition of private ownership of capital does not necessarily mean the extinction of capital itself. A well-organized socialistic or communistic government could systematically provide for the maintenance of capital by a levy upon current production; the great function which has hitherto been performed by the voluntary abstinence and thrift of individuals could quite conceivably be performed by saving exacted and directed by the state. Under this régime production would not suffer that utter collapse which would attend the extinction of capital; the loss it would suffer would come from the substitution of governmental routine for that varied and boundless energy, that alertness of initiative, that constant exercise of quick and accurate judgment, which are the life-blood of production and enterprise under the individualist régime.

To convince a man of all this is not as easy as a sum in arithmetic. But the difficulty can not be evaded by shutting one's eyes to it. Fortunately, however, the plain man is not a fool. He may not clearly realize how great a part is played in production by the energy and ability of those who conduct it under the stimulus of competitive profit—and under the risk of competitive loss—but the idea is by no means foreign to his mind. Probably the greatest obstacle to his full appreciation of it arises from false notions of the share which capital and management get for their service. He will readily enough admit that government would not do the work anything like so well as private initiative does it; but he imagines that the gain to the community is more than swallowed up by the reward that capital and management grasp as their share of the product. He reads the big figures that represent the fortunes of a few multi-millionaires, and he is struck with the luxury and display which are the result of business success. But he makes no calculation of the extremely small percentage of the total annual product which suffices to account for all this. It would not be difficult to make him understand that if the efficiency of production were diminished by ten per cent., this would probably cut deeper into his share than do all the profits of the great capitalists and "captains of industry;" and he would not find it hard to believe that under a communist régime productive efficiency would be impaired by very much more than ten per cent.

But assuming that this fact was driven home into the minds of the masses—itself no mean task—no mistake could be greater than that of supposing that the trouble was thereby disposed of. The feeling that has been stirred up against the existing order of society rests on something more than a calculation of the amount of bread and meat, of clothes and luxuries, that the "plain man" might expect to obtain under a different order. The cold-blooded conclusions of economic arithmetic will not suffice to overcome the passionate longing of those who would shatter the world and "remould it nearer to the heart's desire." If the institution of property is to stand unshaken in the coming decades, it will be not merely because it does more than communism can to fill people's bellies, but because with all its faults, it does more to satisfy their souls.

Socialist dreamers charge the defenders of the existing order with lack of imagination. But it is they themselves who lack imagination. It requires very little imagination to picture a new world in which nobody has to worry about food or clothing, or in which everybody has his flivver and his victrola; even a world in which nobody is trying to get the better of his neighbor, and everybody is doing what is demanded of him for the good of the community. What does require some degree of genuine imagination is to realize what such a world would be in the essentials of human feeling and interest, and what our own world is like in those essentials.

The freeman's life is superior to the slave's, not because he does less work or because he gets more pay; the difference lies in the freedom itself, and in the responsibility that is the correlative of the freedom. It is true that many millions of people, under existing conditions, have little choice as to how they shall earn their living; but each of them has nevertheless the feeling of a freeman. No man, and no government, has ordered him to do what he is doing; and it rests with him to decide whether he shall continue to do it. If there are thousands who fare better, there are also thousands who fare worse; and whether he fares well or ill is his own business and nobody else's. If he has succeeded in keeping his head above water, if he has maintained his family without outside aid, he may justly feel that, in the face of difficulty and temptation, he has done a man's part in the struggle of life. And he has always the spur of hope that his children, like the children of so many of his fellows in like station, will attain a higher place in the struggle. What would the communist régime offer to take the place of all this? The joys of notable achievement—even such standardized joys as there might be of this kind—would, from the nature of things, be for the one man in a hundred; the other ninety-nine would have at most the pale satisfaction of not having forfeited their meal tickets by failure to do the amount of work required of them. Of the chances of better and worse, of the shaping of one's own destiny by the exercise of one's own will, of that kind of personal responsibility which gives strength to character and zest to effort, there would be little left.

So much for those who are near the foot of the ladder, those to whom the existing order shows its worst face. That a large proportion of all the people are in the direct enjoyment of its advantages, the communists constantly forget. To him who has something, though little, the value of what he has is vitally bound up with the idea of property and property rights. The lace curtains and the white marble steps, the piano or the "parlor suite," even the account in the savings bank or the building association, mean to him very much more than the concrete enjoyment of these specific possessions. It is the fact of possession when possession is not a matter of course, and the vague possibilities which such possession implies, that really count. Running water in the house is a wonderful comfort, and a bathroom is a most excellent thing; but when everybody has them—above all when everybody is by law bound to have them—nobody finds in them occasion for so much as a moment's joy. As a destroyer of values, communism would cast fire and flood into the shade. Without resorting to it, we have raised the standard of living so wonderfully that the luxuries—not to speak of the impossibilities—of yesterday are everybody's unthought-of possessions to-day; but while the general level has been so raised, the opportunities for possessions above that level are greater than ever, and the people who rise to them are more numerous than ever.

To the radical intelligentsia, as well as to the ordinary communist agitator, the world appears to consist entirely of millionaires and proletariat; but when things begin to look really serious, the great body that lies between these extremes will make itself known plainly enough. They are not willing to give up all that has meant life to them—property as we know it, the family as we know it, personal independence, personal responsibility, and personal achievement as we know them—on the chance that a world made out of a few theorists' heads will prove a better one. We hear little now about the middle, and a great deal about the two extremes; but it is the middle that makes the world solid now, and that will keep it solid when the test comes. What else accounts for the way in which France has stood shock after shock, revolution after revolution, agitation after agitation, and remained firmly "bourgeois"? The extremest Socialism was familiar to the average Frenchman before our American Socialists were born; Clemenceau himself was an extreme Socialist in his time. But when the pinch comes, it turns out that the peasants with their little farms, and the shopkeepers with their little hoards, and the clerks and doctors and lawyers and engineers and artisans with the places they have won for themselves and their families—in a word, the people with something to lose—are the backbone of the country and say the decisive word.

We are far from wishing to belittle the importance of the issue of productivity. and you can't have high productivity without abundant capital, superior management, and faithful labor. But the point may be overworked. There is danger in identifying "the sum of human happiness" with the aggregate of the material things which are produced by human effort. It is true that if the masses were persuaded that that aggregate could be enormously increased by the abolition of private property, they would probably be impervious to all other considerations; and it is therefore of very great importance that the error of such a view be exposed. But even in the exposing of this error as we have pointed out, it is essential that the "plain man" be treated as an intelligent human being; if you attempt to satisfy his mind by an argument that is fit only for a child, he will soon take your measure, and your last state will be worse than the first. And you will likewise underestimate his intelligence if you think that he is inaccessible to the deeper considerations that belong to the subject. You may convince him that he gets more to eat and to wear than he is likely to get under communism, and yet leave him strongly inclined to see what communism might do for him. "The full market-basket" is a good enough cry in a tariff campaign, but when it comes to the great issues of life, the "plain man," or at all events the plain American, does not like to think of himself as concerned only with his market-basket. Treat him as a man, not a proletarian; as a man to whom "the sum of human happiness" means something more than food to eat and clothes to wear. What we have in mind, however, is not those spiritual or religious or intellectual sources of happiness which are but slightly related to economic institutions; to intrude these into the discussion would be, to the plain man's mind, to draw a herring across the trail. But he will grant readily enough that the sum of the happiness that men enjoy through the acquisition of material things depends not merely on their gross quantity but quite as much on the conditions upon which they are acquired; and he is fully capable of understanding that the chance of success and the danger of failure, the necessity of self-reliance, the splendid returns which stimulate enterprise and reward sagacity or talent—that these things justify the institution of property not only because they make for an increase in the total of our material possessions, but even more because the enjoyment of those possessions is infinitely greater than it could be under a system in which they were rationed out to us by a governmental machine.

Siberia in Despair

A YEAR of heartrending struggle against overwhelming odds to deliver one's native land from the most bloody and cruel alien tyranny known in history, and then failure through default of promised aid—such is the tragic story of Kolchak's defeat. When, on November 18, 1918, Admiral Kolchak took up his unsought task, it was in the face of difficulties before which a less resolute and devoted man would have quailed. An army had to be raised instantly from the sparse and scattered population of a vast continent, and supplied from a country without industry. This army had at once to be pitted against three times its number of Red troops, equipped from the great reserves of arms and munitions left from the great war, and led in many cases by German officers. Thanks to the enthusiasm and self-sacrifice of the Siberian peasants, this undertaking was successfully accomplished.

But these were not Kolchak's only difficulties. Some sort of civil administration had to be restored throughout regions where seven months of Soviet misrule and license had destroyed all civil institutions and left disorder and chaos. Criminal bands of Commissars and their henchmen, driven out of the towns, roamed the forests, made brigand attacks upon villages, and threatened at numerous points the tenuous line of railroad that was his one means of communication with the outside world. American forces in Vladivostok, through an incomprehensible misunderstanding of the situation, encouraged disunion and disaffection, instead of giving aid to the building up of a unified Russian state. The Japanese likewise seemed to think that their interests were subserved by keeping Siberia weak and encouraging independent Cossack bands to flout the authority of the central Government. The financial situation was desperate, and a dozen varieties of hopelessly depreciated currency flooded the country. Speculation was rife, grafters abounded, and force was lacking to bring them to account. Reactionaries on the one hand sought to make of Kolchak's Government a means of restoring Tsarism, while on the other, Socialist Revolutionaries thought the time opportune to realize their impracticable theories.

Cunning and unscrupulous Bolshevist propagandists undertook to undermine Kolchak in Europe and America, representing him as a tyrant and usurper, and attributing to him Tsarist aims. But he gave them no heed and pursued his task with unfailing courage. A patriot and a liberal, he steered a middle course between reaction and radicalism, faithful to his pledge to restore his country and leave its future government to the decision of a freely-elected Constituent Assembly. How effective the Bolshevist propagandists were in misleading and alienating the Allies, and particularly America, can not now be told; but after inexcusable delay, the Council at Paris satisfied themselves of Kolchak's good faith and of the necessity of supporting the loyal Russians against the common enemy. On June 12, Lloyd George, Wilson, Clemenceau, Orlando and Makino joined in sending him the following telegram:

> The Allied and Associated Powers wish to acknowledge the receipt of Admiral Kolchak's reply to their note of May 26th. They welcome the terms of that reply. It seems to them to be in substantial agreement with the propositions which they had made and to contain satisfactory assurances for the freedom, self-government, and peace of the Russian people and their neighbors. They are therefore willing to extend to Admiral Kolchak and his associates the support set forth in their original letter.

This support was "to assist the Government of Admiral Kolchak and his associates with munitions, supplies, and food, to establish themselves as the Government of all Russia." But the pledge was not kept. Instead, Ambassador Morris at Tokio was sent to Omsk to investigate further and report. More delay, while the lives of millions hung in the balance and our own good faith before the Russia of the future was at stake. Finally Morris reported in favor of keeping our word, but we delayed further, and it was too late.

Many reasons have been alleged as the causes of Kolchak's collapse. Undoubtedly many factors were working against him—popular discontent from hope deferred, dissension among officers and civil authorities, high-handed conduct on the part of the military, speculation and graft, insurrection in the rear. But all these were trivial compared with the one great cause—lack of supplies. The men were there, and the will to fight was there, but flesh and blood could not stand against shot and shell. Well-nigh bare-handed, his soldiers had to stand the onslaughts of the fully armed and equipped hordes that poured in upon them. When Kolchak's brave troops took Perm, over four thousand had their feet frozen. The spring thaw found them without boots. Step by step they had to retire because they had nothing with which to fight on.

And now another chapter in the tragic drama has closed. It curdles one's blood to think of hapless West Siberia, subjected to the exactions and blood-lust of the Soviet armies. But Russia has ever been greatest in misfortune and defeat, and has gloried in the gospel of suffering and sacrifice. In the years to come, the heroic if unavailing struggle in Siberia will be a cherished tradition of Russia, and Kolchak a symbol of patriotism and devotion.

A Hopeful Labor Move

HUMAN fellowship in industry may be either an empty phrase or a living fact. There is no magic formula.

Pending the growth of better relationships between employers and employees, the practical approach to the problem is to devise a method of preventing or retarding conflicts by providing machinery.

In these two passages from the introduction to the plan drawn up by the new Industrial Conference at Washington is to be found the keynote of the proposal it has laid before the country. The Conference recognizes that a vital improvement is necessary in the relations between employers and employed; but it recognizes just as clearly that that improvement can not be brought about either by governmental edict or by the formal adoption of any abstract principle. It must be the matured fruit of prolonged and varied effort, and can not be purchased at the easy price of a conference resolution, however ingeniously worded. What this very conference may yet do to encourage and promote this process by throwing light directly upon its problems and difficulties remains to be seen. What it has done is to offer a comprehensive, and to our mind, an extremely hopeful, plan for lessening those evils which cry out for immediate remedy.

The outstanding feature of the Conference plan for the settlement of industrial disputes is that, while it wholly avoids compulsion, it creates a situation in which resort to its machinery will in almost every instance be inevitable. We must be prepared to find that objection will be made, both from the employers' side and from the employees' side, to the precise character of that machinery. But at every point there is the clearest evidence that care has been taken to reduce the grounds of objection to a minimum.

Thus the method by which the two sides to a dispute shall select their representatives upon a Regional Board of Adjustment is not prescribed, but is to be determined by "the rules and regulations to be laid down by the National Industrial Tribunal for the purpose of insuring free and prompt choice of the representatives." The thorny questions of labor representation are thus left for full consideration, not by a haphazard or emergency body, but by nine men appointed for a term of years by the President, subject to confirmation by the Senate. Unless we throw up the job in despair, unless we are content to suffer the present anarchic conditions to continue unabated, we must begin with authority somewhere, and it does not seem possible to get a better source of authority than that proposed. The Tribunal is to consist of three members representing the employers of the country, who shall be appointed upon nomination of the Secretary of Commerce, three representing employees, who shall be appointed upon nomination of the Secretary of Labor, and three representing the general interests of the public.

How completely the element of compulsion is absent may best be seen in the fact that not only does the final decision of a dispute—in default, of course, of a unanimous verdict by the Regional Board, upon which both sides are represented—rest with the National Tribunal, but that Tribunal itself can render no decision except by unanimous vote. When unanimity is not attained, majority and minority reports are required to be made by the Tribunal. The obvious objection that under these conditions the most difficult cases will be likely to be left undecided, has without doubt been fully taken into account by the framers of the plan. The answer to it is, first, that in a plan which seeks to persuade, and not to compel, it is essential that both parties shall feel that they are in no danger of suffering injustice; and secondly, that even though a decision be not arrived at, the light thrown upon the dispute by the searching process of inquiry and judgment to which it had been subjected will be a most powerful agent in bringing about its settlement.

To appreciate the merit of the plan, we must keep steadily in mind the fact that in any great labor dispute the dominating force lies neither in the resources of the employers nor in the organization of the employees, but in the power of public opinion, provided only that that power is brought effectively to bear. The great trouble is that during the long period in which public opinion is blindly groping its way, and in the further long period that is required to focus it upon the controversy, there is suffered an appalling economic waste and there is bred a vast amount of misunderstanding and bitterness. The most important function of the elaborate and yet not complicated machinery of the Conference plan is to give to public opinion both the guidance and the leverage which it now lacks. The plan may need modification; but in its essentials it seems admirably calculated to reduce to a small fraction of its present dimensions the evil of those industrial conflicts which so profoundly threaten the general welfare, and with which thus far the nation has vainly endeavored to grapple.

Those Navy Awards

HAVING characteristically blundered into a bad mess on the Navy honors, Secretary Daniels, with equally characteristic candor, seeks to make amends by reconsidering the whole matter. It is the proper solution. Admiral Sims's sailor-like letter and action have done their work. And the Navy has also spoken emphatically in the persons of Admirals Mayo, Jones, and Wilson, and Captain Hasbrouck, who honorably declines to receive a high award for the ill-luck of losing his ship. The controversy is in a way to be adjusted, and before it finally passes we have only to note the paradox that the statesman who for seven years has ruled the American Navy still reasons like a landsman and a sentimentalist.

Secretary Daniels was grieved because only twenty-two per cent. of recommendations were made by the special board from the personnel of fighting ships in the war zone. Considering the very few fighting ships that were in action at all, considering also the impossibility of getting a standup fight with a "sub," any Navy man knows that the fighting ships were generously treated with one recommendation out of five. The Navy's task was mostly preventive guard duty, mine-laying and sweeping, and transportation — routine work of a highly technical order. Twenty men were in such routine services for one even remotely and contingently concerned with fighting. For the Navy it was emphatically a staff and not a line war. The men whose organizing capacity made the anti-submarine patrol and the mine barrage effective, the men whose brains conceived our successful convoy system and whose vigilance carried it out—those men, whether they worked afloat or ashore—at Washington, Pelham Bay, St. Nazaire, or Scapa—deserve the high awards.

For the very reason that, even under peace conditions, Navy men incur constant risk, they are especially scrupulous on the point of recognition for gallantry. Every year sees thousands of acts of personal heroism promptly and finally rewarded with a "Good work!" from the officer or petty officer in charge. Then well-meaning Secretary Daniels comes along and rules that the officers and crews who have been torpedoed have all "rendered distinguished service" and are entitled to medals. At best they are entitled to sympathy for a bad luck that may have been unpreventable. Such awards were simply an affront to the hundreds of vessels of the destroyer-and-patrol flotillas which, without the luck of getting into action, maintained such vigilance in submarine-infested waters that the "tin fish" dared molest neither the guard boats nor the convoy.

However, Navy people are generous, and little inclined to judge overharshly the unwitting offenses of blundering benevolence. They will appreciate the promptness with which Secretary Daniels has reopened his versatile mind, and they will hope for awards based on achievement and not on sentiment—honors in which commanding officers may find their authority sustained and their superior facilities for judgment duly considered.

Mrs. Tiffany on the "Social Unit"

We print on another page a defense of the "Social Unit" experiment against the charge of Soviet tendencies brought by the Mayor of Cincinnati and others. The writer, Mrs. Charles L. Tiffany, regards the system as wholly opposed to that of the Soviet, since "its philosophy is based upon the conception that the collective intelligence of the whole community—not any section or part—so organized that it can continuously express itself, is to be relied upon as against the will or intelligence of any individual, group, or class." There is of course no valid objection to the working together for common ends of the entire population of any territory small enough to make such unified action feasible and effective. At various times and places definite and temporary problems have stirred communities to action of this nature, but such simple organization as has resulted from immediate need has passed out of existence when the need has been adequately met. The difference between this wholly spontaneous action and the "Social Unit" system now under discussion is that the latter does not originate by spontaneous evolution within the individual community, but comes through propaganda from without, and aims to become a permanent institution. These considerations call for a careful study of possible tendencies and purposes before thoughtful men and women are warranted in giving unqualified support to the movement.

In Mrs. Tiffany's view, any resemblance of the Social Unit to the Soviet is superficial and unimportant, and will apply equally to various other forms of collective action which pass without challenge. In an article in the Survey, however, a few weeks ago, Dr. Edward T. Devine, writing as a friend of the system, says:

> In view of the profound faith which the founders of the Social Unit plan have in the principle of democracy as embodied in the plan, it is evident that, in the opinion of those who are most competent to predict, the successful spread of the Social Unit plan and the general acceptance of its philosophy would provide a substitute, not only for existing municipal departments and government, but also for voluntary social agencies.

Dr. Devine hastens to add that we are not to infer from this that those interested in the Social Unit would expect such a culmination in the near future. But its founders have not denied, he admits, that they regard it as a potential substitute for existing political government. All this being admitted, there is no escape from the conclusion that Social Units brought into being through the agency of the National Social Unit Organization will be channels of propaganda, more or less active according to circumstances and official personnel, for a radical change from our system of government. Of course such propaganda would be indirect and without official sanction, but it would be hardly less effective on this account, and certainly no easier to combat. We do not mean by this that propaganda for radical changes in our government is necessarily wrong in itself. But when people who are thoroughly opposed to changes in a certain direction are asked to support, on considerations of another nature, a movement whose leaders are evidently favorable to such changes, their answer must take into consideration not merely the good which the movement offers, but the evil which it may possibly promote. Before giving the "Social Unit" our approval we should prefer to see it tried by a community acting spontaneously and wholly unconnected with the National Social Unit Organization.

THE REVIEW

A weekly journal of political and general discussion

Published by
THE NATIONAL WEEKLY CORPORATION
140 Nassau Street, New York
FABIAN FRANKLIN, President
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER, Treasurer

RODMAN GILDER, Business Manager

Subscription price, five dollars a year in advance. Fifteen cents a copy. Foreign postage, one dollar extra; Canadian postage, fifty cents extra. Foreign subscriptions may be sent to Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons, Ltd., 24, Bedford St., Strand, London, W. C. 2, England.
Copyright, 1919, in the United States of America
Editors
FABIAN FRANKLIN
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER

Slaves of the Machine

PITTSBURGH has been called the industrial barometer of the world. It is the first manufacturing centre to feel the change in status of any temporary equilibrium that may obtain in the financial market albeit the disturbance is scarcely noticeable at the source. Hiram Smith in North Dakota decides to restrict his acreage of wheat to 85 per cent. of last year's crop, deciding at the same time to get along with his old tractors and harvesters for another year, which would have been impossible with a full acreage. Which means that Chicago and Detroit will need less steel billets, cast iron, tool, and sheet steel—that is, if all the Hiram Smiths feel the same way about the wheat. Hiram Smith, as unconscious of the fact as a spring breeze, is in his way counting out the number of bituminous cinders and graphite flakes that will glitter each morning on our spare bedroom carpet here under the shadow of the Bessemer converters.

By the same token Hiram, and his like, decide whether the employment manager at the Edgar Thompson Works of the Carnegie Steel Company can hire Emanuel Swakoski when he applies this morning for a job. The employment manager hires because a particular foreman has sent a "call slip" to the employment office conveying information that he needs four laborers. The foreman has had instructions from the open hearth superintendent to build another fire. The superintendent has a typewritten letter from the general superintendent of the mill to increase his tonnage to a set figure. The general superintendent has an order from the city office for a specific assignment of cold rolled steel. The general office is bound by contract to deliver to a manufacturer of electric motors and generators a certain amount of steel according to certain specifications on a certain date. The electric manufacturer is also bound by contract to deliver to the sugar refineries of Cuba ten turbo-generator units on a certain date, because Borelle Sancho, Hiram Smith's southern brother, has decided to do thus and so in the matter of sugar-cane production. Furthermore, Borelle understands that my thrifty wife will take advantage of the abundant peach crop and fill all available jars with peaches—and sugar. So that when Emanuel Swakoski applies for a job at the employment gate that I see in the smoky valley below me—his chances are hardly dependent on the whim of some imaginary Steel Baron.

That is the normal barometric condition of the Pittsburgh district—the way the winds blew and the yellow smoke hung like a fog or vanished into thin air—before 1914. Soon after 1914, our barometer burst and the industrial humidity here has been immeasurable; when the sun shines—or better, when it is hidden by smoke—it wasn't necessary to hunt up the weather man to learn the fact. Hiram Smith has quit dictating to us. Emanuel Swakoski took Hiram's place and the old order changed. Emanuel decided that he would work, and this is the man that has been milking the cow with crumpled horn ever since. Now, since September 22, 1919, Emanuel Swakoski, hardly unconscious of his power, is playing poker in the back lot, and our spare bedroom carpet is unusually free from sparkling graphite. The "Koskis" are on a strike and Hiram in South Dakota, Borelle in Cuba, and my wife await their pleasure. We are eating our peaches—cheaper than canning them at the present price of sugar!

Pittsburgh is still the industrial barometer of the world—but we have a brand new weather man—Mr. Common Labor.

My family household furnishes a clear analogy of what is going on outside. The industrial world keeps house on the same fundamental basis. In normal times my thrifty wife puts as many loaves of bread in the oven as there will be mouths to fill at the table on the days following. If we anticipate visitors, she gets a little more flour, prepares extra pans, and utilizes the entire oven—baking six loaves instead of four. Thus there is an ensuing period of domestic felicity and everybody is happy. Supposing the situation were reversed and that the number of loaves placed in the oven were measured in terms of her personal attitude toward the eaters at our table. Suppose she should cultivate a philosophy of "Why should I bake and the others eat?" and conduct herself accordingly, what a mess my home would be in! That is just where we are to-day in our industrial households in Pittsburgh—Emanuel Swakoski questions the Providence that has placed him at the furnaces instead of in the front office with the typewriters and brass cuspidors.

I hardly meant to draw my analogy between Emanuel and the housewife too close—both are a little sensitive, but what I mean is that the man that pours the heat in the giant steel mills of the Pittsburgh district is as close to our national economic well-being as the woman in the home is responsible for our domestic happiness. We can no more endure to depend on the whims of the steel worker for our steel rails and boiler plate than we can on the notions of our wives for our suppers. The world must be fed three times a day and our national life-blood needs iron. Regardless of the competing claims of the Steel Corporation and the American Federation of Labor as to the rights of property and capital and the principle of "self-determination"—the fact stands unmodified by circumstances that the future of our economic life rests on unlimited production of steel. For months the ice that has been supporting our giant industrial organizations has been getting perilously thin and, unless labor ceases to rap at the weak spots on the pond, the whole structure will go down with a crash.

What does labor want? The steel situation furnishes perhaps the most typical case from which to draw an inference. If the demands were alike in the thousand and one strikes that are incipient from Seattle to Boston it would be far easier to answer that question and consequently easier to find a remedy that would make it possible to put our houses in order; but every organized body of strikers has its own pet grievance. Only the most radical insist that the underlying trouble is low wages and long hours. The forty-eight-hour week is practically universal and even in the steel mills, where men are working the twelve-hour shift, they themselves desire the opportunity to earn the extra wages for overtime. They do not want a straight eight-hour day; they want to work twelve hours on an eight-hour rate, with time and a half for overtime and double time for Sundays and holidays. Granting that the men object seriously to the 12-hour shift in the steel mill, labor is so scarce in Pittsburgh's allied industries working the 48-hour week that they can procure 48-hour jobs for the asking.

Is it more wages? Yes, we all are unsatisfied with our income, even the executive at $10,000 a year. That is natural. But it is my firm conviction that 10 per cent increases each month from now on until the millennium would only provoke continued discontent and unrest. Contrary to the wild statements of agitators imported from without, who have little concern for or understanding of our peculiar needs, the steel workers and especially the common laborers are well paid —better than ever before in their lives, and their standard of living is far higher than their fathers or grandfathers ever knew. And that is as it should be!

They are well fed, a dinner consisting of the best boiling piece of beef in the market, baked beans, hot biscuit, green corn, and peach pie—and in abundance. The largest foreign boarding house in my neighborhood served that menu last evening. Some of them drive medium-priced cars. The banks in the Pittsburgh district state that the average savings account of the foreigner laboring in the steel mills is $300. Jewelers claim this is an exceptional year because of foreign-born customers. At Braddock, the home of a large steel plant, I counted fifty-two foreigners last Sunday evening at the station platform waiting to take the Baltimore and Ohio to New York, and they were going to spend their vacations in Southern Europe. Yet as I write, with the glare of huge converters intermittently giving our hill daylight and then darkness, I can see thousands of restless, discontented dark forms crowding the narrow streets in the valley below. They are steel workers of foreign extraction out on a strike. Their objective, according to the statement of their representative, is to force Judge Gary to recognize the principle of collective bargaining that industrial oppression may cease. The spectacle is no longer novel; almost every industrial community has been or is infected with the same malady, but the present steel strike, because of the diversity of industries affected, is typical of our whole industrial discontent.

If it isn't fundamentally wages and hours, what is it they want? Specifically, they demand of Judge Gary the right of collective bargaining; he denies it—there is the irresistible force meeting the immovable body. But collective bargaining for what? Shorter hours? More wages? I think not. Representation in the management? Yes, but they already hold 25,000 shares of the company's stock and have the privilege of buying the balance at any time they have the price. I am neither defending nor accusing either party, the laboring men or the Steel Corporation; if they could settle their quarrel in their own home without affecting the innocent bystander, well and good—leave them alone, but they never can—you and I and every other man must suffer, and somebody must come along with a solution, or we perish. I am positive, however, that the written grievances of labor, not only in Pittsburgh but over the entire country, are merely symptoms of a deeper spiritual unrest that is energizing the strike.

Two years ago I happened to be working in a munition factory where the men employed were making unheard-of wages. Five hundred dollars a month was not an uncommon wage for a machinist who had in the prewar days been averaging something like a hundred and twenty-five dollars a month for the same class of work. Of course, living was high, but not accordingly. The work was hard, but the hours were reasonably short. Yet with this unheard-of compensation for semi-skilled labor, these men were as restless as weathervanes in a March wind. The labor turnover in that factory was as high as 65 per cent. The men were decidedly discontented.

Ten years before this, I worked with a crew of five men on a large farm in the Middle West. We received $1.50 a day, and worked at the hardest kind of labor from 6 a. m. until 7 p. m. But these farm hands "stuck" the entire season, and four of them were back the next year. They were the best-feeling crowd of men that I have ever known, and were as happy and contented as men can hope to be.

What is there in the nature of the present-day industrial employment that has bred such universal restlessness and discontent? The demand for higher wages, for shorter hours, for improved working conditions, a share in the management and all of the other exciting causes of strikes and labor disturbances are only symptoms of a deeper industrial malady which the highest wages and the shortest hours may relieve but fail to cure. The munition workers bought bungalows, touring cars, and diamonds. But they, like a million workers of to-day, were sick at heart. They were dissatisfied—but why? There is but one answer. Our social unrest is a disease of the soul and not of the pocketbook. Our workingmen are sick of the monotony of machine labor.

The hopeless monotony in doing the same thing hour after hour and day after day corrodes and smothers "that little spark of celestial fire" in every man, until the pressure becomes too great, and it bursts into flame. No one is to blame—the man at the loom and the lathe to-day is not the slave to any man or group of men. He is well paid, and he enjoys the benefit in the saving effected by machine production in the price he pays for his living. The fact that industry has become so specialized that his entire day is confined to one task can not be laid at the door of any one class of men. The twentieth century is the responsible party, if there is one. World necessity has produced the machine and specialization, and the ennui and spiritual sickness, discontent, and revolt are the natural consequence of our attempt to realize nineteenth century ideals in a twentieth century world. A man who works with his hands to-day is dominated by the God of the Machine, and whether ownership and control are vested in the man that works at the machine or in the man that distributes its product and finances its operation is of little consequence. Millions to-day are watching the clock—waiting for the whistle to relieve them from a task of hopeless drudgery—doing a work that must be done that men may be fed, clothed, and housed—someone else would have to do it if they didn't—nevertheless such labor takes its toll in the spirits and souls of men.

Millions find their day's work such. We live in an age of specialization and machine production and the heroes of to-day and to-morrow are not men, but dynamos, motors, steam turbines, automatic machines, giant cranes, looms, lathes, tractors, gang saws, and other countless devices that wear out men and save time and money.

A chosen few are selected by Destiny to sit in the seats of the mighty to plan, to conceive, to fashion ideas, and to create; and this small group have by virtue of their brains been blessed with the secret of happiness—they have the opportunity to indulge their instinct in creative activity. Theirs is the fascinating end of the world's work. It is their ideas that the remainder of mankind must carry out—must serve masters of iron and steel that other minds have fashioned, and serve with little interest. The realization of this fact drives men mad.

War brought freedom of thought and action; new faces, lands, work, duties, interests, values; and now that it is over, men return to the order of the day with a keener distaste for the monotony of machine labor.

But what are you going to do about it? Shall we destroy our men with great intellects, burn our factories, tear down line-shafting and machines, and revert to the hand labor of two centuries ago? The world would starve in a month.

Your great-grandfather was a shoemaker, made shoes by hand and worked from 6 a. m. until 9 p. m. He was his own boss—a glorious estate? Had he the leisure, convenience, comforts, luxuries, and privileges that we enjoy? The aspirations you have for your children—those aspirations that are within your reach—that shoemaker never dreamed of. The good old days like distant sails seem whitest.

My grandfather owned a forest of pine timber, and he and his two sons cut the entire lot by hand in three years, hauled the logs to the river, drove them in the spring floods to the saw mill one hundred miles distant, walked home, and after the whole job was done and nothing remained but a barren waste of stumpage, they received for their timber delivered an equivalent of one dollar apiece for their labor. They furnished the land and the capital, the market was wide open and they were not compelled to sell. Here was none of the evils of modern industrialism—but they lived on mush and milk for two long winters.

It is possible to multiply instances indefinitely. Machine work is no worse than cradling wheat, than raising a barn of crude timbers, than husking corn, hoeing potatoes, stitching broadcloth, hammering brass or grinding knives. We can not step backward and claim the past as an improvement over the present.

For the man whose work is necessarily uninteresting, there is but one solution, provided he has taken careful stock of his capabilities and possibilities and finds that he must remain where he is, and that is to create a permanent interest outside of the shop doing the thing that he likes to do best. There are but a few who find their work so absorbing that it satisfies. In fact, history is filled with men who have become famous not because of their vocation, but because of their "outside" interest. The discontented man is not discontented because of what he does, but because he doesn't know what to do with his surplus time, so that after several rounds of the movies, a plate of ice cream, and a jazz selection on the phonograph, his store of amusements is exhausted. It isn't the eight hours at the machine that makes the anarchist; it's the eight hours of idleness. The men that succeed in finding the blue bird of happiness capitalize these hours of rest—not at work, perhaps, but at something essentially satisfying. The Prince of Peace was a carpenter by trade—and more. Washington was a surveyor; Andrew Carnegie, a captain of industry—and a writer, and Theodore Roosevelt, a statesman and a naturalist.

Man's first duty is to provide food, clothing, and shelter for his family. The twentieth century man sacrifices but eight hours of the twenty-four for these. Let him call the first eight hours a sacrifice of time and interest, and find satisfaction for the desire of his soul in the other eight. He should be honest, play square with his employer, give a full eight hours of labor; but get enough fun out of the other eight that when he reports for work each day he is ready to give his part to the world's work, and give it gladly. He should get a hobby and ride it until it gets stale, and then get another one. Two-thirds of the day, three-fifths of the week, two hundred and nineteen days of the year are his to spend as he pleases. The machine has given him this; no other generation since time began has the leisure he has.

In my daily observation of thousands and thousands of men who work in the mills, I have been impressed with one fundamental fact—that the spiritual hopelessness written on the countenances of so many; the lines on their drawn faces and the lack-lustre eyes do not indicate the physical fatigue that one is apt on brief acquaintance to pronounce the cause. The men to-day are not driven—far from it; they are salved, and petted, and coaxed to an unheard-of degree. A foreman's first instruction is to keep his men on the job, and every means is taken to make the conditions surrounding him at his work as wholesome and pleasant as possible. But the new era has put personality in a steel niche, and it must stay put, else large-scale production is impossible. The strikers on our streets to-day are men entering a blind protest against a system that has taken the fun and romance out of their work, even though it has brought them a standard of living superior to the days of individualism. The same spirit drove our forefathers out upon an unknown sea in search of a new home in a new land. The same spirit that forced our immediate ancestors across the Western plains into the Great West; that founded Cripple Creek, and Dawson City, a spirit of romance inherent in the human race, common to Slav and Teuton, Greek and English, that protests against the Machine.

Practically, the industrial salvation of the United States rests on the reëstablishment of the normal order of supply and demand as a determinant for production and employment. It is the only safe method in commerce, and our continued prosperity as a democratic country depends upon an unhampered functioning of natural economic forces. Government regulation is necessary, but deliberative interference either by capital or labor is dangerous. Labor to-day holds the trumps, and unless it plays them for the common weal we are lost. Some plan must be found whereby men may become interested in their day's work—this is fundamental. It is a twentieth-century problem, and history gives us no clue to the solution.

DAVID HAROLD COLCORD

The Social Unit at Cincinnati—Is It a Soviet?

THE advertising manager of a great public utilities corporation, an enthusiast about the Social Unit plan, was discussing it the other day with the city editor of a New York daily. The latter repeated the charge made against the Social Unit last spring by Cincinnati's mayor. "It is a soviet," he said. The advertising man retorted quickly, "On the contrary, it is quite different. A soviet is formed in a neighborhood to separate the classes, the Social Unit is formed in a neighborhood to get the classes to work together."

This charge by Cincinnati's mayor, occasionally repeated since, is a very superficial one. There is a slight resemblance between the form of organization of the Social Unit and that of the Russian soviet. There is an equal similarity between it and the plans of the National Guilds in England. On the other hand, it has quite as noticeable a resemblance to the New England Town Meetings. Moreover, if all organizations are to be condemned which bear this outward and superficial resemblance to the soviet, or some other form of organization distrusted in America, we should have completely to reorganize our social life. The village governments of many of our small towns are similar in organization to the rural soviets. The Chambers of Commerce of our cities might be lightly referred to as soviets of business men, and the shop committee being introduced into many forward-looking business concerns in America with equal accuracy as "workingmen's councils." That the application of such a title to these movements would of itself affect their character is absurd. They must be judged, not by some superficial similarity to this movement or that, but by their spirit, their purpose, and the function which they are performing in relation to American life. This is the way in which the Social Unit must be judged. The questions which thoughtful people will ask are: "What is the philosophy underlying this plan? How is it being applied? Does it meet a need in American democracy? What have been its results thus far?"

The Social Unit philosophy is distinctly not the Bolshevist philosophy, which I understand to be based upon the Marxian conception of the class struggle leading to the establishment of a dictatorship of the proletariat. The Social Unit has no a priori social, political, or economic programme. Its philosophy is based upon the conception that the collective intelligence of the whole community—not any one section or part—so organized that it can continuously express itself, is to be relied upon as against the will or intelligence of any individual, group, or class. This platform of principles has been published again and again in official statements issued by the National Social Unit Organization, and a study of the Social Unit plan of Community Organization, and of the experimental application of that plan in a section of Cincinnati, shows how consistently that philosophy has been put into action.

In the Mohawk-Brighton district—the first Social Unit—the whole population has been divided into "blocks" or units of about 100 families. Each of these blocks has an elected "Council" of seven members who in turn select a representative to sit on the central Citizens' Council, which is a sort of neighborhood legislature.

All men and women over eighteen years of age are eligible to vote in the election of the block councils. Residence in the block is the only requirement, and proportional representation is used in order to give a voice to the minority. Surely this is all in the spirit of the Declaration of Independence, the Bill of Rights, and the Old Fashioned Town Meeting—direct democracy.

In addition to this "Citizens' Council," which, inasmuch as it represents the entire population, is always the more powerful body, there is an "Occupational Council," made up of the elected representatives of those groups which serve the community in some special capacity. Theoretically there is no limit to what groups may organize as part of this council. Any group may join the body through its elected representatives. Actually the groups which have been formed in the Mohawk-Brighton district are those for whose services the people have felt a special and immediate need—physicians and nurses to help them plan a community health programme; social workers to help remedy flagrant community evils; teachers, recreational workers, and ministers. The district hopes to organize this year a trades-union group and a businessmen's group. This has not yet been done, although a businessman and a trade-unionist are regularly called into the deliberations of the Councils.

It should be noticed that these occupational groups are organized not on the basis of representation, primarily, but upon the basis of rendering efficient community service. Whatever programmes they devise must, before they are foisted upon the community, bear the analysis of the Citizens' Council, that intimate organization of all the people in all the blocks. The object of the occupational group organization is to bring skill to democracy by making it possible for the whole body of specialized intelligence to serve all of the people.

If there were not a need for some such plan it would be difficult to explain the way in which the Social Unit conception has laid hold upon the imagination of the American people, and upon the interest of some of the most thoughtful men and women in the country. People from many States and representatives of many different organizations recently spent three days in Cincinnati discussing in the minutest way the bearing of this plan upon business, labor, the social programmes of many professional groups, and the whole future of American democracy. I know of no other movement so limited in the scope of its actual operations—for so far the only existing Social Unit has been buried in a section embracing only about a thirtieth of Cincinnati—which could have attracted such attention or brought together so eminent a group of people for purposes of discussion.

I take the reason for this interest to be that the Social Unit plan aims in a very simple and common-sense way to meet some of the very obvious needs in our democracy. We need, for instance, to develop a public mind—an intelligent public opinion. The Social Unit points out that such a public mind does not develop from mobs—it comes as the result of studied consideration of public problems by small groups. The Social Unit plan aims so to organize neighborhoods that public questions can be brought into their little councils and discussed in the light of the acknowledged needs of the people.

We need also to create a mechanism through which the public can have a power equal at least to that of organized capital and organized labor. At present capital and labor, both more strongly organized than ever before, are reaching a deadlock, and between them the public, the democracy, unorganized, is helpless. Community organization, if it is thorough and embraces the whole population in small units, would bring the public to the point where it could control capital and labor instead of these controlling it.

We need community organization in order to develop leaders—real statesmen and women who get their earliest training close to the people whom they must serve and lead. It is not insignificant that the most successful men in all walks of life to-day come from small towns, where they were not in youth lost in the crowd, but important members of the life of the community. In a village every person is important. It is in the vast, complex, city life of modern times that the individual begins to feel that he is nothing, and with that feeling comes that loss of responsibility and public interest which is the menace of democracy. The Social Unit aims to restore some of the attributes of village life to city dwellers.

Finally, we need community organization under some such plan as the Social Unit, to find a fundamental remedy for curable social ills. The day of charity and paternalism is past. What we need is a more effective mechanism through which all the latent good-will, knowledge and skill of the community can be brought to study the problems of the community and devise programmes to meet those problems. In the Mohawk-Brighton district the community has been studying its own health needs, and people and experts, working together, have planned and carried out a remarkable public health programme. The important thing about that programme has not been the statistical results—the number of babies cared for, tuberculosis cases discovered, etc., although these outward results are very brilliant and have attracted the attention of public health authorities in many places. The important thing is that the people have done it themselves, that the doing of it has been a constant process of education, and that the conscience of the whole community is behind the programme.

The Social Unit is not the only movement which is aiming to meet these needs. In New York the Community Councils are headed toward the same objective, using a more extensive organization. The Social Unit, however, is attempting to find by research and experimentation the best possible community programme, and offers its findings to any community which chooses to use them. The president of the National Community Center Association recently said, "The Social Unit is the most sustained, carefully measured, deeply imagined plan and effort of community organization in the country to-day."

Of course it is still experimental, and will continue to be. It must be applied to a wider variety of population and tested in a greater number of fields of social effort before any final and comprehensive conclusions can be drawn. Meanwhile, however, it is without question contributing largely to social thinking and influencing community organization everywhere in the direction of more careful and constructive effort. The results thus far prove to be a very hopeful experiment. This, I think, no one will deny, unless it be those groups who fear not Bolshevism or socialism, but democracy.

Katrina Ely Tiffany

Chairman, National Citizens' Council of the National Social Unit Organization

Correspondence

The Trouble with the Greenbacks

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

I have read the article of Mr. Roberts in the Review of November 22, and believe that the approval by Frederick Strauss is too extreme. Mr. Roberts says much that is first rate, and I approve of most of what he says; but I disapprove of what he says about the greenbacks issued during the Civil War. In my humble judgment, the depreciation of the greenback was because of the exceptions placed thereon, that it should be received for all debts both public and private, "except for duties on imports and interest on the public debt." That gave the money centres in Wall Street a chance to corner gold and to set their own price on it, whenever anyone had to pay duties in imports or interest on the public debt. Had it not been for the exceptions, the greenback would have remained at par with gold. We are told that during the forepart of that war there was about $60,000,000 of paper issued, called "blackcaps." It was like the greenback, but it had no exceptions as to any kind of payments, and when gold was at a premium of $2.85, the blackcap stood even with gold. The two stood together, because they were full legal tenders.

The difference between the gold value and the greenback value was largely, if not entirely, a forced difference because the gold speculators had the power and actually ran a corner on gold. If our present currency had an exception on it like the greenback, who can doubt that gold would now be at a premium; and as it has not an exception on it, the gold and paper rises and falls with the rise and fall of commodities on the market.

I agree with Mr. Roberts that inflation is the principal thing that causes the rise in prices, although there are other matters to be considered, but the matter of contraction should be carefully considered, for the people throughout the country who buy property at the inflated prices will suffer a ruinous loss of property, and in many, many cases absolute financial ruin, and a tremendous panic will ensue, if there be any great contraction of the currency.

L. A. HOLLENBECK

Duchesne, Utah, December 20

[The early notes issued in the Civil War, to which our correspondent refers, differed from the greenbacks in a more important respect than that of being receivable for duties on imports; they were redeemable in gold on demand, and all but $33,000,000 were retired before the suspension of specie payments. As they were not reissued when received by the Treasury in payment of dues, they soon ceased to be a factor of any importance. To what extent, if at all, the greenbacks were depreciated by the fact that they were not receivable for customs is a matter of conjecture. They were accepted for all other taxes, besides being a legal tender in payment of ordinary debts. The idea that the depreciation of greenbacks—as a standing phenomenon, whatever may have been true of exceptional moments of panic or the like—was caused by "a corner in gold" has no foundation whatever in fact. Irredeemable paper money, not being tied to gold by any fixed arrangement, is naturally subject to such depreciation; whether it actually takes place or not, and if so to what extent, is all a matter of the circumstances of the time and the quantity of the issue. The Continental paper money of the American Revolution period went so low as to give rise to the phrase "not worth a Continental," which still survives as an expression for utter worthlessness; and at this day all the chief nations of Europe are experiencing, each in its degree, the depreciation which is invited by the circulation of paper representatives of money that can not be exchanged on demand for real money—that is, coin. —EDS. THE REVIEW]

Atmosphere on the Concert Stage

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

There is nothing more stately or atmospheric than a piano or a violin recital in any of our concert halls. Usually the stage, save for a huge leviathan of a piano, is bare of everything, a desert of hardwood boards, surrounded by a more or less dingy back wall. The lights are of course turned on full power. It is mid-noon on the Sahara, without the mystery of the sand. The performer emerges through a door in the back wall and moves towards his instrument. He moves stiffly, he bows stiffly. He seats himself at the leviathan and begins to play. Probably he plays very beautifully, for the spirit of the artist is all-conquering. He conquers himself and he conquers a part of the audience, but the larger portion only half hears him. The atmosphere is as hard as the bare boards of the stage. If it is Liszt that he plays it is not so bad. Liszt wrote for the virtuoso who must be seen as well as heard, in short, he wrote for himself. But if it is Beethoven or Chopin?

There are a few happy souls who have heard Paderewski or Hofmann play Chopin by candle-light in an Italian drawing-room. They have heard Chopin as Chopin was meant to be played. All they hear henceforth will be as tinkling brass and sounding cymbals. They have tasted Paradise, and never in the concert hall will they again be happy. They have realized the truth of the aristocracy of art, and because of that realization they will forever more be discontented. They have paid the price for their selfishness in enjoying what others can not enjoy. But these are not to be considered. Henceforth the kingdom of art must be to the masses, and the masses know nothing of Italian drawing-rooms by candle-light. But the masses do know the concert hall, and the stage bare of all save the black leviathan. And the masses, despite their inarticulateness, realize that all is not right, that Chopin and Beethoven are not in surroundings where their spirit is at home. And it is just here that the new art of the stage, the art of Gordon Craig, Max Reinhardt, and Robert Edmund Jones, of soft draperies and changing lights, might very well prove of extraordinary benefit.

The movies have already discovered it, and let us not mock at the movies. The Rialto and Rivoli theatres and now the Capitol Theatre have done and are doing an immense service in educating the people in the love of good music. At these theatres admirable orchestras play under capable leaders, but to the service of the music has also been brought a very high ideal of scenic art. The settings devised at the Rivoli and Capitol theatres for the musical numbers have been executed by John Wenger, one of the ablest of the younger scenic artists, an artist who is also an excellent musician. Mr. Wenger's idea has been to place his audience in the mood of the particular composition without distracting its attention from the music itself. He has done this with simple draperies of a neutral color, lighted within by a series of lights. There is nothing précieux in his scheme, and those who have attended any of these theatres realize that it is eminently practical.

Now what has been proved practical at the Rivoli and the Capitol is equally practical in the concert hall, and the fact that Mr. Hofmann and Mr. Heifetz do not play in the movies is no argument against a reform which may come from there. Mr. Hofmann or Mr. Heifetz on the stage of Carnegie Hall with that stage transformed by soft draperies, with the auditorium lights lowered, and the music coming out to us as from some mysterious grotto, perhaps that would not possess all the atmosphere of an Italian drawing-room by candle-light, but it would be none the less a far more appropriate home for the spirit of Chopin and Beethoven than the present setting.

GRENVILLE VERNON

New York, December 10

Book Reviews

Germany—Misjudged or Found Out?

GERMANY'S NEW WAR AGAINST AMERICA. By Stanley Frost, of the New York Tribune. With an Introduction by Hon. A. Mitchell Palmer, Attorney-General of the United States, formerly Alien Property Custodian. New York: E. P. Dutton and Company.

MOST readers of economics, having by nature and training large faith in the essential goodness of man, will take this book with a grain of salt, even as most students of international politics before the war were slow to believe that Germany was planning the conquest of the world. And yet, in view of all that has happened during the past five years, it may be well to consider whether Mr. Frost is regaling the public with mere cock-and-bull stories, or whether there really is danger that Germany, defeated in the war, may begin a new offensive in the industrial field.

Mr. Palmer, who has had exceptional opportunity of observing German commercial methods, says that industrial Germany was responsible for the war, that her destinies are still in the hands of the old leaders, that her aims and ambitions are still the same, and that the industrial invasion of America, which was begun many years ago with hostile intent, is about to be resumed along the old lines. At Mr. Palmer's suggestion, and for the purpose of forestalling the coming offensive, the Chemical Foundation, Inc., was organized, which purchased the 4,500 German-owned patents in the United States, and he appeals to the business men of America for help in the work of making this country commercially free. Evidently, then, Mr. Frost's book is a plea for the protection of certain infant industries temporarily fostered by the war, especially the manufacture of dyes, potash, drugs, and other chemicals, against the efforts of Germany to regain her former preëminence. For all that, the indictment which the author brings against Germany on the score of unethical trade practices is formidable, and should not be lightly dismissed.

One of Germany's most characteristic methods of pushing her foreign trade was the insidious propaganda in favor of everything German disseminated by countless agents placed in strategic positions throughout the world. Besides the regular consular service and traveling agents there were employees in banks, insurance companies, railway shipping companies, engineering firms, mines, factories, mercantile houses—all promoting the sale of German goods, collecting and reporting useful information, and, in general, working for the prestige of Deutschtum im Ausland. The information sent in by these industrious agents was carefully sifted and communicated to the manufacturers and merchants of Germany by a special bureau, the Schimmelpfeng Institut, controlled and financed by the great banks, especially the four "Big D" banks, the Deutsche, Dresdner, Disconto, and Darmstädter. Mr. Palmer declares that almost every German dye and chemical expert in America was a spy. Dr. S. Herzog, whose book, "The Future of German Industrial Export," reminds one of Bernhardi's naïve and cynical candor, freely admits the necessity of securing reports on every kind of commercial secret. Professor Henri Hausen, in his book on "Germany's Commercial Grip on the World," states that by means of universal espionage, coupled with bribery and intimidation, Germany had built up an industrial power nearly as formidable as the military machine. Only a stroke of madness, he says, could have made her prefer the hazard of battle to this progressive and sure infiltration, which, in another ten or twenty years of apparent quite material peace, would have created, economically speaking, a German world.

In showing how Germany intrenched her industrial position in America and elsewhere, Mr. Frost has much to say about full-line forcing, boycotting, and scientific dumping in certain selected industries. For example, H. A. Metz & Co., an American firm, was obliged to agree not to buy or sell products competing with those of the Hoechst Color Co. without obtaining their consent. The Germans have time and again cut the prices on bicarbonate of potash, aniline oil, salicylic acid, oxalic acid, and other chemicals, only to restore them after competition was destroyed. The great Kalisyndikat is said to have $100,000,000 worth of potash ready to dump on the American market. The manufacture of dyes, as is well known, is intimately connected with the manufacture of explosives, and was part of Germany's preparation for war. Before the war, storing explosives, she kept down the price of dyes; during the war, on the contrary, making explosives, she was storing dyes. It is estimated that $100,000,000 worth of dyes—four times the normal annual consumption of America—is ready for export through Copenhagen, and already "neutral" agents are selling dyes in Italy at half price.

The author gives a long list of Germany's questionable trade practices in order to indicate the lines along which the new war is likely to be carried on. The Metalgesellschaft and allied firms, through their vast interests in America, as in all other mining countries, exercised a strong control over prices and furnished Germany with the sinews of war. The great cartels in the bar-iron trade, tools and implements, silk products and other textiles, were and still are powerful instruments for the promotion of foreign trade. German and Austro-Hungarian companies made a specialty of reinsurance throughout the world, and used the information thus obtained to the injury of their customers. Discriminations in freights by land and sea were used to overcome tariff barriers and thus to gain an unfair advantage over competitors. More than 200,000 German agents are said to be in Russia, where they are buying up industries ruined by their Bolshevik friends; while other agents are doing similar work in Mexico. The agitation in favor of wooden ships was kept alive by German influence for obvious reasons. German trade will be resumed through neutral channels and her commodities denationalized or camouflaged under neutral colors. Even now Germans are buying up bankrupt concerns in Switzerland and other neutral countries and running them under the original names. Only a small part of German-owned property in America has been found by the Alien Property Custodian. The former German agents are all here and ready to resume operations —in fact, the propaganda machine is already at work, preparing the American mind for the imminent industrial invasion.

All this is very plausible and almost convincing, yet withal quite upsetting to one's mental balance as one wonders at the astute perversity of the Germans on the one hand, and the stupid incompetence of the rest of the world on the other. If all that the author says is true, how was it that Great Britain and the United States, for example, had any foreign trade at all? And is it possible that Germany, after the late disastrous war, is still gay and fresh and ready for a morning's promenade to the industrial mastery of the world? And how can she afford to dump on so large a scale? And has the United States no means of meeting German competition other than high tariffs and stringent import licenses? And must the farmers and textile manufacturers be penalized in order that a small group of people interested in dyes and potash may be nourished by these infant industries? And is Germany to have no export trade at all? And if so, how will she pay the indemnities and at the same time escape the threatened social revolution?

Yet, when all is said, the fact remains that Germany has lost her good name among the nations, and it is safe to prophesy that for many years her every move will be watched with suspicion, and few will be found to give her the benefit of a doubt. Possibly the world is misjudging Germany; perhaps it is only finding her out.

J. E. LE ROSSIGNOL

Sea Tales

THE SEA BRIDE. By Ben Ames Williams. New York: The Macmillan Company.

THE PASSAGE OF THE BARQUE SAPPHO. By J. E. Patterson. New York: E. P. Dutton and Company.

THERE have been many sea-stories of recent invention, tales of naval life, yarns of mutiny, shipwreck, and buried treasure, farcical "exploitations" of the nautical atmosphere, and here and there a narrative conveying something of its true glamour. What we are always looking for in sea-fiction as in other fiction is not something new in kind, but something fresh in quality. Novelty is still a good thing in a novel; but who really cares much for a new shaking of the old bag of tricks, even by the most expert hands? A new voice, a new intonation barely—how clear (for those who have ears) they ring above or beyond the brisk, clever, and monotonous chorus of whatever latest "school" of story-tellers, as also, let us confess, above the delightful but already familiar notes of independent performers. Conrad's sea-spell is still potent; but our submission to it is now tolerably deliberate and placid. After all, there is no last word in magic, men will be searching new sea charms, and land charms, while land and sea remain. Mr. Hergesheimer found one for us in "Java Head," a sea story which happens to take place ashore. More recently, in "All the Brothers Were Valiant," a new writer, Ben Ames Williams, seemed to have found one, slight but authentic. A yarn, if you like, wild and romantic and improbable, but true enough with the smell of the sea and the vibration of youth trembling towards its destiny. . . . Perhaps the novelette is this writer's natural medium, as I think it is Mr. Hergesheimer's. "The Sea Bride" labors towards bulk at the expense of quality. In gist it weighs about even with the earlier story. On the larger scale the artifice of its love story is patent; and unfortunately the writer's Jack-Londonish tendency towards unmeaning or slightly sadistic goriness takes on unpleasant emphasis.

In "The Passage of the Barque Sappho" most American readers may taste a quite new savor. Often of late some American publisher has produced with a flourish from his English-made hat a brand-new and fullgrown rabbit, some British novelist with a string of books behind him and a marvelous reputation at home. We have never heard of him. He has been hidden from us till he and we should be ripe for meeting. Usually he turns out to be another of the same—another clever, flouting, excitable player of the Wellsian game, whether with Oxford or Cockney accent. Patterson is a writer, and a man, of a totally different order. We get an interesting glimpse of him in "Who's Who," which found him worth mention as far back, at least, as 1914. Born in 1866 (within a month of H. G. Wells), a Yorkshireman; ran away to sea at thirteen, and knocked about the world till thirty: deep sea fishery, merchant service, naval reserve; crippled by rheumatism, came to London, became an obscure actor and an approved journalist; wrote some fifteen books of verse and prose, mainly ballads, sketches, and tales of the sea or its shores. And now, with this posthumous publication (he died a year or two ago), a Dent book imported by Dutton rather than published here, we get our first chance at him. The obvious comparison would be with Conrad, and it has been drawn. He shares with Conrad an early and long experience of the sea, a power of vivid description, and a serene indifference to the mechanism of "plot." A more direct relation might conceivably be traced, if it were worth tracing. But no one would justly accuse the slightly younger man of imitating the elder. He moves on a more humdrum plane, his own plane of feeling and observation. It is a male plane: there is no woman aboard the Barque Sappho to becloud the simple issues between man and man or between man and his other friend and opponent, the sea. And this is a story of men at sea dealing with each other rather than, as we often feel in Conrad's tales, a story of the sea dealing with men. Patterson's men are more closely bound to each other for good and ill, by love and hatred, a floating community of interdependent and inter-conscious souls, instead of (as in Conrad) a bundle of lonely and reticent individuals, united in the main for duty, for offensive warfare against the common enemy, Nature, but otherwise isolate and even desolate, peering over their shoulders at each other now and then, but for the most part fated to stand, back to back, gazing each over his own reach of misty sea-scape and life-scape, into—what?

Conrad would have made a more haunting and tragic figure of the Sappho's poor old skipper, and with the two who take turns at the narrative he might have dealt more subtly; but the rest of her crew would have remained figures dim if carefully blocked out, the necessary and natural background for his concentrated spiritual action. Patterson gives us the run of the ship. A mixed lot of shipmates we set sail with from 'Frisco, but in the course of our long voyage with them round the Horn they become, every one of them, companions and familiars; created each after his kind and not to be escaped from, however much they may bore or offend us at times, till the voyage ends. Unluckily for the writer's realistic method, his knowledge of dialect is not accurate. We can not challenge his Scotch negro, and his Yorkshire Smiley is evidently beyond cavil; but a stranger lingo than that attributed to the American, "Booster," would be hard to imagine, even in the novel of a Briton. There is crudity here, and elsewhere, in the book; but elsewhere chiefly of the kind that enhances verisimilitude, the sort of artlessness Defoe studied as a trick. Nobody would do or say quite that (we feel) in a work of art: ergo, it must be true. So our fine theory of the higher transmuted fact receives an apparent setback. . . . But it is a momentary illusion that does not belie the shaping hand. Literally and laboriously as we seem to be following the uncertain fortunes of the Sappho, sparing as the voyage is of high dramatic moments, it involves and concerns us beyond wish or thought of escape till we have seen it through. Its effect is slow and cumulative, like Conrad's; and though it lacks his unearthly poise, his effortless hand at the wheel, it gains, for compensation, an ingenuous warmth we need only respond, not rise to.

H. W. BOYNTON

Maeterlinck's "Presences"

MOUNTAIN PATHS. By Maurice Maeterlinck. Translated by Alexander Teixeira de Mattos. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co.

MAETERLINCK'S "Mountain Paths," a volume of essays, is brief, but it possesses an abundance and diversity which almost debar it, or exempt it, from review. The criticism of its various topics seriatim is prevented by their abundance; the selection of representative topics for criticism is precluded by their diversity. What can one say of an essay on Karma that can be pertinently said of an essay on insects? What generalization is spacious enough to embrace an essay on gambling and a story of three unknown Belgian heroes in the outreach of its hospitable curve? It would be easy but ignominious to escape from the confusion by calling the book a miscellany. The book is not a miscellany; it is a book that brings largeness and delicacy, penetration and reverence, to the successive examination of many primary and a few secondary problems. How is criticism to find a centre?

The perplexity is serious, but a partial and imperfect clew may be found in Maeterlinck's fondness for indwellings, for what may be called by a word whose vagueness is part of its justness, presences. One mind in another, one life in another—that is a quite peculiar interest of Maeterlinck's. Sometimes the indweller is more like a being, sometimes more like a thought; but as being it seems always ready to dissolve into thought, as thought always ready to condense into being. In the first essay, the "Power of the Dead," it is the dead in us, the dead being halfway between memories and ghosts. In the "Soul of Nations" it is "floating forces," mystic reservoirs, deposits extrinsic to the nation's mind and character, celestial armories from which weapons are drawn in hours of crisis. "In "Macrocosm and Microcosm" the human body is pictured as a sort of ark in which all the animal life of all periods is lodged for indefinite preservation. In "Heredity and Preëxistence" it is the occupancy of our souls by ancestors and descendants that furnishes the theme. In "Karma" it is the past self that inhabits and controls the present.

Maeterlinck in all these beliefs is a poet, a rare and intimate poet. This is the explanation of his remarkable incredulities and his still more remarkable credulities. On the question of communications from spirits he discloses a hesitancy, a skepticism, which is very surprising at the first view and very natural at the second. Maeterlinck craves the poetry, and when the celestial visitant becomes an interlocutor and vis-à-vis, when he, in effect, presents his card and unpacks his verbal merchandise, he assumes to Maeterlinck's protesting gaze the prosaicism of a commercial traveler. It is taste perhaps rather than sense that steadies Maeterlinck in these special bogs and quicksands; he is prompt enough in his surrender to unreason where his imagination is caught by its mystery and beauty. For instance, in "Heredity and Preëxistence" he ventures to propound the theory that we are as much influenced by our posterity as by our ancestors, to put it tersely, that we are the children of our descendants. There is no abstract objection to the notion that causes should work backward as well as forward in the same fashion in which they act with equal facility from right to left and from left to right; but there is the very strong, indeed the quite decisive, practical objection that the inductive evidence is all the other way.

The truth is that in Maeterlinck as in Plato there are two men, a dialectician and a mystic, though in the Belgian, as in the Greek, it is a visionary dialectician who shares his habitat with a rationalizing mystic. Everywhere in this book one feels the fascination which negations possess for Maeterlinck's critical subtlety and the empire which affirmations retain or regain over his impulse to honor and revere. There are passages of critical insight in the volume which the noblest thinkers of our race might have rejoiced to father. Take, for instance, the fifth section in the "Great Revelation," in which Maeterlinck defends the appalling thesis that any ultimate doctrine which was great enough to be commensurate with the truth would be too great to have any congruence with our faculties. Sense and profundity combine to overwhelm us. Yet Maeterlinck always reserves a hope, suggests an extrication. One might criticise his optimism perhaps as a little too versatile; he feels moved every five years or so to revise his pact with the universe. At present his hope turns towards Karma.

Karma, which Maeterlinck, in one of his serene ecstasies, describes as the most beautiful and reassuring doctrine that the mind of man has imagined, is a form of justice which makes man's condition nothing more nor less than the result, or, if one pleases, the footing or aggregate, of all his actions, the sins counting as minuses, the good acts as pluses, in the calculation of his present welfare. Reincarnation, its vivid and poetic accompaniment, is apparently unrelated to the essence of the system. Reincarnation, it would almost seem, is an adjunct, an amendment, a postscript, a convenience for getting around the unmistakable disparity between Karma and the superficial facts. Justice is a relation between two terms. Put the two terms, conduct and welfare, for example, side by side in the same life, and the facts are clearly unmanageable. But it is still possible to believe in the universality of justice if you will separate the terms and conceal their relation by putting them in distinct lives. The locks on hand do not fit the keys on hand, but optimism vindicates the locksmith by the charitable supposition of absent keys and locks to which the visible fittings are duly complemental. Maeterlinck himself, whose views are rather criticised than reproduced in the foregoing sentences, admits that Karma is only an hypothesis; but is content to accept an hypothesis, which, as he truly says, is irrefutable, and which is food and comfort to his aspirations.

It is doubtful if in the general capacity or in the depth and subtlety of particular insights, any philosopher has surpassed Maeterlinck. System, of course, he lacks, but what system as a system has ever imposed its cumbrousness upon mankind? Truth in philosophy is perceived, is consumed, in particulars. The analogy with bread is instructive. Humanity takes small grains of wheat or smaller flakes of flour, makes them into a large loaf, which can not be digested until it has been crumbed by the fingers and ground by the teeth. A system is just such a loaf. Maeterlinck's true imperfection lies elsewhere. Philosophy, being, when all is said and done, a human product looking toward a human end, is finally conditioned by the largeness and robustness of the philosopher's humanity. It may be abstract and passionless, as an eye is cool and pellucid, but the eye no less than the abdomen is nourished by the blood. Maeterlinck lacks neither humanity nor experience; the only question is whether he possesses them in a degree correspondent with the splendor of his own gift for abstraction or the requirements of philosophies that endure.

Chinese Art

OUTLINES OF CHINESE ART. By John L. Ferguson. The Scammon Lectures for 1918. Published for the Art Institute of Chicago by the University of Chicago Press.

THE collector of Chinese art soon comes to the dilemma that he must trust either his daemon or the Chinese. On this issue Dr. Ferguson takes a firm stand. His approach to the subject is literary, traditional, exclusively Chinese. His loyalty knows no shrinking. He treats calligraphy as of equal dignity with sculpture or painting; he excludes with an almost contemptuous brevity the stately statues of Gandhara type because they are exotic and the Chinese think little of them. He is as enthusiastic about the feeling of jade as he is about the quality of a primitive landscape. In Chinese fashion he exalts bronzes and slurs ceramics, while old inscribed stones seem more important than the masterpieces of the imported Buddhistic school. Compared with our author, such Far-Eastern critics as Seichi-taki and the late Okakura Kakuzo are fairly cosmopolitan in their sympathies, while the lamented Ernest Fenollosa, Laurence Binyon, and Alfred Morrison appear as mere eclectics.

We have emphasized the unbending character of Dr. Ferguson's Sinophily because it constitutes at once the limitation and the positive strength of his work. There is no book which tells so briefly and accurately, on the basis of first-hand knowledge, precisely how the best-trained Chinese regard their own art. Their interest ceases with the Yuan dynasty, so does Dr. Ferguson's. They care as much for famous seals or eulogies of noted critics or collectors on a scroll as they do for the painting itself. Their systematic criticism and archæology extends over fifteen hundred years, beginning at a moment when our Teutonic forebears, without an alphabet or an art to remember, were just beginning to be uneasy in their Baltic fens.

One can not but respect so long a tradition of culture, yet many of its results look just about as trustworthy and important as the Alexandrine dabblings in rhetoric and criticism. For a thousand years China has been in an Alexandrine condition, and any real study of her art must transcend the Chinese tradition. In particular, the collector who trusts overmuch to signatures, seals, and eulogies, neglecting that subjective appreciation which our author wholly distrusts, will have more literary evidences of Chinese art in his godowns than Chinese art itself. Dr. Ferguson's collections have been exhibited, and many pieces have passed into museums. The average quality of these paintings is calculated to encourage the amateur who in the first instance trusts his daemon, while cautiously enlisting in his quest all available Chinese lore.

As a guide to the collector we can not unreservedly recommend this book. As a solid and entertaining means of information it deserves all praise. Numerous unhackneyed illustrations add to its value and constitute its chief appeal to the specialist.

The Run of the Shelves

EASY-CHAIR strategists will find abundant food for thought and argument in William L. McPherson's "The Strategy of the Great War" (Putnam). The book grows out of the remarkable comment which Mr. McPherson wrote week by week for the New York Tribune. He is a convinced Easterner. The great failure of the Allies was to strike soft at Gallipoli. Equally the great error of Germany was to seek the impossible on the Western front, while neglecting to consolidate and exploit the Middle-Europe she had conquered. Her ultimate and fatal folly was to incur war with the United States. The French were blameworthy in maintaining an initial aggressive in Alsace and in failing to defend the Northern frontier in force. The policy of attrition was fallacious from the point of view of the Entente, and the correct western policy for Germany from the first. Throughout, the larger strategy of Germany was stupid, she threw away out of vanity a good chance of securing all her political aims. Such is the general tenor of a vigorously written book, the upshot of which is perhaps that a model strategy is always retrospective, and more easily compassed in the easy chair than on the stricken field.

The American poet, John Gould Fletcher, who has been residing in England for the past three years, writes as follows in a recent letter from London concerning his relations wih France:

I may say that they are wholly confined to a great admiration for French literature, poetry and art. In regard to French literature my knowledge of it begins with François Villon, Rabelais, and Montaigne, all three of whom I greatly admire. With the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries I have never been able to find myself in sympathy, although I admit the supreme artistry and polish of Molière and La Fontaine; the sombre concision and mysticism of Pascal attract me more than either Corneille or Racine. In the eighteenth century I have admired and studied the works of Voltaire and Rousseau, especially the latter, having read the whole of his "Confessions," as well as the "Rêveries d'un Promeneur Solitaire," several times in the original. In the nineteenth century, or rather the period after the publication of "Emaux et Camées" and "Les Fleurs du Mal," I am most at home. Hugo I do not like, despite his enormous fecundity and energy; but both Gautier and Baudelaire—the latter especially, because he continued a line of thought which started with Poe—made an early and deep impression on me. After 1910, I became interested in the Symbolists and have read most of Verlaine, all of Mallarmé, Corbière, Lafargue, Lautréamont (Maldoror), Rimbaud, as well as others of the succeeding generation, such as Rémy de Gourmont (whom I regard as a very great critic), Henri de Regnier, Francis Jammes, Viélé-Griffin, Stuart Merrill, and others almost too numerous to mention.

Among the "fata" of "libelli" those of the commonplace quatrains of the mathematician Omar Khayyam are of the strangest. Through accident and the single genius of Fitzgerald they have been lifted from being quite undistinguished minor poetry in Persia to a unique place in the English-speaking world, and were made the voice, for a time, of the later Victorian period. But besides the magic given by the great English stylist, there was in the clay with which he worked a certain broad humanity, a kinship to all our yearnings, questionings, and consolations. It is more than doubtful whether that was present in Abu'l-Ala, some of whose poems have just been rendered into the forms of Omar Khayyam and Fitzgerald by Mr. Ameen Rihani (The Luzumiyat of Abu'l-Ala (James T. White). The blind Syrian intellectual and moralist is both more sombre and less friendly than the Persian and bon vivant. He was not only an agnostic, a pessimist, and a rebel; he was an ascetic to the uttermost and rejected all human ties save those of the intellect. We may be puzzled as to how the creator of Omar's universe could have created Omar, just as the God of Ecclesiastes leaves Ecclesiastes himself inexplicable; but Abu'l-Ala is of a piece with the universe he saw around him, and it is no kindly or attractive piece. Nor is it likely that Mr. Rihani's art will overcome the handicap. His renderings are often very clever; but, as the Arabic proverb says, the merit belongs to the precedent—Fitzgerald.

"Supplementary Diplomatic Documents" follows the publication by the American-Hellenic Society, a few months ago, of "The Greek White Book" (Oxford University Press). This supplement presents additional evidence from authentic texts of documents issued by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Greek Government, dealing with the Greco-Serbian Treaty and the Germano-Bulgarian invasion of Macedonia, and telegrams exchanged between the Royal Courts of Athens and Berlin before the fall of Constantine. Although there is neither an explanatory preface nor interpretative comments to influence the reader, much of the material contained is little short of dramatic. The struggle of the Greek people to assert its will against a popular King, backed by a tremendous propaganda, is one of the most absorbing episodes of the Great War, in which the figures of Constantine and Venizelos, the forceful and blind soldier king and the honest and far-sighted Cretan statesman, are the protagonists. Probably the telegram of Mr. Coromilas to King Constantine in consequence of the events of December 1-2, 1916, forms the most striking document of the collection, inasmuch as it comes from a man who felt very deeply the struggle between loyalty to his king and loyalty to his country.

" . . . To crown the horror, Greece in the midst of the misfortunes which have thus overwhelmed her, is divided into two camps which have a deadly grudge against each other; hate is in their hearts and civil war is in their souls and in their actions; we kill and assassinate each other; while the Bulgarians are settled on our soil and oppress our brothers. The country is in the greatest distress, it is in a state of anarchy; criminal and atrocious acts have been committed at Athens against the civil population, and the agents of public order have done nothing to stop them. . . .

. . . Whatever the issue of this great conflict may be—and even your majesty feels that it will be indecisive—Greece must remain the frank and sincere friend of the Powers of the Entente, and must be the enemy of Bulgaria. Mr. Venizelos and his colleagues at Saloniki have seen this truth. Do not refuse, sire, to see it yourself. And since you are king, not of the majority of the people, but of all the Greeks, forget the past; forget any grievances that you may have, and ask for the assistance of Mr. Venizelos and his friends; I have the firm hope that they will give it to you freely. . . .

. . . I beg your majesty to excuse the frankness of my language. The affection that I bear for you compels me to speak to you thus, for my heart bleeds when I think what you were and of what is going to come. It is my duty to speak to you plainly and with no reticence; it is my duty to tell your majesty that the policy which has so fatefully brought us to the position in which, alas, we find ourselves, is a deadly policy, and one of which I fundamentally disapprove. The advice that I venture to give you, and your royal act, bringing to pass the union of all, are all that can now save what remains."

A useful list of books has been compiled by Prof. Tom Peete Cross, under the title "Bibliography and Methods of English Literary History" (University of Chicago Press). Attention is chiefly directed to the works of fundamental bibliographical importance — just the books the graduate student is most likely to be ignorant of—but the blank interleavings give room for the amplification of particular subjects.

Drama

"Mary Broome" at the Neighborhood Playhouse—The Theatre Parisien

MR. ALLAN MONKHOUSE'S "Mary Broome," visible for a season on Saturday and Sunday evenings at the Neighborhood Playhouse, is an enmeshing play. It is not a serious, not an artistic, hardly a moral, play; and I chafe and rebel at the facility of my entanglement. The entanglement remains, however; "Mary Broome" is a play that dogs you—not to say, hounds you—an idle, impish, saucy play, a play that attracts, worries, and teases, and refuses to be sent about its business for the simple reason that its business is to pester you. It is a study in character, and its own character is mirrored in that of its protagonist.

Was "Mary Broome" originally a novel? It seems, in essence, a novel, with two vigorous included playlets, the first act and the fourth. In Act I, the poetical featherhead and rattlebrain, Leonard Timbrell, is persuaded to marry the housemaid (significantly named Broome) whom he has unconcernedly seduced. In Act IV, this wife, estranged by Leonard's indifference to their child, runs away to Canada with the milkman. The intervening matter is as mere matter dramatically pointless, but for all that, interest is penetrating. The marriage itself, the union of quicksilver and lead, with its comic retribution for the man and its indistinct beatitude for the girl, is evocative and provocative in a quite singular degree. The means by which the rupture between father and son is brought about in the second act is forced, almost to the point of violence; but there is the happiest combination of truth and novelty in the occasion for this means, the half-hour adjournment of dinner, just long enough to put a razor-edge on everybody's nerves and everybody's tongue.

Leonard Timbrell is the centre of the play; at times he seems both centre and circumference. He is comic, but in a play that means something a comic character should be a serious enterprise for his creator. In this sense Mercutio is serious for Shakespeare; Harold Skimpole (the nearest parallel to Leonard Timbrell) is serious for Dickens. The difficulty with Mr. Monkhouse's play, for anybody who is trying to respect it, is that Leonard, who abounds in gay antics, is himself nothing but a gay antic for Mr. Monkhouse. He is not humanly real; he is a thread on which wilfulness and sauciness are mischievously strung, and that the question between modernity and what may be called suburbanity can be seriously raised in the person of a man who is at bottom mere performer and coxcomb is of course unthinkable. Mr. Rudolph Besier's "Don" is the serious antithesis to Mr. Monkhouse's pirouetting Leonard. Self in youth is a powerful intoxicant, and Leonard Timbrell has drunk deeply of that vintage. One particular may be noted. Leonard has been born and bred in his father's house, but the mutual astonishment between himself and his people would suggest that he had been born and bred in Bagdad and had arrived in London day before yesterday. Mr. Knoblock's "Faun," Sir James Barrie's Lob, could scarcely be less acclimated.

The play affects a seriousness which it does not possess, and its teaching is indeterminate and fluctuant. The author makes points for or against Leonard according to convenience; he likes Leonard on the whole, but he likes points better. All of which proves that there is a great deal of Leonard in Mr. Monkhouse. At the close the father confesses that he has been a fool. Nothing could be more inopportune than this confession as a sequel to the rap on the knuckles which Mr. Monkhouse himself has just administered to Leonard in mild reproof of his paternal callousness. Yet the author of this stupidity is capable of a stroke so excellent and so touching as poor Mary's simple-minded outcry in the first act: "I want to marry somebody."

The performance was remarkably good. Miss Helen Curry as Mary Broome was perfect. This may or not mean a vocation for Miss Curry. The technical, the vocal, requirements of the part were inconsiderable, and the exquisite rightness of key which constituted its beauty might have been, so to speak, inscribed upon the part by a discerning instructor. Mr. S. Bennet Tobias as Leonard Timbrell was hardly less perfect and was much more demonstrably able. He acted Leonard with what might be called an exasperating charm, and the dregs of the character, while visible enough at the bottom, did not trouble the pellucid surface. He could not actualize the character (the character itself being a sort of forgery), but he justified—he authenticated—the temperament. The praise for that victory should be ample.

The double bill at the Théatre Parisien opens with a two-act play by Pierre Wolff and Georges Courteline, entitled "La Cruche," here used in the sense of dunce or dullard. A girl finds refuge from a brutal lover in the protection of a second man, whose chivalry is unpresuming. The first man wins her back by an offer of marriage. The narrative is mild almost to placidity, and even the fourth character, a jealous woman, does not greatly disturb the equanimity of its temper. I might not have minded the dearth of plot in a more serious play, but "La Cruche" is very light, and I own to some hesitancy about plays that are plotless and thoughtless at the same time. Still, I followed the drama with pleasure, and allowed duly for the difference between French and English taste in the matter in question. The French are noted for address. It follows that they can interest themselves keenly in the "How" of things, even in the "How" of a not markedly exciting or unusual transaction. The Anglo-Saxon does not dally with the "How"; he darts unceremoniously to the "What." If there is no "What," but only a "How," as in "La Cruche," he feels unfed, and an unfed Anglo-Saxon is a person to be reckoned with.

Not the least interesting point in the play for an American was the entire absence on everybody's part of any sense of peculiarity or disadvantage in the original position of the girl, Margot. True, she is married in the end, but this is not rehabilitation, it is promotion. A major accepts a colonelcy without prejudice to the respectability of majors. The situations and conversation are seemly, and Margot is refined. The French can not make impurity pure, but they can make it as limpid as purity.

M. Félix Barre was excellent in his finely shaded portrayal of the painter, Lavernie; Mlle. Grattery made an agreeable Margot; M. Lucien Weber retrieved by skill in the second act part of the credit which he had buzzed and sputtered away in Act I. The operetta, "La Musique Adoucit les Coeurs," supplied precisely the form of lightness which might have been expected in a programme in which the element of weight was represented by "La Cruche."

O. W. FIRKINS

Massenet's Memories and Music

MY RECOLLECTIONS. By Jules Massenet. Boston: Small, Maynard & Company.

TO those who have not read them in the original, the reminiscences of Massenet now published in near-English form, under the title of "My Recollections," will have something—a great deal, maybe—of the unquestioned charm which marked so much of the composer's gracious music. But no one should approach these careless jottings over-seriously or hoping to find in them lofty theories or daring thoughts.

Jules Massenet. He hated his own forename. He was a man of moods, caprices, fads, and whims—a "fantastick," if there was one in the world. He signed just "Massenet," or sometimes "Mr. Massenet," like an Englishman. At the end of his career he seemed too erratic to be wholly sane. The last chapter of his

(Continued on page 20)

The Guiding Principle

Quality always has been and always will be the dominating purpose of the Crocker-Wheeler organization.

That is why C-W motors hold a reputation that is beyond the motor manufacturer to whom large output is the primary aim.

President

Crocker-Wheeler Co.
Ampere, N. J.

New York
Boston
Syracuse
Chicago
Cleveland
Binghamton

Pittsburgh
Newark
New Haven
Philadelphia
Baltimore
San Francisco

TIFFANY & Co.

JEWELRY SILVERWARE WATCHES CLOCKS STATIONERY

TIFFANY & CO.'S SILVERWARE
MADE IN THEIR OWN SHOPS IS NOT SOLD ELSEWHERE

PURCHASES MAY BE MADE BY MAIL

FIFTH AVENUE & 37TH STREET
NEW YORK

Begin the New Year right—

THE REVIEW

Now a matured institution, entering upon its new year with an energetic purpose, visible in its new appearance and in its programme of rare promise (see inside of back cover), invites your support.

After reading the letter on the inside of the front cover of this magazine, which contains a personal message from the distinguished men who have signed it, send in your subscription on the attached blank:

THE REVIEW, 140 Nassau St., N. Y.:
Please send THE REVIEW for one year to Name ....

Address ....

$5 a year

(Continued from page 18)
memoirs bears the heading of "Thoughts after Death." It was penned (unless the writer is a dishonest ghost) from a distant planet, where "there are no newspapers, no dinners, no sleepless nights." Like Swedenborg (if we may trust that chapter) Massenet sat in at his own funeral. Incidentally he declares he heard the loud sobbing of his wife and daughter; the lamentations of an artist (perhaps Lucy Arbell) exclaiming, "Ah, believe me, I loved him well. I have always had such great success in his works!" And, as they bore him farther and farther from the Boulevards, towards Egreville, his last earthly halting place, he knew quite well that, by his friends, he would be forgotten.

Throughout his life he had had many enemies. Some of them rivals who were jealous of his vogue. Some of them critics who affected to despise his work. He had been jeered at and lampooned time and again, as "Mademoiselle Wagner," and even, I have heard, as "Marie Madeleine." It was long the fashion among those who worshipped Wagner to make light of the voluptuous and tenderness of Massenet's style. The more he protested that he also was a Wagnerite—and a devotee besides of Berlioz—the more they mocked at him. It mattered little to the fortunate composer who, from his entrance at the Conservatoire of Paris to his death, only a few years ago, was the spoiled child of men—and women, the inventor of more operas and cantatas and song cycles and tone poems, than any who envied him.

In point of fact, though he owed much to Wagner, Jules Massenet was not of the great line of that creator of music-drama. He would have resented being reminded of the truth. But he was closer far to Schumann and to Gounod. He had the sweetness of the composer of "Faust" and "Romeo" and "Mireille," with the romantic grace of the great German. When he strained his talent (as he sometimes did) he was as "grand" at best as Meyerbeer. But he delighted most when he was natural—devising delicate and often exquisite "Poèmes," picturesque tone-poems, and graceful operas.

Not all the sneering of the Wagnerites can spoil the tenderness of Massenet's "Werther," the frail beauty of his "Manon," the charm of his "Jongleur de Notre-Dame," and his cantata, "Marie-Madeleine." He wrote rubbish now and then—he wrote too quickly. But he was always a sincere and fine technician. He had the gift of melody and great mastery of harmony.

He was as it were a link, and a beguiling link, between Gounod and d'Indy, without the strength of the last-named composer. It might be going a good deal too far to speak of him as a genius. Yet Gounod, after listening to his cantata, "Eve," said of him that he was one of the "Elect" of heaven.

It was to Massenet that the late Oscar Hammerstein turned most frequently when he was looking for some popular attraction at the Manhattan Opera House. He produced "Hérodiade," "Thaïs," "Grisélidis," "Le Jongleur" and other works, which proved successful here as they had been in Paris. But the composer never crossed the Atlantic seas, and more than once refused the offers made him to direct some of his operas and concert works.

Concerning his successes and his failures he has set down many anecdotes in "My Recollections" and about the composers, singers, and managers of his time—from Auber to Ambroise Thomas, Liszt, Delibes, Gounod, Bizet, Berlioz, Duvernoy, Carré, Reyer, Saint-Saëns, Halanzier, and the rest of his contemporaries.

As a writer, Massenet has but little style, and what little he can boast of has been shattered by his translator, H. Villiers Barnett, who is said to have been chosen by the master himself. But, as a chronicle and record of the musicians of his time, these recollections have their proper place and value—despite omissions, and singular inaccuracies which distress the reader in Mr. Barnett's English version.

CHARLES HENRY MELTZER

Books and the News

The Negro

THERE have been certain recent indications that this perennial problem may at any time again become acute. There are a score and over of useful books, by white people, South and North, and by Negroes, which illuminate the problem, even when they do not try to solve it.

Benjamin G. Brawley's "Short History of the American Negro" (Macmillan, 1913), Booker Washington's "Story of the Negro" (Doubleday, 1909), and George S. Merriam's "The Negro and the Nation" (Holt, 1906) should serve for historical information, while "The Negro Year Book" (Negro Year Book Pub. Co.) is a reference book on negro activities.

Two admirable books by Southern writers are Thomas Nelson Page's "The Negro: the Southerner's Problem" (Scribner, 1904), and Mrs. L. H. Hammond's "In Black and White" (Revell, 1914). From a South African point of view is Maurice S. Evans's "Black and White in the Southern States" (Longmans, 1915). One should not fail to see W. E. B. Du Bois's "The Souls of Black Folk" (McClurg), his "The Negro" (Holt, 1915), Booker Washington's "The Future of the American Negro" (Small, Maynard, 1900), and Kelly Miller's "An Appeal to Conscience" (Macmillan, 1918). Similar in their nature are Benjamin Brawley's "Your Negro Neighbor" (Macmillan, 1918), and his "The Negro in Literature and Art in the United States" (Duffield, 1918).

Professor A. B. Hart's valuable study is called "The Southern South" (Appleton, 1910). The problem is directly tackled in William P. Pickett's "The Negro Problem" (Putnam, 1909), Edward Eggleston's "The Ultimate Solution of the American Negro Problem" (Badger, 1913), William H. Thomas's "The American Negro" (Macmillan, 1901), and John M. Mecklin's "Democracy and Race Friction; a Study in Social Ethics" (Macmillan, 1914). A legal work, perhaps more useful for reference than for continued reading, is Gilbert T. Stephenson's "Race Distinctions in American Law" (Appleton, 1910). William J. Edwards, in "Twenty-Five Years in the Black Belt" (Cornhill Co., 1919), describes the Southern Negro, and Mary W. Ovington's "Half a Man" (Longmans, 1911) treats the status of the Negro in New York.

W. H. Collins is the author of "The Truth About Lynching and the Negro in the South" (Neale, 1918), which he describes as a plea "that the South be made safe for the white race." The authoritative work on lynching is James E. Cutler's "Lynch Law" (Longmans, 1905).

EDMUND LESTER PEARSON

Books Received

FICTION

Johnston, Mary. Michael Forth. Harper. $1.75 net.

Ostrander, Isabel. Ashes to Ashes. McBride. $1.65 net.

BIOGRAPHY AND HISTORY

Barton, George. Celebrated Spies and Famous Mysteries of the Great War. Boston: Page. $2 net.

Glenconner, Pamela. Edward Wyndham Tennant: A Memoir. Lane. $5 net.

Palmer, Frederick. Our Greatest Battle. Dodd, Mead. $2.50.

Von Tirpitz, Admiral. My Memoirs. 2 volumes. Dodd, Mead. $7.50.

ESSAYS AND CRITICISM

Holliday, R. C. Broome Street Straws. Doran.

Holliday, R. C. Peeps at People. Doran.

GIFT BOOKS

Gibbons, H. D. Paris Vistas. Century.

GOVERNMENT AND ECONOMICS

Clark, N. M. Common Sense in Labor Management. Harper. $4 net.

Hollander, J. H. American Citizenship and Economic Welfare. Johns Hopkins Press. $1.25.

MISCELLANEOUS

Bairnsfather, Bruce. From Mud to Mufti. Putnam.

Bates, K. L. Sigurd Our Golden Collie, and Other Comrades of the Road. Dutton. $2 net.

Derby, Richard. "Wade in Sanitary!" The Story of a Division Surgeon in France. Putnam.

THE REVIEW

Vol. 2, No. 35 — New York, Saturday, January 10, 1920 — FIFTEEN CENTS

Contents

Brief Comment 21
Editorial Articles:
The Raid on the Reds 22
The "Nation" Will Say—— 23
Forgotten Derelicts of the War 24
The Case of Johns Hopkins 24
The Problem of Russia 25
The Outlook in Europe 26
Life or Death For the Railroads? By Thomas F. Woodlock 28
Washington Gossip 29
The Jazz Journals. By W. J. Ghent 30
Correspondence 32
Book Reviews:
At the Front in Poetry 33
An Old Republican 34
Two "Latest Efforts" 36
Business—and Aristotle 36
The Run of the Shelves 37
Drama:
On the London Stage. By William Archer 38
Books and the News: Profit-Sharing. By Edmund Lester Pearson 40

IT may be invidious to single out Mr. Sherwood, Democrat, of Ohio, as conspicuously silly, in a Congress which abounds in silliness; but that is the natural consequence of his remark on the resolution to recognize a de facto government in Ireland happening to be printed conspicuously in the news dispatches. "This resolution, if adopted, need not necessarily disturb our friendly relations with Great Britain," such is Mr. Sherwood's sage opinion. And indeed he may be right; but if so, it is for the reason that Congressional "resoluting" on foreign affairs—so long as the resolution does not get to the point of Presidential approval—has come to be set down, not only at home but abroad, as pure buncombe. But it is cold comfort for an American to think that, in a time so fraught with momentous issues, he must feel that these fantastic tricks indulged in by the national legislature are rendered harmless only by being ridiculous.

WHILE the nomination campaign on the Democratic side has not yet even begun to take shape, there is at least one candidacy on the Republican side which is rapidly approaching the stage of thorough organization. Every turn, therefore, in the movement in behalf of General Wood is of keen public interest. Col. Edward B. Clark, a close personal and political friend who expects to take a prominent part in the management of his campaign in the Middle West, throws doubt on the recent report that General Wood intends soon to resign his commission. Colonel Clark says:

> I suppose he will be governed by circumstances. There is nothing in law, tradition, precedent, or public sentiment to require that he should hand in his resignation. The cases of Zachary Taylor, Winfield Scott, George B. McClellan, U. S. Grant, and Winfield S. Hancock furnish five distinct precedents where the candidates were army officers and remained in the army all through the campaign.

But it can not be too strongly insisted that the demands of the present time are wholly different from those of the bygone days here referred to. Even as to those times, it is worth while to remark, for example, that the figure which General Hancock cut in relation to the comparatively simple issue of the tariff is a memory to be conjured up for warning rather than for example. But to-day we are confronted not only with a mass of problems novel in character and stupendous in importance, but also with the outstanding fact of profound doubt and division concerning them within each of the two great parties. In this situation personal qualities, however desirable, are far from constituting a sufficient basis for the acceptance of any man as the leader of his party in the approaching campaign. All signs point to its being, with the exception of the campaign of 1860, the most important and critical Presidential contest since the formation of the Union. There is not much time to spare, between now and the meeting of the Republican National Convention, for a fair exhibit of the temper and position of a man whose career, like that of General Wood, has lain outside the main currents of politics. Let us hope that he will come out in the open in ample time for the formation of a sound judgment upon his title to the nomination.

CONGRESSMAN-ELECT Berger, who is bearing the red banner to Congress or to jail—he does not seem to regard the distinction as important,—has paused in New York long enough to say:

> I opposed the war, because I said it was a commercial war. What did we get out of it? A Constitution on the way to becoming a "scrap of paper," the "flu," prohibition, the high cost of living, and government by injunction.

One could conclude that, as a commercial venture, the war was sufficiently a failure to reconcile even Mr. Berger to it.

THE following gem of misinformation is from the New Republic:

> Semenov is a flashy brigand, vastly inferior in ability and infinitely more brutal and unprincipled than Pancho Villa. With a cosmopolitan band of a few hundreds of cutthroats, Semenov has managed to pick a living out of the ill-defended settlements around Lake Baikal. That is all he amounts to.

Without attempting a brief for Semenov or a defense of all of his acts, it is only fair to say that for many months he carried on, almost alone, a patriotic struggle against the Bolsheviks of Siberia, with a little army of which more than one-half were Russian officers serving as privates. That he did not "pick a living out of the ill-defended settlements around Lake Baikal" is evident from the fact that he has not been in that neighborhood and his headquarters is several hundred miles from it. In spite of his friction with the Siberian Government and with the American Expeditionary Forces, it is just to record that Semenov was chosen Ataman by the Baikal Cossacks and is a military leader of undoubted ability.

COUNT Tolstoy has been called the spiritual father of Bolshevism. But for his teachings the Russian people would not so readily have accepted Lenin and Trotsky as its saviors. If this is true, the child is an ungrateful monster. What it owes to the father it repays to his daughter, the Countess Alexandra Lvovna Tolstoy, with persecution and imprisonment. She is charged with plotting against the Soviet Government. If she is guilty of that crime, it only proves that there can be little left of her father's teachings in the practice of the Moscow dictatorship.

IRISH leaders are seldom conspicuous for moderation. Their emotional temperament unfits them for the quiet consideration of their opponents' views. Colonel Lynch is an exception to the rule. It is a pleasure to draw attention to his strong disavowal of the Sinn Fein movement, which, he declared, was doomed to failure because of its exclusive reliance on violence, and because of its religious intolerance. If Irish freedom is what Sinn Fein is striving for, it should not be made a Roman Catholic issue. Colonel Lynch has the fullest right to speak as he did. Though himself a Roman Catholic, he fought with the Calvinist Boers against Great Britain, realizing that a people's claim to autonomy is not qualified by its religious creed. "We disparage our cause by bigotry and religious fanaticism. Take out the religious element, and we have gone far to solve the problem." The Sinn Fein leaders might well take the lesson to heart. They will never gain political freedom for their following at the cost of religious freedom for their Protestant compatriots.

A SUMMARY of industrial conditions in Belgium, recently given out by the Guaranty Trust Company, is highly encouraging. Belgian coal production has now reached nearly ninety per cent. of the rate of output for 1913, and the coal export has served appreciably to strengthen Belgian exchange. Receipts from both freight and passenger traffic on Belgian railroads for the first nine months of 1919 exceed the figures for 1913, but this does not indicate an actual increase in business done, as both passenger and freight tariffs are about double the 1913 level. Labor conditions have been rather better in Belgium than elsewhere, as only 42,000 workers were involved in strikes during the first six months of the year, for which alone figures are available. Of 194 strikes, 108 were compromised by arbitration. Twenty-nine ended in straight victory for the workmen, thirty-seven for the employers. A fifty-million-pound loan to the Belgian Government by London capitalists proves that British finance holds a high opinion of Belgian stability. From January to September inclusive, the purchase of American goods amounted to an average of $37 for every Belgian.

THE week beginning January 17 (Poor Richard's birthday) is to be National Thrift Week. Not a few of us, perhaps, are inclined to think that we may as well make up our minds this year to about fifty-two such weeks. But we have only to open our eyes in the street to see that there are multitudes who have more, "more than they ever dreamed of," and spend it as fast as they get it. If things are high now, they say, never mind; get them while the getting is good; they'll be higher by and by. Most assuredly they will, unless some considerable number of people who have the money in hand to buy them with are willing to forego furs and jewels and silk shirts, or whatever according to their scale of living may be conveniently symbolized by these things. What the cheap dollar buys now of this sort of merchandise will not be worth much by and by. Louis XV spoke of a deluge. This side of a deluge, which very likely won't come, there may be a highly uncomfortable succession of rainy days. When they come, the cheap dollar that has been prudently laid aside will bring returns that are worth waiting for.

The Raid on the Reds

THE sudden descent of the Department of Justice on thousands of members of the Communist and Communist Labor parties has been received with enthusiastic applause in some quarters, and with gloomy misgiving in other quarters equally entitled to respect. For ourselves, we are frank to say that we find it impossible to estimate the merits of the case. Until the Government places before the public a coherent and comprehensive statement of the nature of its own proceedings, it is impossible to form a trustworthy judgment. Up to the present time, rumors which it is difficult to trace to any authoritative source, and scraps of information or stray expressions of feeling coming from one official or another, are all that we have to go upon.

This in itself is a defect whose seriousness it would be difficult to overstate. Right or wrong, judicious or ill-advised, the result of careful thought or of spectacular zeal—whichever of these designations fits the case, certain it is that what we are witnessing is a novel and extraordinary proceeding. It is not right that the country should look on agape, making all sorts of wild guesses as to what it actually is and what it means. Under what provisions of what statutes is the Government acting? To what extent, if at all, are the arrests being made on the ground that we are still formally in a state of war? Are the persons arrested engaged in actual conspiracies, and, if so, what is the nature of these conspiracies? Is the Government seeking to catch in its net all aliens who entertain revolutionary opinions, or only those who are connected with agitations directed toward immediate action? Without disclosing any administrative secrets necessary for the successful prosecution of its work, the Department of Justice could give the American people adequate information on these points. And not only have the people a right to demand this information, but in the absence of it the harm that will be done by unsettlement of the public mind, and misinterpretation of the Government's policy, will far outweigh the good that may be accomplished by any deportations or punishments which may result from the raid.

The misgiving which, in the absence of a clear understanding, the situation naturally arouses is accentuated by a statement which Attorney-General Palmer has taken occasion to issue in relation to his proposed law against "sedition." Such a law is necessary, he says, "in order that the Department of Justice may deal forcibly, effectively, and quickly with seditionists who are American citizens, but who are seeking to injure or destroy the Government." He asserts that "the country's response to the introduction of this measure leaves no excuse for a single moment's unnecessary delay in the passage of it." This would be absurd, even if "the country's response" had been ten times as widespread and ten times as emphatic as there is any evidence of its actually having been. If there is any measure upon which the mature and conscientious judgment of responsible legislators is absolutely essential it is a measure directed against "sedition." The popular impulse to get rid of what is offensive to popular feeling can not be accepted as a guide in such a matter. It must be threshed out in full and free debate; and upon those members of Congress whose intelligence, knowledge of history, and grasp on fundamental maxims of legislation enable them to judge of the actual, and not the desired, effect of such a measure rests the solemn responsibility of opposing it to the utmost of their power if they regard it as mischievous. The burden of proof—first, that any measure of the kind is necessary, and, secondly that the particular measure is a good one—rests heavily upon its advocates.

We trust that, when the facts are fully known, it will turn out that the Government has acted well in making the arrests. If it has not taken advantage of the technicality of a state of war, if it contemplates only the deportation of aliens who upon a reasonable interpretation of our laws come clearly within their inhibitions, if it is not aiming to produce a state of vague terror among all persons who hold radical opinions, then what it is doing is not only justifiable, but necessary and salutary. The notion that a country is in duty bound to admit or retain aliens who seek to subvert its institutions is a grotesque perversion of the idea of the right of asylum. Of the merits of an insurrection, or even a conspiracy, directed against a foreign government, we are not required to judge; but when a foreigner comes over to plot against our own government or institutions, it is our business to look into the matter, and it is our right and our duty to keep him out or put him out, if we think his presence sufficiently detrimental to make it worth while.

The idea that nothing short of imminent peril to the nation can justify such exclusion or expulsion has no basis either in principle or in the practice of liberal governments. Moreover, in our own country the question is of dimensions never approached in any of the older civilized nations. With a large proportion of our population consisting of recent immigrants or their children, the character of this immigration, and the way in which that character may be affected by the infusion of even a few thousand active and determined agitators, is a matter of vital importance to our national well-being. A great deal is said in radical quarters, and in some quarters that are not radical, of the wave of hysteria that is alleged to be sweeping over the country. A certain amount of hysteria there undoubtedly is, but the amount of it is grossly exaggerated in the imagination of the radicals. Very few people are afraid that the country may go to pieces to-morrow; but a great many people think that alien plotters should be got rid of, even if their capacity for mischief falls infinitely short of fatal danger to the country. In fact, the radicals' outcry over hysteria is itself about the clearest case of hysteria in sight.

There are two things which the situation urgently demands—first, a clear statement of the Government's position and policy, and secondly, such a shaping of that policy as will yield a maximum of direct good with a minimum of accompanying evil. What is wanted is swift and effective treatment of cases which everybody will recognize as serious, together with a prompt and generous freeing of all others from distress or terror. Above all, it should, as far as possible, be made plain that it is not the dissemination of objectionable opinions in lawful ways that the Government seeks to suppress; that the traditional rights of free speech, as understood in our country and in England, are to be respected; that such repression as does take place is entered upon from a sober sense of duty and in no spirit of sensationalism, and is carried out in strict accordance with a reasonable view of the law. Unless this spirit is made manifest, the benefits of the move will be more than counterbalanced by the resentment aroused in millions of breasts over methods which a free people can not but regard as fraught with danger to their liberties.

The "Nation" Will Say—

THROUGH the kind offices of Sir Oliver Lodge we have been put in possession of what the Nation, in a forthcoming issue, will say:

"The naturally timid, and for the moment thoroughly frightened, officials who are busily weaving the last poor shreds of democracy into a gravecloth for themselves and the system they so pitifully represent, have been stampeded by the clamors of the capitalistic and jingoistic press into the very sort of 'direct action' which they profess so much to deplore. Could anything be better calculated to hasten the coming revolution than this last bit of melodramatic emulation of the methods employed by the police of the late lamented Czar? Since there is no plot against democratic government in America; since, in short, there is no democratic government left to plot against, it is necessary to invent a plot. A Saint Bartholomew's Eve, spectacularly staged throughout the country, is the lamentable result.

"We hold no brief for the Communist party or the Communist Labor party. If their members engage in violence they may be curbed by due process of law. But the mere advocacy of violence, or the violent advocacy of anything (they amount to the same thing), does not warrant equally violent and far less excusable suppression. It is only in an atmosphere of revolution that those generous impulses, that passionate dedication to justice, that clear-eyed scrutiny of ideas, as a result of which the world of to-morrow is born, can generate themselves. But fortunately you can not kill an aspiration by deporting helpless foreigners. The celestial radiance of which these have caught a glimpse will shine more brightly than ever in the faces of the spiritual brethren whom they leave behind.

"Most of all, we find ourselves opposed to this disastrous attempt to distinguish between aliens and Americans. In undertaking to deport wholesale those who have not submitted to a hollow ceremony of declaring allegiance to a form of government which has in any true sense ceased to exist, we are drawing off the very life blood of the country. The ideals of Washington and of Lincoln, are they not more alive to-day in the warm heart of the recent immigrant than in the Prussianized 'American' who in their name commits a deed to which history congratulates herself on being unable to furnish a parallel? Germania capta thus leads her captors captive.

"The utter folly of it makes the blood boil! If Mr. Palmer and his minions wish to make violent revolutionists of us all, they have found the way. The blood and tears which they cause to be shed, instead of destroying, will most miraculously quicken the seeds of revolution. What might have come in a hundred years will now come in ten. What might have come peacefully will now come as it may. Prophetic voices that should have been given careful heed are stopped with violence. But others will take up the cry. For one that is silenced to-day a thousand will be heard to-morrow. It is all very regrettable."

Forgotten Derelicts of War

RESPONSES continue to be made to appeals in behalf of stricken populations in the Old World. One case, however, has either escaped our attention or been shunted into the background, which in normal times would have caused a shudder of horror throughout the whole civilized world. This is the case of the German and Austrian prisoners of war in Siberia, numbering perhaps 140,000 at the beginning of winter, and now apparently doomed as a whole to death in its most horrible and repulsive forms. Most of these men-that-were have been herded in prison camps for four and five years, not only cut off from their families and all that made life worth while, but short of food, without medical aid, and deprived of diversion. In mental and moral state they have been reduced to the level of animals.

With the best will in the world the Siberian government could do little for them; it could not even take care of its own millions of hapless refugees pouring in from European Russia. Time after time Admiral Kolchak begged that steps be taken to repatriate them, but no help came. To picture what must happen to them now, after the collapse of Kolchak's Government, and in the rigors of a Siberian winter, is to call forth a nightmare of horror from which the mind recoils.

Some private individuals and organizations made noble efforts to do something to meet the situation, but it was a problem that transcended private enterprise. It was manifestly impossible to raise adequate funds by public appeals, even if time permitted. It was a task to be undertaken by Governments, and pre-eminently by the American Government. It meant quick decision, prompt organization and an appropriation of perhaps $5,000,000, to be repaid eventually by the home Governments concerned. The effect of such an act on the part of America would have been out of all proportion to the cost. The responsibility for inaction rests squarely upon our Department of State. Plans were discussed, memoranda written, and the buck was passed and repassed, but nothing was done. It is the old story of bureaucracy over again. But Secretary Lansing must sometimes spend uncomfortable moments when it is borne in on him that a little fearless and energetic action on his part would have spared the agony and death of all these thousands and given happiness to other thousands bereaved.

The Case of Johns Hopkins

THE exact plan upon which Mr. Rockefeller's magnificent gift of fifty million dollars is to be devoted to the urgently necessary object of raising the salaries of teachers in colleges and universities doubtless remains to be determined. It has been the policy of the General Education Board, says Dr. Wallace Buttrick, its president, "to make contributions to endowment conditioned upon the raising of additional supplementary sums by the institutions aided." How closely this policy will be followed in the present extraordinary emergency remains to be seen, but the keen judgment which the board has exercised throughout its history may be counted on to preside over its action in this instance. It is desirable, however, that the country at large should appreciate the peculiar situation of one university that has done unique service to the cause of American education.

Johns Hopkins University was founded a little more than forty years ago. Its chief energies were concentrated upon what in this country had theretofore been thought of as merely an undeveloped annex to the main body of a university—the graduate school. What Johns Hopkins really did was to establish for the first time in America a true university, so far as regards those fields of science and learning which lie outside the professional training of lawyers and physicians. It is impossible to overestimate the stimulus which the Baltimore institution thus gave to universities all over the country. From Massachusetts to California, from Wisconsin to Texas, the idea of the university has become as familiar in America as it was unfamiliar forty years ago.

Striking as was this achievement, it is a singular fact that when, a dozen years after the opening of Johns Hopkins, a modest special endowment—half a million dollars—enabled it to open a medical school, the achievement was repeated. It is acknowledged on all hands, and has been acknowledged by no one more handsomely than by President Eliot of Harvard, that the Johns Hopkins Medical School lifted medical education in America to an entirely new plane. Both on the medical side and on the "philosophical" side, the country is now dotted with institutions that are carrying on as a matter of course the kind of work for which Johns Hopkins set the example.

But the peculiarity to which we made reference at the outset is something other than this. Not only on account of its comparative newness, but even more on account of the fact that the alumni of Johns Hopkins are in the main men whom it has trained for scientific research, for teaching, and for the practice of medicine, it has no considerable body of wealthy graduates to draw upon for aid. In comparison with Yale, Harvard, Princeton and the rest, its possibilities in this respect are pitifully small. Confronted with the present extraordinary situation, it is out of the question for it to make the kind of "drive" which its sister universities are so successfully carrying on. The people of Baltimore have on various occasions responded handsomely to its call; but its service has been a national, not a local, service. We have no doubt that all this will be duly considered by the General Education Board; but it is on every account earnestly to be hoped that throughout the country there will be found men of large means whose intelligent perception of the facts will lead them to give generous help where help is at once so urgently needed and so abundantly deserved.

The Problem of Russia

THE problem of Russia does not stand still, and he who would formulate a policy to solve it must needs mount it on wheels to keep up with the rapidly changing situations. A year ago prompt assistance to the sound and loyal forces that were struggling to restore the Russian national state would have cut the cancer of Bolshevism out of Moscow and saved the Russian people years of suffering and degradation. It was not necessary to send troops or to interfere in Russia's domestic concerns. There was needed only a unified plan and concerted action in supplying material needs. Instead, we had the Prinkipo proposal, the Bullitt Mission, the disgraceful abandonment of Odessa, the hampering intervention in Siberia, and other démarches whose stupidities would be laughable did they not bring tragedy in their train.

Now a new situation has arisen, a situation that we must face squarely, not letting past mistakes blind us to present exigencies. The national movements against the Bolsheviks have crumbled or are crumbling. Kolchak's army has practically ceased to exist. Denikin, with his volunteers, of whom he was able to arm but a sixth, swept up to within a hundred and twenty miles of Moscow, and now he is pushed back to the sea and faces destruction. A brief space may see the whole of Russia once more dominated by the Bolshevik autocracy, this time disposing of an army of a half a million men, disciplined and well-equipped.

Viewing the Russian situation to-day, one turns involuntarily to the French Revolution for analogies, dangerous and misleading as historical analogies frequently are. The parallelism is startling, despite the difference in time, in economic conditions, in race and psychology. It is of course unfair to compare the political revolution in France with the German-made plot to disintegrate the Russian army and reduce Russia to chaos; or the Girondin vision of bringing the blessings of liberty to all peoples, with the internationalist Bolshevist propaganda to overturn all organized governments. But the results were the same. Then as now, divided counsel and delay, followed by haphazard and ineffective aid to local risings and movements, brought about the organization of great opposing armies. To create and discipline these armies the same method of terror was used, though on an infinitely smaller scale. Civil and military leaders sprang from the proletariat. National consciousness was aroused to a pitch unknown before.

Will the coming events in Russia continue the analogy of the French Revolution? In two respects at least the probability is present. When in France the armies of the Republic were victorious on all fronts and the necessity for the Terror had ended, the people rose against the authors of the Terror and took swift vengeance on Robespierre and Saint-Just. In Russia to-day the Bolsheviks, or Communists, who rule with an iron hand, are few in number and are the object of universal hatred. Even granted the inertia and resignation of the Russians, it is unlikely that Lenin and Trotsky can long survive the conclusion of the present civil war. It would not be surprising if the next act in the Russian drama would be a revolution from the inside that would overthrow the gang that for two years has tortured and misruled Russia and expended millions of Russian loot in debauching the ignorant and susceptible of other lands.

The next phase, as in France, may possibly be the emergence of a dictator and the development of a new imperialism. This latter indeed is already under way with the present leaders and is becoming more and more arrogant and threatening. Here is an army of at least half a million, and unlimited reserves to draw upon, freed from the pressure of Kolchak and Denikin, ready to be led westward against Poland. It is like a herd that has cropped the herbage to the roots and must seek new pasture. It will still shout the slogans of the Revolution as in 1796, but it will have visions of plunder and its leaders will dream dreams of conquest. Lenin asserts that with the collapse of the anti-Bolshevik movements and civil war, his purpose is to settle down to the tasks of peace and the reorganization of Russia's economic life, but he can not expect anyone to believe him, for he has by terror and by disruption rendered this impossible under his régime. Rather there looms the spectre of a bitter, revengeful, and despairing Germany making common cause with a movement that menaces the very foundations of her enemies and taskmasters.

What can be done to avert the menace? What new policy can be adopted that can save Europe? First of all, there is the question of the blockade. It is likely that this will be lifted; indeed, if Esthonia makes peace with the Soviet Government the blockade can hardly be maintained. The blockade really served its purpose in the earlier period by preventing the criminals at Moscow from disposing of their stolen gold and looted property to supply the needs of the Red Army at home and spread revolution abroad. But the blockade could only be effective as auxiliary to active assistance to the anti-Bolshevik forces, and when this was withheld, it ceased to have a sound basis.

It is hardly thinkable that we can recognize the present Soviet Government. Its crimes against civilization are too heinous; its promises of reform too transparently false. Apparently, by our deportations of Russian Bolsheviks and our official statement regarding them, we have closed the door to any such suggestion. But our policy now must be that of non-interference. Those who from the beginning have been for non-interference will plume themselves on their superior wisdom and foresight. But they were not wise, even those who were honest, for interference was always justifiable while the Bolsheviks were carrying on war against us in our own country and when real assistance to the anti-Bolshevik forces would have restored a friendly Russia and spared untold needless sacrifices. The present situation has resulted, not from interference, but from the lack of adequate interference.

If the present tyrants of Moscow are overthrown from within, if they are supplanted by a régime that recognizes the sanctity of agreements and obligations, that secures to its people the rights of life and property, that shows good faith and honest intention, then we can enter into relations with it and join wholeheartedly in the tasks of reconstruction, carrying out our oft-repeated pledges of friendship to the Russian people. But if the present régime continues, threatening to destroy the fruits of European culture and to embroil all Asia, then we must gird up our loins and prepare to defend our civilization in the inevitable struggle.

The Outlook in Europe

THE last sun of the old year set upon a Europe little brighter for more than thirteen months of armistice than it was in the depth of the war. Hunger, labor unrest, race antagonism, frontier disputes, are calamities more keenly felt since the stimulus of patriotic warfare has ceased to uphold the suffering nations.

For a short while it seemed as if the prospect was beginning to brighten. The Germans, we were told, would, before Christmas, have signed the protocol by which the treaty would be put into effect, and d'Annunzio was going to surrender Fiume to the government of Signor Nitti. But neither forecast has come true. A disparity of 100,000 tons of maritime equipment between the German figures and the estimates of the Allies' experts is responsible for the delay in the former case. The sending of an Allied Naval Commission to Hamburg, Danzig, and Bremen to ascertain the facts and revise the estimates, if proved to be incorrect, shows a disposition on the part of the Entente to admit the possibility of a mistake, and while insisting on the payment of an indemnity for the scuttled fleet of Scapa Flow, to take Germany's basic needs into account. But while this question appears in a fair way of reaching a solution, other causes of delay are cropping up. Herr Ebert has echoed Comrade Noske's protest against the Entente's demand for the surrender of the accused German officers, and will resign the Chancellorship if the Allies insist on their extradition, and the alleged presence in Upper Silesia of 80,000 German soldiers, including large numbers of Von der Goltz's men, is a new obstacle in the way of the treaty's coming into force, as the Supreme Council demands their removal before the 20,000 allied soldiers occupy the plebiscite area.

The expected solution of the Fiume tangle has also suffered a setback. D'Annunzio has changed his mind since the recent conference in London induced him to enter into an agreement with Signor Nitti for the surrender of Fiume. He deems the guarantees offered him by the Government insufficient to warrant his leaving, in spite of the fact that the twice-held plebiscite on the question of accepting General Badoglio's proposals for the substitution of d'Annunzio's forces by Italian regulars resulted in 75 per cent. of the votes being cast in favor of acceptance. However, this dwindling of his following and the increased prestige of Signor Nitti, both at home and abroad, are indications that the coming decision lies not with the poet, but, as it ought to do, with the Italian Government. The Premier's determination to come to a settlement with the Jugo-Slavs themselves is the wisest move he could make, as a solution of the problem agreed to by the two interested parties is less likely to meet with opposition in London and Paris. The bad impression created in Italy by the sensational speech of M. Clemenceau has given some justification to those pessimists who hold that Italy stands isolated and can not rely on the willingness of England and France to make concessions on the Adriatic question without the consent of the United States. There is, indeed, some show of animosity in Paris towards Italy, which may have its source in the recent revelation of a secret Anglo-Italian agreement which—in exchange for Italy's approval of the so-called Lloyd George-Wilson agreement touching the division of 3,000,000 tons of German merchant shipping—promises Italy full compensation in kind for her losses at sea, whereas a similar repayment for the loss of French merchant shipping has been refused to France. But this dissension, which is apt to disturb the good relations between France and England rather than those between France and Italy, proves the latter country's isolation to exist only in the fancy of Italian pessimists, and there is little to warrant the conclusion that England and France are not inclined to make concessions without the consent of the United States.

On the contrary, the Entente Powers are showing a firm determination to continue their peace transactions in spite of Mr. Polk's departure from Paris and the uncertainty as to America's attitude. The new Hungarian Government of Karl Huszar has been invited to send a peace delegation to Neuilly, and Lloyd George stated on December 18 that "the delay in the peace-making with Turkey was due to the necessity of knowing what the United States intended to do. We are now entitled to say," he added, "that we have waited up to the very minute we promised America, and, without wishing to deprive America of the honor of sharing in the guardianship of Christian communities, the Allies have decided to make peace with Turkey at the earliest possible moment." This statement, to be sure, must be taken with a grain of salt: America's indecision is not the sole cause of the delay, but serves as a useful pretext to screen the fear of the diplomats at Paris lest the broaching of the question how to dispose of Constantinople may lead to fresh dissension between the Allied Powers. The French, distrustful of a British mandate over Turkey, favor a plan which would leave the Turk in possession of the city under sufficient guarantees for the freedom of navigation through the Straits, and Venizelos claims a mandate over the city for Greece, which would find little favor in Rome.

In their Baltic policy the Entente Powers are also steering a course contrary to the one which the American delegation would have approved. The latter's standpoint has always been opposed to the dismemberment of Russia resulting from the establishment of independent border States, Poland of course being exempt from this American ban. The Baltic States with their great seaports, Narva and Reval in Esthonia, Riga, Windau, and Libau in Latvia, are the lungs through which Russia draws her breath from the sea. That accounts for the endeavors of Sasonov and other leading Russians of the old régime in Paris to prevent the recognition by the Powers of these provinces as independent States. France and England, especially their military experts, are of a different opinion from the one held by these Russians and the American delegates. General Foch, only a fortnight ago, was for charging General Niessel with a political mission to the Baltic States in order to solidify them against the Bolsheviki under at least the moral encouragement of the Allies. The Supreme Council, however, voted to refer this matter to the respective Allied Governments, which meant an indefinite postponement, and meanwhile one of the three States in question, after a protracted parley at Dorpat, has signed a preliminary armistice with the Russian Soviet Government. The recent successes of Trotsky's Reds and the chronic hesitancy in the policy of the Entente are bound to make Esthonia and her sisters more inclined to accept peace proposals from Moscow than to let themselves be used for the protection of Europe in the manner proposed by General Foch. Poland alone seems willing to undertake that task; and she is better equipped for it economically since the Supreme Council has awarded East Galicia to her under a mandate of twenty-five years. Politically, however, this grant may have a weakening effect on Poland, as it creates within her borders an Ukrainian irredenta, and a feeling of hostility towards Poland among her Ukrainian neighbors.

While the diplomats in Paris are thus contriving means to keep Bolshevism in check, hunger, its most powerful ally, is rapidly gaining ground all over Eastern and Central Europe. Litvinov recently admitted to a correspondent of the Daily Herald at Copenhagen that Russia's return to capitalism is unavoidable unless other countries are converted in time to the communism of the soviets, an unambiguous call to arms for the radical elements which are responsible for the labor unrest in the cities of Europe. Some twenty millions of people in the larger centres of Finland, Poland, Austria and other parts of Central Europe are staring starvation in the face, and there is no better soil for the seeds of revolt than the despair of the hungry masses. Speedy assistance may avert a catastrophe, but the extent of the misery makes all efforts seem vain. For the relief of Austria alone, $100,000,000 is said to be needed. One can understand that, under these circumstances, the populations of the Austrian border districts would like to change their citizenship for that of a self-supporting adjoining State. Vorarlberg wants to be incorporated with Switzerland, Western Hungary with Hungary, and similar movements for secession are on foot in Salzburg and the Tyrol. But in this instance the right of self-determination is appealed to in vain, for the Supreme Council, some three weeks ago, communicated to Dr. Renner its decision to maintain integrally the territory of the Republic of Austria. Thus the makers of the new Europe, within a year of its incomplete organization, are called upon to protect their creation against the application of the very principle on the basis of which they refashioned the map of Europe—a bad omen for the durability of their work.

THE REVIEW

A weekly journal of political and general discussion

Published by

The National Weekly Corporation
140 Nassau Street, New York

Fabian Franklin, President
Harold de Wolf Fuller, Treasurer

Rodman Gilder, Business Manager

Subscription price, five dollars a year in advance. Fifteen cents a copy. Foreign postage, one dollar extra; Canadian postage, fifty cents extra. Foreign subscriptions may be sent to Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons, Ltd., 24, Bedford St., Strand, London, W. C. 2, England.
Copyright, 1920, in the United States of America
Editors

FABIAN FRANKLIN
HAROLD de WOLF FULLER

Life or Death for the Railroads?

THE railroads of the United States are to be returned to their owners in two months. They have been in the hands of the Government since December 31, 1917. Under Government management they have failed to earn their "rental" by well over half a billion dollars. The operating deficit, which has been supplied from the public funds, is estimated at some $550,000,000 for 1918 and 1919. The ratio of operating expense to gross earnings, which was about 70 per cent. in 1917, was in 1919 about 85 per cent. The railroads owe the Government a considerable sum of money for additions, betterment, and equipment made under Government management with reference mainly to war needs rather than to anything else. Two-thirds of the companies are at present short of earning their fixed charges—excluding dividends—and in some notable cases, chiefly in the East, the business of certain roads has been in large part destroyed by diversion of the traffic to other roads. The physical condition of roadbed and equipment is generally below standard. As things stand at present it is not in the least degree an exaggeration to say that the Government, which took over at the end of 1917 a solvent system of railroads in reasonably good physical condition, is handing it back to owners in a state of physical deterioration and financial insolvency. For correction of this condition the owners must look to the Conference Committee of House and Senate. That committee has before it two bills—the Esch bill, which passed the House, and the Cummins bill, which passed the Senate. The purpose of both bills is to provide for resumption of private enterprise in American railroad management.

Between these two bills there is a difference wide as the poles. Some weeks ago, in the pages of the Review, I pointed out a fundamental defect in the Cummins bill, which was that, while providing for a general regional tariff schedule, the rates of which were fair, from the shipper's viewpoint, it limited the right of individual railroads to profits earned under that schedule. But we all know the reason for this compromise of principle; it was made to satisfy the combined selfishness and ignorance of what politicians commonly suppose to be "the people," so as to make them willing to allow living rates to the regional group as a whole. It was believed that, under the Cummins bill, which laid down for the first time in American railroad history not merely an intelligent and sound rule of rate-making, but the only intelligent and sound rule for rate-making that can be laid down, and also provided a concrete rule for a minimum return on capital invested in the railroad business, the regulating authority would have behind it a support strong enough to give it the courage to make, when necessary, increases in freight rates. Therefore, there was ground for believing that the Cummins bill "principle"—if in its mangled state one can call it a principle—would at least give the railroads a living and would enable private enterprise to become at least partially effective.

The Esch bill may be summed up in a word as the perpetuation of the miserable system of control of railroads which in 1914, when the war broke out, was gradually but surely starving the last sparks of life from the carcass. It reiterates the same ridiculous statement that rates are to be "fair and reasonable," but is very careful to avoid laying down any rule by which "fair and reasonable" rates are to be ascertained and put into effect. It places on the back of the Interstate Commerce Commission, already grotesquely overloaded with powers which it does not and cannot effectively exercise, yet additional burdens and responsibilities. About the only thing that the bill does to clarify the rate situation is in the direction of limiting the power of individual States to hamper the making or disturb the structure of interstate rates. Under the Esch bill we shall have the same wearisome, long drawn out machinery of "rate cases" with the same wretched results. We shall have the Interstate Commerce Commissioners continually faced with the necessity of doing a most unpopular thing without anyone to whom they can "pass the buck." We shall have the same tiresome and futile lectures on the past misdeeds of railroad men offered as a reason for not giving the railroads living rates. We shall have the "New Haven-Frisco-Rock Island—Rock Island-Frisco-New Haven" chorus chanted from time to time, with an occasional variant on "C., H. & D." Whoever wants an "inside" view of interstate commission psychology may read with profit an article in the December issue of the Atlantic Monthly, written by Judge Anderson, late of the commission. If anyone, after reading that article, can suppose that the state of mind there represented will ever supply living rates for the railroads, he is possessed of more imagination and credulity than I am.

To put it plainly and brutally, if the provisions of the Esch bill govern in the shaping of legislation for the railroads, it will mean simply that the rope is once more around their throats and that final strangulation is a matter of a very short time.

The present rate-tariffs are not sufficient to provide a living for the railroads. The director-general some time ago freely admitted this. He excused his failure to advance rates on the ground that it would only tend to drive the cost of living to yet higher levels, and insisted that it would be the duty of railroad managers to apply for increased rates as soon as they regained control of their properties. It is very difficult to maintain one's patience when offered an argument of this sort. An advance in freight rates next April will be just as effective in advancing the "cost of living" as it would have been last November. Suppose that meantime the Esch bill principle of "fair and reasonable" rates becomes the law of the land and the railroads come before the commission with a request for an advance in freight tariffs large enough to make the companies solvent and enable them to raise new capital so badly needed for improvements and extensions—what will be the result? Can any reasonable man believe that there is any chance of their getting it?

And if they do not get it, what will be the result? The railroads are, to say the least, in relatively poor physical condition; their forces are relatively disorganized and inefficient, and their working capital is insufficient. And they need a billion of dollars new money in the next twelve months! Their chance of getting this from the investing public is about equal to Mr. John D. Rockefeller's chance of getting a billion dollars from Congress for his own personal uses. How long will it be before the present obvious anxiety of the savings banks, life insurance companies, and other agencies for investing the people's money will express itself in an agonized cry for government ownership to make the people's money safe? And how long will it be before government ownership arrives as municipal ownership is arriving in New York City, and by the same route?

The rate question is the heart of the matter. Questions of labor, questions of security issues, questions of extensions, questions of combinations are also involved and are of tremendous importance. But all these are subordinate to the question of rates under any scheme of private enterprise in the conduct of transportation. The Cummins bill contains a scientifically correct rule of rate-making; the Esch bill contains no such rule. Under the Cummins rule private enterprise will find it possible to function in railroad transportation; under the Esch bill it will be impossible. The Conference Committee must choose one or the other of the "principles" represented by the two bills. Upon its choice depends the future of railroad transportation in this country.

THOMAS F. WOODLOCK

Washington Gossip

WHAT is to be the future orientation of the Republican and Democratic parties? This is the question that meets one in all circles in Washington, once one has traversed the immediate topics of the President's health, the return of the railroads, the settlement of the coal strike, and the possible treaty compromise.

Democratic leaders are frankly pessimistic about the future, although they cherish the hope that Republican blunders and dissensions between now and next November may save the situation for them. While realizing that the normal line-up in two-party government is to put the conservatives on the one hand and the radicals on the other, neither party is willing to place itself in either of these two categories. Both parties are dodging the issue and seeking to secure support from both elements within their ranks as previously constituted.

That the issue can not be entirely side-stepped, however, is indicated by the views of a prominent and thoughtful Democratic leader, frankly expressed. According to him, the Democratic party is facing the danger of dissolution. The Gold Democrats left the party in 1896 and, for the most part, have not returned. Although the President and his party had yielded all possible concessions to Labor, this had not sufficed to keep Labor from turning Socialistic. With the development of industry, the South was becoming conservative and only the race problem preserved the South against Republican inroads. The question was whether the Democratic party might not have to become frankly radical.

In Washington circles it is felt that Attorney-General Palmer and ex-Secretary McAdoo are the respective champions of the two opposing elements within the party. Palmer, by his handling of the coal strike and by his vigorous campaign against the Reds, is appealing to the conservatives. McAdoo is reported to have suggested that the name of the Democratic party might well be changed to the American Labor Party, and his recent astonishing statement concerning the earnings of the coal operators during the war is looked upon as a direct appeal for radical support. The influence of President Wilson in the situation is difficult to estimate. On the one hand, it is clear that his idealistic appeals in the past have made a strong impression upon the radical-liberals and many consider them as provocative of social unrest. On the other hand, it is claimed by many political leaders that Wilson's popularity has greatly declined even among radicals and he would no longer be an asset to the Democratic party reconstructed along such lines.

Another factor that may upset these calculations is the growth of a boom for Herbert Hoover as a Democratic candidate. While it is recognized that Mr. Hoover has never been actively identified with politics and that his affiliations have been Republican rather than Democratic, many Democrats believe that by reason of his close association with Mr. Wilson and his administration, he could be persuaded to accept the nomination. They argue that, on the one hand, he would appeal strongly to the conservatives, who desire above all a "business" administration, and, on the other, would attract those who earlier followed the Wilsonian "idealistic" lead. Mr. Hoover is outspokenly anti-Socialistic and his technical and administrative training, joined with his unequalled knowledge of the international economic situation, would make him an extremely strong candidate. On the side of political theory, however, he is regarded as a man whose ideas are crude and undeveloped.

Equally the Republican party is trying to ride two horses. There seems to be a feeling among many Republican leaders in Washington that they are sure of the usual conservative support, and that in any case it only remains to bring back into the fold the Progressives of 1912, no matter how far some of them have developed in radical theory. Senator Johnson of California, an opportunist politician, is plainly endeavoring to get aboard the band-wagon, and Senator Lodge has welcomed his services in fighting the ratification of the unamended covenant. Another indication of the desire to capture the radical vote is seen in the appointment of Col. Raymond Robins to the Advisory Committee on Platform. There is no doubt that Robins is a gifted orator with demagogic power and that he controls a considerable following, but many Republicans view this departure with alarm and believe that it will alienate the better element in the party without securing any appreciable accretion of strength. There is no gainsaying the fact that the radicals regard the Republican party as reactionary and that they do not propose to be taken in by so palpable a trick as the recognition of such men as Robins.

The undercurrent of opinion in Washington seems to be that, in the absence of a clear-cut domestic issue on which the parties can line up, both Democrats and Republicans will seek to avoid the radical-conservative line of demarcation. It is felt that if the Republicans would take a definite stand as the liberal-conservative party they would have a fighting chance to break the Solid South at the next election, and we might see the whole political situation turn back again into the traditional two-party system of Anglo-Saxon democracy. Courage, however, seems to be lacking for making the plunge.

The Jazz Journals

THE jazz of the orchestras has been defined as a "fantastic riot of accents." It is a callithumpian fanfare, with drawling, crawling, sliding notes interrupted by outbursts of calculated noise. "It seeks . . . to sweep from our minds all consideration of other things and to focus our attention upon its own mad, whirling, involved self."

The jazz of the instruments has its analogue in the jazz of the printed page in some of our present-day "journals of opinion." Let us but translate this print to an auditive plane, and one definition will do for both. True, the printed species has several varieties: there is the oracular jazz of one periodical; the jeremiad jazz of another; the pietistic jazz of a third, the explosive jazz of a fourth. And then there is the timid, palpitant jazz of a fifth, expressing itself in relatively subdued accents, though revealing a constant tone of wistfulness for the Bolshevist abandon of its rivals. But though each has its distinctive dominant chord, all run close to type in their cadences of protest. The "fantastic riot of accents" is surcharged with abysmal grief and bitter resentment. The jazz journals overflow with anathema. Wretched and miserable beyond words is this planet of ours, with themselves, Mr. Lenin, Mr. Trotsky, and Mr. Peters as the only stars of hope in a sky perpetually overcast and lowering; and if good is to come (which at best is doubtful), it is to be forwarded mainly by the incessant pouring forth of a stream of fretful and railing accusation.

Ultra-modern are these journals; and though their choral theme is old beyond the computation of years, their tonal gestures must be of the latest. Liberal, or progressive, or radical, or democratic, they call themselves in varying degrees. But their message—what is it? From what central idea does it spring; of what formulated creed is it the expression; to what goal of social welfare is it consciously directed? There is no answer. The "fantastic riot of accents" yields no clue to its own meaning. It is incoherent; its parts are incongruous; in nothing is it constant and consistent except in its unfailing note of nagging discord. Have the Allies, in a particular matter, done thus and so? The fact is "sinister." Have they done exactly the opposite thing? The fact is even more "sinister;" it is "shocking," alike to the intelligence and the sense of decency of mankind. Has the President failed again? Indubitably he has, whatever he did or said. He would equally have failed had he done the opposite. Has Mr. Gompers done this or that? If so, he has but shown again his innate, inflexible reactionism and the tyrannous hold he maintains upon the labor movement. Has he done otherwise? He but reveals himself once more in his ancient character of an unprincipled opportunist, desperately striving to buttress his tottering throne. Does any one, anywhere (other than a Bolshevist, an I. W. W., a pacifist pro-German or something of the sort), offer, by deed or word, a contribution which he imagines may be of some use to the mass of humanity? It is naught, it is naught, saith the journal of jazz, and it goeth on its way reviling.

Reaction, of course, they denounce; and most that they disapprove is plastered with that name; yet they have no qualms about aiding, often in disingenuous ways, the assault of reactionism upon the regular trade unions. They advocate the unity of labor; and yet they foster the agencies which make for dual unions, they encourage the turbulent local in its secession from its international parent, and more or less openly they give their approval to the outlaw strike. Despite their professions, their aim—in so far as they are conscious of an aim other than the production of jazz—is the disunity of labor as labor is now organized.

One and all they clamor against the alleged suppressions and falsifications of news by the "capitalist" press. Valid opinion, they chorus, can be formed only when the facts are impartially recorded. Yet, one and all, they habitually practice the thing they denounce in others; they suppress or distort the fact inimical to the view they present; and granting the accuracy of their overdrawn indictment, the sincere inquirer may still retort that they themselves do, with a fanatic eagerness and accompanied by a blare of pretentious virtue, what the others do as a mere matter of course—an incident of the day's work.

They preach tolerance; and broad tolerance unquestionably they show for some things—for pretense, for fanaticism, for jesuitry, for the double-dealing of the revolutionists who, along with an exoteric message of peace and order, put forth an esoteric message of sabotage and violence. But for the rest—for the lessons of experience, for the standards and sanctions which have knit and held the social fabric together, they reveal an intolerance as extreme as that of a mediæval inquisitor. "Bourgeois" and "banal" and "discarded" are their words of exorcism for accepted things; from the rubbish heaps of the centuries they resurrect and rehabilitate the old, which they label the new and the wonderful. Their tolerance is for the intolerable things which the common sense of mankind has rejected.

All this, with orchestral vehemence, they sound forth as the tonal interpretation of Democracy; the overture to the New Order, the Better Day. Yet it is nothing of the sort. However it is intended, it reveals itself as merely the accompaniment to Reaction. It generates the atmosphere and creates the environment in which Reaction flourishes. It incites mean suspicions, petty antagonisms, a feverish unrest; but it gives to the imagination no vision of a goal and it prompts the mind to no purposeful action.

In their saner days none knew this better than the party Socialists. There was far less of this journalistic jazz before the war—though quite enough for all reasonable needs. But what there was of it drew from the Socialists a stream of ridicule and denunciation. Vague and formless, the mere ebullience of misdirected emotion and incoherent thought, it hampered, they said, the authentic campaign for the emancipation of the workers and the installation of the coöperative commonwealth. No one profited by it, they further said, except the reactionaries; and often they asserted that part of it at least was financed from reactionary sources. But alas! though the Socialists recognized one phase of its harmfulness, they did not recognize another—its infectiousness. Fighting it as an epidemic, they neglected to immunize themselves.

Its infectiousness no one need deny. To many sorts of beings it makes its appeal—but particularly to those who take their adventures and their achievements by way of the imagination. It reaches for the libido; and to each of its devotees it tumultuously expresses his subconscious self. It assures the possession of the faculty denied by nature; it announces the achievement of the impossible deed, the realization of the futile dream. Under its spell the timid find themselves battling at the last ramparts of the capitalist fortress; a lamb of the coteries sees himself a new Lenin, exalted to the headship of the American soviet state; and an embryo Peters cons his "hanging list," long ago compiled, and sharpens his snickersnee for immediate action.

"Your journal is a cup of clear water in a parching desert," writes an entranced being to the chief exponent of jeremiad jazz. "Your journal is both an inspiration and a guide," writes another to the oracular one. Well, there are such people in the world; and gladly, according to the Book, must we suffer them. What they like, they like exceedingly; discords and incongruities are to them but as the quiring of young-eyed cherubim; and for the time at least no Ephraim was ever so snugly roped to his idols as are these. The "inspiration" of this oracular journal may be conceded—the testimony of the inspired is sufficient; but the matter of guidance requires a word of explanation. At various times, and on various pages at the same time, this journal advocated peace at any price, peace at half-price, and peace at no price; peace without victory, peace with partial victory, and peace with overwhelming victory. On the various issues of the war as they arose it took almost every conceivable position, with occasional lapses into a negation of all attitude. It has both favored and condemned the League of Nations. It has denounced jingoes, nationalists, and reactionaries, and has yet joined them in a common cause. For a time it ponderously assailed the American Socialists; but after they had issued their manifesto declaring the war the greatest crime in history and pledging themselves to obstruction by every means in their power, it assailed the Administration for not "coöperating" with them. Guidance there may be in all this; but a prerequisite for the recipient is an extreme degree of "inspiration."

In these mutations and contradictions there may, of course, be method. The oracle must needs affect omniscience; and omniscience must needs justify itself to its following by constant self-certification. "Has such and such a thing happened? Lo, it was predicted in these pages of old time." The mad world may go as it will; the course of history may be such as to shatter all the major pronouncements of this journal; yet somewhere in the maze of its verbiage can always be found the material out of which to make a triumphant showing of foreknowledge of the event. The devotee can not but be duly impressed; and if, puzzled by some inharmony of pronouncement, some contradiction of terms or statement, he permits a shade of dubiety to cross his brow, he has only to consult again the certification. He knows then that authority has spoken and there is no more to be said.

Jazz journalism is a development of the great war. It had some sporadic beginnings before the peace was broken; but it has flourished only since the day of American intervention, while it has reached its most violent stage only since the armistice. It is peculiarly a product of the time. It grows out of the break-up of former conditions; out of the wreck of old opinions and the eager hunt for new. It expresses the fever, the uncertainty, the credulity, the formless Utopianism of a part of the mass; the fierce zealotry of the revolutionists (intensified a hundredfold by the triumph of Bolshevism) and of the pacifists (who make up for their abstention from physical force by an intensification of hatefulness); and it expresses no less the love of imposture on the part of victim as well as principal—a thing always heightened during troublous times.

Will the phenomenon endure? He is a pessimist and a cynic who would say yes. With the passing of the conditions which have brought it to its present absurd stage, it must itself pass away.

W. J. GHENT

Correspondence

German Despair

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

Several letters have come to me lately which contain interesting revelations of what the Germans are thinking nowadays in their homes and private lives. These letters come from the north, east, and west of Germany and from people ignorant of each other's existence. And yet they all express much the same sentiments, much the same despair. There is only one brief reference to the high cost of living and only the following suggestion of any wrongs committed by Germany: "It goes without saying that also on our side much happened that should not have happened; war is war."

One of my correspondents is very bitter toward this country and toward the Allies in general, reverting only a few weeks ago to the language of August, 1914, and italicizing with great freedom:

I should be void of any patriotic feeling if it were easy for me to write so soon to a citizen of that country which, or whose President, gave us Germans the deathblow. . . . Behind all the beautiful speeches of our enemies there hides of course only the one wish and aim, to annihilate Germany root and branch, and to obliterate the Germans. . . . And since they could never have conquered us by force of arms, they have been sending their agents for years to spread discontent among our people and finally among our soldiers too, and thereby they gained what they would never have gained in honorable fashion.

Another correspondent says:

I hope that sometime better days will come when men will learn again the meaning of a free and pure humanity! This madness of imperialism must cease. I can say in this connection that great hate of other peoples does not exist in Germany, although we ourselves have surely suffered more than others.

The attitude of the middle class toward the treaty is indicated briefly but to the point in one sentence: "Now as the end of it all—far worse than the war—this peace!" The following quotation specifies:

Surely, in the whole history of the world such degrading terms of peace have never been presented to a people as these to us—when we first read them (I have never been able to read them through) we thought that we did not see aright or that we had gone crazy. . . . Such terms of peace as have been concocted to destroy a whole people have never before been offered to any country!

The most significant comments of all concern the effects of the war and of the blockade. One correspondent says:

Fortunately we have come through the last years without serious illness in our family, but if the food had been better, my boys would have grown stronger than they are. . . . It has been a sad war for us Germans; our Germany that stood so high has fallen into wretched ruins. . . . I am often glad that my dear husband (who fell in the war) did not have to go through these times.

Another writes:

Whoever willed the war, the results for us are in any case such that my generation and the next, perhaps the third generation too, will not and can not arrive at any joy in life! . . . Although I have not actually gone hungry, my health did not improve exactly during the years of insufficient nourishment, and all the excitement has had an effect on me. I think my arteries are much more choked; for example, my eyes have become far weaker in recent times. . . . What this most terrible of wars has destroyed in respect of ideals, that too can never be made good.

A third:

Thus far we have been fortunate in the way in which we have come through these terrible years. We may not complain personally, but nevertheless those years were bad. . . . Only one who went through it knows what the starvation blockade meant, a blockade to which hundreds of thousands of women, old men, and children succumbed. . . . The recollection of the happy times up to 1914 affects us like a dream of great blessings, and we ask ourselves in vain: did all that have to be?

It is impossible to read these letters—or only these quotations from them—without sensing the despair and agony that are now at work in Germany. The letters show beyond a doubt a stunning realization on the part of the Germans that they are a crushed, beaten nation. In this realization there is food for hope. As all of Germany's friends and enemies may well desire, this realization may be the beginning of wisdom.

GEORGE M. PRIEST

New York, December 19

A French Opinion of the A. E. F.

(The writer of the following letter, a nephew of Taine, is a French author of repute who has published several notable books and articles on the recent war.)

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

It was in March, 1919, four months after the end of the war, that I saw the American battlefields. I went over the whole of the Meuse-Argonne fighting grounds. Except that the dead had been buried, the state of the country was the same as if the battle had just been fought, and everything testified to the wonderful tenacity and dash of the Americans.

The battle began on September 26, 1918. It was only after a few days that the Germans grasped the scope of the attack east of the Argonne, which in conjunction with the French was to reach the Mézières-Sedan line and cut the enemy's source of supply. The resistance which they then managed to put up, gradually increasing to the right of the Americans, compelled the attack, which had been at first directed south-north, to wheel towards the east in the direction of the Meuse. On November 6, the object of the tremendous battle had been attained—the enemy's main line of communication had been cut. Of course one must not forget what the French, who took some part in the Meuse-Argonne struggle, and what the British were doing on the other part of the western front. But it was enough to see the American battlefield, enough to realize how the enemy, fighting for their last foothold, had desperately defended every yard of their ground, to come to the conclusion that the Germans did not stop the war of their own free will, as I heard it often said in Germany, where I was some months ago. They had to beg for an armistice to avoid disaster.

It is generally understood in France that the American contribution to the war was absolutely decisive. Even before they had taken an important part in the fighting, their fast increasing numbers—they were coming in July at the rate of 300,000 a month—allowed Marshal Foch to engage, when the French counter-attack began on July 15, 1918, all his French reserves. Nothing more upset the German calculations than the fact that the French lines were so thickly manned. Ludendorff had reckoned on the exhaustion of our reserves.

But of course the American help was not limited to that, and when they went in for their big fights—St. Mihiel and Meuse-Argonne—they showed a pluck and a state of preparation that would have honored seasoned warriors.

ANDRE CHEVRILLON

Saint-Cloud, Seine-et-Oise, December 20

Deflation Through Taxation

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

In your issue of November 29 you contend, accurately and truthfully as it appears to me, that the recent sudden rise in prices is due primarily to inflation of currency and credit. The Review therefore favors the reverse policy of deflation, but seems decidedly at a loss as to how such a policy should proceed.

I wish to suggest one method of relief: namely, by drastic and thorough-going taxation, coupled with the speediest possible payment of the public debt. Surely, prompt and steady retirement of all outstanding bonds just as soon as it becomes legal to pay them must in the nature of things have the effect of narrowing the range of credit and of tightening and hardening the money market generally. That is, it would be deflation.

Of course, as a Single-taxer, I do not believe that any tax can in strict equity be imposed upon any other form of property than monopolized land-value. Still, it may be frankly admitted that a tax, even a radical tax, on inheritances would cause but little disturbance to industry and to business.

Tax land-monopoly then to the limit. Tax inheritance so far as we dare. Pay the public debt. And deflate credit.

MALCOLM C. BURKE

Washington, D. C., December 5

Book Reviews

At the Front in Poetry

Reynard the Fox. The Ghost Heath Run. By John Masefield. New York: The Macmillan Company.

Pictures of the Floating World. By Amy Lowell. New York: The Macmillan Company.

Dust and Light. By John Hall Wheelock. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.

Images. By Richard Aldington. London: The Egotist, Limited.

Latin Poems of the Renaissance. Translated by Richard Aldington. London: The Egotist, Limited.

Choruses from Iphigeneia in Aulis and the Hippolytus of Euripides. Translated by H. D. London: The Egotist, Limited.

IN Mr. Masefield's variously remarkable "Reynard the Fox" not the least remarkable thing is the sheer knowledge and the control of knowledge. In knowledge, as in land, to own is one thing; to use is another. Mr. Masefield in this region is a man of vast possessions; he cultivates every square foot. The yield of interest, vigor, poetry, is continuous. The thing is almost peculiar to our time. Mr. Masefield, like Browning, Meredith, and Kipling, increases the load, but increases the energy with the load; when he adds ball, he adds powder. The resultant quality might almost be called explosiveness.

The poem narrates a fox-hunt in something like twenty-five hundred lines of octosyllabic couplet freely limbered in the scurrying parts with anapests. The passage I quote is representative.

At Tencombe Rings near the manor Linney,
His foot made the great black stallion whinny,
And the stallion's whinny aroused the stable
And the bloodhound bitches stretched their cable,
And the clink of the bloodhound's chain aroused
The sweet-breathed kyne as they chewed and drowsed,
And the stir of the cattle changed the dream
Of the cat in the loft to tense green gleam.
The red-wattled black cock hot from Spain
Crowed from his perch for dawn again,
His breast-pufft hens, one-legged on perch,
Gurgled, beak-down, like men in church,
They crooned in the dark, lifting one red eye
In the raftered roost as the fox went by.

Mr. Masefield has mastered the great art in poetry—to surprise us with the usual. The vividness of this poem is amazing. It is not the highest achievement of his imagination—the subject is too restricted; but largely because the subject is restricted, it is possibly the most convincing test of his imagination. Here there are no competing forces—no story, no drama, no character or passion in the ordinary sense. The imagination is stripped and therefore you can test its muscle. The average rhymer, the average poet, must feel in contact with this force as the Roman dandy felt when he passed his slender, shapely fingers over the brawn of the herculean gladiator.

The continuity of the marvel is a second marvel. Mr. Masefield's work is packed with intensities. He responds to every summons. He enters a stable where all sorts of humble and menial things are doing, and not a thing is done in that stable that is not exciting to Mr. Masefield. I frankly own that it would rejoice me to catch him in a passing listlessness, an instant's nonchalance; I should feel it a sort of voucher for his enthusiasms. The rise and fall, the undulation, which marks all human experience, all human excitement, which poetry doubly recognizes in the throb of passion and the beat of rhythm, is scarcely perceptible in "Reynard the Fox." Mr. Masefield seems almost willing to expel the unstressed syllables from his metre. He writes: "Moustache clipped toothbrush-wise, and jaws." His English hates particles like Latin; it must gorge itself with nouns and verbs. It is all wonderful, and it is genuinely, vitally good; but were it less wonderful, it might be still better; it might be more lifelike if it were less vital.

Mr. Masefield is passionate, mystical, melancholy. How does such a temper comport itself in the treatment of a Walter Scott or Rudyard Kipling theme? The temper is still there, still discernible. The passion shows itself in the half-demoniac quality of the ride. The mysticism reveals itself in our final sense of something phantasmagoric in the whole event. The melancholy shows itself in two forms. The poet describes the persons at the meet, individualizing after a fashion no less than thirty-seven people, and granting an enlivening stroke or two to as many more. The strange thing is that in about half these thirty-seven persons, met for pastime on an English countryside, there is something fell or wry. The second point is still more interesting. There is one element in all this blithe excursion which answers to Saul Kame, to Johnny, to Dauber, to Nan, a straining, goaded, passionate, palpitating thing. That thing is the fox, and on the fox Mr. Masefield's temperament and his literary instinct inexorably and inseparably fasten. One sometimes fancies that in this chase Mr. Masefield's game is the fox-hunter. That point, however, is not clear. What one may venture to suggest is that fox-hunting in England would cease if Englishmen could be brought to realize the mind of a fox as interpreted by Mr. Masefield.

In the binding of Miss Lowell's new book there are two colors. The back is orange; the sides are lead-colored. Each color has a field to itself. They meet, but do not blend; their meeting is a concussion, neither yields a jot to the other, and their boundary is linear and absolute.

After the binding, take the book. Read these phrases: "A black cat amid roses"; "He wore a coat with gold and red maple leaves"; "I saw a beetle whose wings were of black lacquer spotted with milk." These colors resemble those in the binding. They meet. They may match—that is, they may help each other. But whether they help or hinder, they never yield—they never blend. Each is absolute; each reserves its sovereignty. If they work together, it is not a fusion of states, but a concert of autocrats.

The reason why Miss Lowell and her group hate sentimentality, hate sentiment, hate the display, perhaps even the avowal, of feeling, becomes gradually clear. Take sentiment as an example of the group. Its office is to blend, and, in blending, it blurs. It mellows, it mingles; its enemies significantly call it "mushy." It removes a little of the fact from every fact, to replace it by an emanation from itself. It slubbers the reality with prepossessions—at its worst, it obliterates the reality; observation disappears, or becomes perfunctory.

Against the habits of the smaller Victorians, Miss Lowell revolts. "Give us back our facts," she cries, "the facts that you have blurred and blinked." As the facts that interest her are mainly sense-impressions, she calls them images and herself an imagist. She stands for the integrity of the individual perception; if beauty is to be kept at all, it shall be an erect, inflexible, and trenchant beauty. Let us carry geometry into art. The theory, whether right or wrong, is enjoyably robust, and a certain hardihood, almost hardness, in Miss Lowell's temper has aided her in giving it embodiment. We are helped in certain undertakings by our faults, as we are obstructed in others by our virtues. To call Miss Lowell, as a person among persons, unfeeling would probably be slanderous, but I think it would be quite just to call her unfeeling as a poet among poets. This has helped her to give a special eminence to those qualities with which the presence or dominance of feeling naturally interferes. One can get in an oyster shell a firmness of texture and a crispness of profile which are not to be had in an oyster; but it does not follow inevitably that the shell is the higher formation of the two.

These thoughts enable me to grasp more clearly than ever before the place of free verse among the utensils of the school. Lines of equal length, lines of uniform metre, and rhymed lines tend to run together, and the running-together of things is for these lovers of saliency the unpardonable sin. Divide each line from its neighbor by a new metre, and its separation, its distinction, is insured. If we look at a series of equal squares or equal circles, the tendency to group, to mass, to assimilate, is almost irresistible. But if we look at a mixed series, showing first a circle, then a rhomb, then a hexagon, then a square, and so on in a varying and unforeseeable order, there is no excuse, no chance, for the relaxation of attention. Free verse, whether right or wrong, or both, is the logical instrument for carrying out Miss Lowell's idea of the independence and sovereignty of the individual perception.

I have lingered so long with Miss Lowell that I must cut short my parley with her latest book. Less original than "Can Grande's Castle," less notable in single poems than some earlier volumes, it is easier and pleasanter reading than much of her earlier work. I count 272 poems on 257 pages. This carries out the principle. The more poems, the more jutties, friezes, and coigns of vantage, the more relief and separation, in a word. I have another reason for approving this terseness. I am easily surfeited with visual images in which I cannot trace a pervasive feeling or detect a supporting thought. An unexplained group of images, if it be single or concise, allures me by its mystery. A line of Hebrew script stenciled on the plate-glass of a Yiddish restaurant is a call and spur to my imagination. But to run my eye down line after line of Hebrew script in a Talmud folio would baffle and irk me. So I am moderately attracted when Miss Lowell writes:

> I have drunk your health
> In the red-lacquer wine cups,
> But the wind-bells on the bronze lanterns
> In my garden
> Are corroded and fallen.

But a page of this, in seeming to feed, would merely famish me. I cannot make a meal off the decorations on the china.

Some things in Mr. Wheelock's new volume, "Dust and Light," impress me as ornamental and labored; the dust veils the light. In "Earth," he reaches an agreeable and pellucid simplicity, and when he tells us that earth's beauty flows equally the diction is aglow. Even here the sentiment does not quite hold me. What is a piece of rock to me? If it be eight thousand miles thick, so much the worse. The earth is dead. I am of the party of life. Mr. Wheelock, too, in spite of himself, is finally of that party. He calls the earth serene, humble, and tender; in other words, he must make matter spiritual, before he can really interest himself in the derivation of spirit from matter.

"Into a savior or a rose,"

In the two sequences, "April Lightning" and "Be Born Again," Mr. Wheelock discloses a much more original and remarkable personality. He is mystic and sexualist, like many persons; but the great difference between him and the tribe, or crew, of his associates is that while they are mystics by way of being sexualists, he is sexualist by way of being mystic. The ordinary lover-mystic goes from the chapel to the couch; Mr. Wheelock has an oratory in his bedchamber. I speak plainly; Mr. Wheelock himself is plain. His imagination is apparently kindled and liberated at the very point at which we suppose that the imagination is normally dispossessed by the senses. Other poets write prothalamia and epithalamia; what Mr. Wheelock writes is thalamia. In the beginnings of love, its shyness, unfoldings, illusions, variations, he takes as poet not the smallest interest. In his love there is no spring, and its summer is all August. Culminations attract him, not for base reasons, but because in them alone does his imagination complete its bridal with the universe.

There are disenchantments, naturally, which the poet in him finds hardly less divine than the enchantments. Death becomes the sequel of love, the replacement of love, almost the equivalent of love. I quote one sonnet of threnodic temper.

> The large day of the everlasting earth
> Draws to sublime conclusion; in the mood
> Of ancient autumn, awful and subdued,
> She waits the death that is the door to birth—
> With bounty bowed against the days of dearth,
> Holy and steadfast—but dreer leaves are strewed
> Over the tomb between her breasts, and rude
> Wail the huge winds that mock at April's mirth.
>
> Lay your frail arms about my weariness.
> Bare me that pale and patient breast again.
> Gather me to you in one deep caress!
> For all my heart is breaking, and the pain
> Of life is on me, and the loneliness.—
> And death is dark, and love itself is vain.

Mr. Wheelock is an obstructed poet. There are occasions and themes which remove those obstructions. When they arrive, his inspiration declares itself.

My hopes of Mr. Richard Aldington decline. The "River," in an anthology, had flung over me the light mesh of its delicate preciosity, but "Images" has set me free. There are things here indeed which a little good-will may find pretty, things in which lovers of the dusky and the rustling may even detect charm. A slight veil of technical originality, free verse and the like, blurring the commonplace and hence favoring the commonplace, enwraps the volume. Mr. Aldington is not afraid to say "damn"—we know that the English as a nation are courageous. I am not disposed to comment on this practice altogether in the spirit of Chaucer's Parson, "What eyleth the man so sinfully to swere?" but another criticism seems to me in place. The apology for profanity is spontaneity. Mr. Aldington swears as if he had been twitted with his inability to perform the act, and had invited his friends and neighbors to be present at the refutation of the calumny. I like him best in two bitter lines:

> The bitterness, the misery, the wretchedness of childhood
> Put me out of love with God.

The poets' Translation Series has been augmented by "Latin Poems of the Renaissance," translated by Mr. Aldington, and "Choruses from the Iphigeneia in Aulis and the Hippolytus of Euripides," translated by H. D. The English of the two books is only a shade better than the competent, uninspired English of the average careful translation. The Latin poems to which obscure names like Andrea Navagero and Marc-Antonio Flāminio are prefixed, are, so to speak, frosted with ornament. When they forsake the two great temptations to ornament, woman and landscape, and betake themselves to domesticities, utilities, or antiquities, the improvement is instantly perceptible. As for the choruses, a rapid comparison of one or two from the "Hippolytus" with the original educed some peculiarities. H. D. is translating choruses; yet lines 73-83, which are ordinary iambics, are translated with the choruses in choric metres, and of these eleven lines three are silently omitted. This seems an inconsequent proceeding, but it is harmless compared with the translation in the same passage of the achromatic word, διέρχεται, by a phrase that reeks of the dye-vat, "swirls across."

O. W. FIRKINS

An Old Republican

CLEMENCEAU: THE MAN AND HIS TIMES. By H. M. Hyndman. New York: Frederick A. Stokes Company.

OF all the statesmen who guide the destinies of nations to-day perhaps the most hateful to a certain school of thinkers is the veteran Premier of France, Georges Clemenceau. To the radical internationalist he is the incarnation of French revanche and imperialism, the implacable enemy of the new light that has risen in Soviet Russia, the crafty intriguer who has thwarted idealistic plans for a new world founded on fraternity and the Fourteen Points. It may be surmised that Clemenceau retains in face of these denunciations the imperturbable calm of Marjorie Flemming's pet hen. Yet there is a real danger that this incessant denunciation may wholly distort in American eyes a figure which should be naturally sympathetic and appealing as the very incarnation of Republican France. There has been perhaps too much made of Clemenceau's nickname, the Tiger. There is nothing of the tiger's ferocity or blood-lust in the man who pleaded for the pardon of those Communists who a few years before had sought his life, nor can the statesman who emerges from a half century of French politics as poor as when he entered be thought of as a beast of prey. All that Clemenceau has in common with the tiger is his fighting spirit, a quality which should not be altogether repugnant to the countrymen of Washington, Grant, and Roosevelt.

Against all such misconception and misunderstanding Mr. Hyndman's "Clemenceau, the Man and His Times" should serve as an admirable antidote. It is all the more valuable because the author, old friend of Clemenceau as he is, writes from the standpoint of an advanced Socialist and is by no means sparing of his criticism. His work is no mere enthusiastic eulogy, not even a biography in the ordinary sense, but a detailed picture of the social and political life of France from the time of the second Empire to the close of the present war, centred upon the dominating personality of Clemenceau. Mr. Hyndman takes great pains to fill in the background; we come to know something of his hero's friends and foes, of Thiers and Gambetta, Delcassé, Jaurès, and Caillaux; and the author speaks of Clemenceau and his times not with the air of a student who has compiled his information from books, but with the assurance of a veteran partisan in European politics.

Georges Benjamin Clemenceau was born in a little village of La Vendée in 1841. His father, the descendant of an old land-holding family in that province, was a true type of the men who guided the Revolution, a materialist, a philanthropist, and an aggressive radical. His protests against the coup d'état of Napoleon the Little earned him the honor of imprisonment in 1851. His son has inherited and developed the father's principles and it is not without interest to note that the first record we have of Clemenceau's political activity is his imprisonment by the Imperial Government for a too enthusiastic eulogy in some radical journal of the Republican revolution of 1848. Clemenceau's early life in an isolated province gave him a highly valuable understanding of the French peasant. "Rural France, the real France," he told Mr. Hyndman who was urging him to throw in his lot with the Socialists, "is and will always remain individualist, founded on property." "I have seen the peasants close," he added, "at every stage of existence from birth to death and this is their guiding principle in every relation of life."

But Clemenceau is something more than a mere representative of rural France. After some preliminary training he went to Paris to complete his studies in the medical profession, and except for brief intervals, including a visit to England and a short sojourn in this country, where he taught French in a girls' school and married one of his pupils, he has lived in Paris for over half a century and knows the metropolis quite as well as he knows the country. He began his career as a doctor in the workingmen's quarter of Montmartre, and by his energy, generosity, and undaunted republicanism won such popularity among his neighbors that on the fall of the Empire he was at once chosen Mayor of the quarter to administer the district during the trying days of the siege of Paris. As a representative of Paris to the National Assembly at Bordeaux, he voted for a continuance of the war and is the last living representative of the signers of a protest against the cession of Alsace-Lorraine. He was deeply involved in the troubles of the Commune. Sympathizing sincerely with the opposition of the metropolis to the reactionary policy of Thiers, he nevertheless risked his life in vain to prevent the murder of the two nationalist generals by the Paris mob, which was the direct cause of the bitter war between Paris and the country. His counsels of moderation and clemency so offended the desperate leaders of the Commune that an order for his arrest, the first step to his judicial murder, was issued. He managed, however, to escape from Paris and went on a tour of radical propaganda in the provinces, dogged at every step by emissaries of the reactionary Government. In 1871 as in 1917 Clemenceau spoke, worked, and risked his life in the great cause of national unity.

It would take too long to give even a brief sketch of Clemenceau's long and illustrious public life. It falls naturally into two parts, his career as a caustic critic and occassional wrecker of a succession of mediocre bourgeois administrations, and his own work as Minister and Premier in the later years of his life. A steadfast champion of radical republicanism, he consistently opposed in the Chamber and in the press the policy of colonial imperialism by which Ferry and others sought to divert attention from the crying needs for social reform at home. He helped to wreck the attempt of Boulanger to establish a military dictatorship, exposed the Panama scandals, and joined hands with Zola in the heroic attempt to secure justice for Dreyfus. A combination of Socialists and reactionaries drove him for a time from public life in 1893, but after a brief period devoted to journalism and to authorship he was returned to the Senate, and in 1906 became for the first time a member of the administration, serving as Minister of the Interior under Sarrien.

Clemenceau's career as Minister and Premier has two equally important aspects. At home he was a strong advocate of radical legislation for the benefit of the working-class. Bitterly as he was attacked by the Socialist party he was warmly in sympathy with most of their practical aims. "I claim to be a Socialist," he said. "Socialism is a social beneficence in action, the intervention of all on behalf of the victim of the few." But he was steadfastly opposed to any of the outbreaks of class-warfare, which destroyed the unity of the nation. He sent troops to the Lens collieries at the time of a great strike in that district, not to break the strike, with which he was largely in sympathy, but to prevent rioting and disorder. He crushed an incipient rebellion in the wine-growing district of the South by a prompt display of force, and he promptly called on the army to furnish engineers when a strike of the electricians of Paris plunged the city into darkness. "My programme," he said in memorable words, "is Social Reform under the law against grievances and Social Order under the law against revolutionists."

In his foreign policy the great achievement of Clemenceau was the establishment of the Entente with Great Britain. Throughout his life he had been an Anglophile. In fact during the period of English unpopularity in France he had more than once been accused of being a hired tool of Great Britain. But against the storm of German aggression which, from 1906, was gathering on the frontiers the one sure help which Clemenceau recognized was the power of free and liberal England. He had long distrusted, rightly as events were to show, the alliance with autocratic Russia, and from the time of his accession to power he labored in conjunction with Edward VII to promote that informal but binding union of hearts which on the outbreak of the Great War was to prove the salvation of Europe and the world.

Clemenceau's services to France and the world since 1914 are too fresh in the minds of men to need rehearsal. It is enough to say that from the very beginning he urged the energetic prosecution of the war with such vehemence that his organ, l'Homme Libre, was repeatedly cut to pieces and frequently suppressed by a timorous censorship, until he rebaptized it with Gallic irony l'Homme Enchainé. He was recalled to power in 1917 because all that was best and strong in France recognized that he alone of public men possessed the energy, courage, and resolution to crush the dangerous intrigues for a German peace which a succession of cowardly ministers had ignored or pandered to. From the moment that Clemenceau took the helm it was known the world over that there would be no faltering or compromise with foreign enemies or traitors at home. His repeated visits to the trenches and cordial relations with the military gave the heroic army the assurance it desired and deserved, that the civil government would support it to the last. He risked his life again and again in exposed sections with the one idea of convincing the poilu that the ruler of France was ready to share his dangers. In the darkest hours of the German drive his faith in final victory was unshaken, and it is a fitting tribute to his services that his name along with that of Foch should by unanimous resolution of the Senate be enshrined in the town hall of every Commune of France as well deserving of the gratitude of the country.

T. M. PARROTT

Two "Latest Efforts"

THE BLACK DROP. By Alice Brown. New York: The Macmillan Company.

THE BUILDERS. By Ellen Glasgow. New York: Doubleday, Page and Company.

THESE novels, like so much of our current American fiction, are seriously planned and earnestly labored. They mean to mean something, at all costs. What they lack is the quality no effort can achieve: the genial quality of great story-telling, the effect of a spontaneous pouring forth, of energy released not without pains, but without pain. This is not Miss Brown's fault, or Miss Glasgow's; but there it is, to account for the qualified mood in which we read their work. Never with them do we quite relax and make ourselves at ease. Always between us and the story we feel the story-teller at work, with rigid hand and knitted brow. . . . Since 1914 there has been a notable increase of strain in Miss Brown's fiction. Her peace of mind was violated, with Belgium, in those first days of August. From that moment her poise deserts her, the quiet confidence of the well-bred New Englander. She is agitated, excitable; she thinks in superlatives — mourns, execrates, exults, prophesies. She speaks for thousands of delicately constituted Americans to whom the war in Europe came first as a personal outrage and almost at once as a personal responsibility. The intolerable weight was there, on their shoulders; their only safety from madness lay in taking sides once for all. This could not be merely another wanton conflict of national greeds and ambitions, could not be like former wars: it was Armageddon, the war, a crucial and final trying of conclusions between civilization and barbarism, God and Satan, right and wrong. You were saved or damned. Neutrality was an unspeakable fraud. You bitterly resented America's failure to leap into the struggle. You pictured loyal America as composed of a magnanimous majority straining towards the privilege of battle for the right, and a timid or blind minority, headed by the Government, ignominiously hanging back. And even more than the Administration you despised and feared the disloyal America, the unknown quantity of hyphenates, pro-Germans, and pacifists who were all, consciously or unconsciously, backing up the Hun.

To the worst of these categories belongs the villain of "The Black Drop." Nor is villain a slovenly term for him. It is the amiable contention of the "new novelists" that no man born of woman is either devil or angel. Charles Tracy is the totally bad man of melodrama. Scion of an old and honorable New England family, there is the taint of some remote and forgotten inheritance in his blood. A marked personal charm is supposed to conceal his true character. An actor might convince us of this, but even he would have a tussle with the lines. On paper Charles Tracy is the miscreant, the black and slimy soul marked from the cradle; we instinctively hiss him on his first appearance. And by contrast his Helen is the radiantly beautiful and noble-hearted damsel of black-and-white romance, the perfect old-fashioned heroine. She lives "married in name only" throughout our acquaintance with her, and when Charles has been discovered by the authorities (as the gallery has discovered him in the first act) and his knavish pro-German profiteer tricks are put a stop to, and he vanishes, sneering, with the adventuress—when he is comfortably out of the way, his quondam Helen remains before us "unawakened," virginal, wide-eyed, her one plaintive note echoing to the last, "Grandsir, what is love?" If you believe in fairies, good and bad, and like them decked with the graces of a considered and elaborate style, here is your entertainment; though the entertainer's dabbling in realistic detail doubtfully waits upon illusion.

Miss Glasgow is a novelist who has won popularity without letting herself be drawn into hasty production. Like Winston Churchill, she takes two or three years to the writing of a novel—perhaps again like Mr. Churchill she is a trifle too solemn over the business. The effort of the story-maker sensibly overweighs the impulse of the story-teller. But "The Builders" is less heavy-handed than its predecessors. Its action is more compact and its dialogue shows less tendency to run to seed. Brave Caroline is something more than a replica of the conventional romantic heroine. Angelica is a mollusc-wife none too delicately drawn, but " with a difference." And the other women, Matty Timberlake the dragon of beneficence, and Mary Blackburn the Amazon in love, are excellent variations from the familiar types. But the three men of the story are hardly more than capable "parts." The Allan who is so easily lured from his Mary by the first deliberate glance of a siren, the handsome wastrel Roane who, a perfect Southern gentleman, insults women with so much charm and such comfortable impunity, are figures of "the screen." As for Robert Blackburn, who, hopelessly wedded to the mollusc-siren, is the natural heaven-born mate for brave Caroline, few masculine observers will have much patience with him. To his glory the ancient chord of honor, duty, and Southern chivalry is twanged without mercy. The weak point about the story is that its effectiveness all hangs on our acceptance of Angelica. Unless we believe in her supreme beauty and charm, unless we come directly under her spell, the rest is naught. Literature is full of ruthless and irresistible sirens; what one of them but Shakespeare's Cleopatra has really held us in her hands? There is little subtlety in this Angelica's speech or action, and for her physical subtlety we have only her author's word. Why should we believe that not only the Roberts and the Carolines, but all of Richmond (including the Blackburn family doctor) could ever have been befooled by her? Miss Glasgow's Angelica, like Miss Brown's Charles Tracy, is a rickety axle for our apple-cart.

H. W. BOYNTON

Business—and Aristotle

THE TURNOVER OF FACTORY LABOR. By Sumner H. Schlichter, Ph.D. With an Introduction by John R. Commons. New York: D. Appleton and Company.

IF the fine old Greek sage Herakleitos, returning to earth, were to visit a modern factory he would find there a striking exemplification of the basic principle of his philosophy—"everything flows." Just as you can not step twice into the same river, so you can not enter twice the same factory. Even the walls, that seem so enduring, are undergoing continual, though imperceptible change; the machinery is being rapidly worn out and replaced; the raw material passes swiftly through the various processes of manufacture and then out into the market as a finished product; laborers come and go in an ever-changing stream; and even the management frequently changes for better or worse. Of course, this external flux, in that it follows the law of being and becoming, can not be wholly bad; and yet instinctively we try to stay the movement, forgetting that change is of the essence of life and that things stable and inert are either asleep or dead. Doubtless Aristotle—for we are still learning from the ancients—would say that we must seek the golden mean, which, being interpreted in times of business management, implies that we should adjust the flow of labor somewhere between an excessively rapid turnover and no turnover at all.

Amid a great mass of statistics Dr. Schlichter mentions a number of interesting and curious facts. The tremendous increase in the demand for labor during the war has greatly increased the rate of turnover, as men are scarce and jobs plentiful. For the same reason both resignations and discharges are more numerous in times of prosperity than in times of depression, when men are anxious to hold their jobs.

The psychologist, at least, has his innings in this book, for the author devotes the latter half of it to an elaborate discussion of the means whereby the rate of turnover may be reduced; so, by a somersault of its own, the book becomes a manual on methods of handling men. In this other vast field are many bypaths, where the author loves to linger, and others which he merely points out along the way. He discourses on scientific management, hiring and firing, testing of candidates, the breaking-in of new workers, the training of foremen, the need of an employment manager or supervisor of labor, the desirability of a liberal labor policy as distinguished from a merely enlightened policy. And yet he never once mentions the importance of tact and a spirit of friendliness, without which the best-laid schemes for the scientific management of men must come to naught.

Business men who read this book will wonder how they have managed their affairs in the past without an efficiency expert, and how they will be able to carry on during the next twenty years—if they live so long. Verily, times and customs change, and it is hard for the older generation to learn the ways of the new. Nevertheless, they must do it or be prepared to turn over the management to young fellows strong in theory and self-confidence, but lacking in the seasoned judgment that comes from long experience of victory and defeat. Here again the principle of the mean applies, for in business as in war there should be variety of talent, and though there must be changes in leadership, there is always need of a Nestor or a Ulysses.

The Run of the Shelves

WE have enough chemistry in our make-up to know that a percolator is something besides a coffee-pot. In the chemical laboratory, as we remember from ancient, malodorous days, it was the name for a comical paper filter which we used to separate a liquid from its sediment, and which sometimes, when the instructor's back was turned, we perforated with a pencil that the percolation might be more expeditious—with disastrous results. We have no desire to puncture Mr. Ellwood Hendrick's "Percolator Papers" (Harpers); they run lightly and swiftly enough as it is. But we should like to filter one part of their composition from another. The metaphor is mixed, but the meaning is clear. Where these essays take the form of light, but not trivial, comment on the ways of men and the accidents of life, they are charming; the turn of thought is paradoxical enough to be stimulating and the style is of the right essay flavor. Such, for example, is the paper called rather whimsically C_2H_5OH, which is no pedantic treatise on the composition of alcohol, but a very human document on the probable effects of prohibition. This is the pure liquid of Mr. Hendrick's little book, which we should like to filter off from the scientific dregs. For Mr. Hendrick has a theory, which does not amuse us in itself, and rather mars the entertainment he otherwise has to offer. He calls it "A Plea for Materialism," and preaches it a paper of that name, not to mention scattered allusions to it elsewhere. Of course, it is not a gross materialism born in the street, but the offspring of a pretty flirtation between the laboratory and the church, as if one should deck out in spiritual rags Taine's old dictum that the emotions are merely chemical products like sugar and vitriol. "So," says Mr. Hendrick, "if we see the most beautiful thing in the world, a mother turning to her child, we shall find our vision enlarged by the knowledge that she is acting in conformance with unerring physical and chemical laws; that definite reactions take place within her," etc. We wonder. The thing has to us a little of that ancient smell of the laboratory in those old Victorian days, when men thought they knew a great deal more than they really did know.

La Revue Mondiale surveys the field of American humor with the following result: "The United States hails in the person of Don Marquis the successor to Mark Twain, Stephen Crane, Ambrose Bierce, and other kings of American humor and satire." (By all means, add Poe, Lowell, Josh Billings, and any "autres" you can think of. We Americans never do things by halves.) "A part of the New York press considers that his latest volume, 'Prefaces,' deserves to be placed beside La Rochefoucauld, Voltaire, Chamfort . . . Certain critics even speak of him as the continuator of Shakespeare and Renan." (Where are Euripides, Lucian, Cervantes, Rabelais, and Dean Swift?) "Alas! we have not been able to find there a single stroke of humor or satire which could entitle this writer to a place above the humble level of those journalists who struggle to produce a glimmer of wit out of none at all—malgré son absence totale." (Hélas, once again. Though we are not sure that the assertion could be maintained by the single volume "Prefaces," Don Marquis is, in point of rarely combined wisdom and cleverness, about the best we have to offer. Evidently, we should do well not to offer him to the French.)

Senator J. S. McLennan of Canada is the author of a history of the town of Louisbourg, Cape Breton, a work handsomely printed and bound, and issued under the title, "Louisbourg from Its Foundation to Its Fall, 1713-1758" (Macmillan). In the course of his narrative, he has occasion to refer to a Madame Eurry De la Perelle, a resident of Louisbourg, and in his comment upon her presents an admirable characterization of the peculiar position which the town occupies in the history of America.

> Madame Eurry De la Purelle came to Louisbourg when it was founded, a young woman of twenty. Her husband was the first officer who died in the new settlement. She lived there until the second capture; her three sons were officers in the troops. She did not die for twenty-four years after the demolition of the town, all the fortunes of which passed before her eyes. That the life of a town should fall so far short of that of one of its people suggests the instability of the unimportant. Yet against this one background, with this unity of space and time, developed events which displayed the genius, administrative, economic, military, of two peoples. The two-score and six years of Louisbourg's existence show forth causes and consequences as clearly as the colonial history of two centuries.

This comparatively insignificant town of Cape Breton, or Isle Royale, as the French called the island, became famous because of the part that it played in the half-century struggle between France and England during the years from the Treaty of Utrecht to the Treaty of Paris. It held a strategic position, not only in a military sense, but in a commercial sense also, for it controlled the fishing industry of the Newfoundland banks and adjoining waters. It was the central point of an area of conflict, and because of its capture by the New Englanders in 1745, its return to France by the Treaty of Aix la Chapelle in 1748, its recapture by the British in 1758, and its permanent cession to Great Britain in 1763, it became a subject of romantic interest at the time and has remained so ever since. Though popular attention has been drawn largely to the military aspects of its history, the town deserves remembrance quite as much for its commercial significance, since commerce was a more dominant factor in the eighteenth century than national animosity and was the starting point in the conflict which ended in the downfall of the French colonial empire of the West. This downfall was due, as Mr. McLennan admirably brings out, not to the defects of the Frenchman as a colonist or colonial administrator, nor to any inferiority in the strength or morale of the French soldier and seaman, but to the weakness of the government at home, which starved the French navy in money, men and equipment, at the very time when Great Britain was lavishing the resources of her growing wealth on ships and service at sea. The fall of Louisbourg in 1745 and 1758 marks the supremacy of British sea power and illustrates the old French saying which Great Britain made her own, "Le trident de Neptune, c'est le sceptre du Monde."

The title of "White Shadows in the South Seas" is suggestive of the style of this volume rather than of its subject matter. Frederick O'Brien spent a year living with the remnant of natives in the Marquesas, and the result is a clever and picturesque book, filled almost too full of dramatic high lights and descriptive diction which only infrequently falls into the sing-song wordiness of sentimentality. Tattooed and naïve savages, unearthly scenery, ancient music, and cannibalistic customs—all are wreathed about with romance and glamour. Always there runs the tragic strain of the terrible slaughter and extermination wrought directly by conquering white men, and indirectly by the vices and diseases of civilization. And yet where the book should be powerful it is weak, where we should thrill with the marvel, or the tragedy, or the beauty of it all, we are left almost unmoved. The writer has lived and moved among the most dramatic scenes, has recorded them correctly but heartlessly, photographically but coldly. As in certain of the pictures, the beauty of nudity is lost by the sophisticated photographer's gallery properties, so we feel that the opportunity for a great book has slipped away from the author, who has given time and labor, but little heart or soul to his work.

New worlds—new words. The war has brought a host of such, and even outside the zone of hostilities the English language continues to demonstrate its capacity for growth by borrowing foreign words, fashioning new ones of its own, and renovating old ones. Prof. C. Alphonso Smith in "New Words Self-Defined" (Doubleday) allows some of the more frequent of these newcomers to speak for themselves. It is well to get them on record, for not a few of them will sooner or later be forgotten and, without such lexicographical aids as Professor Smith here lays the foundation for, will exist only to puzzle future readers of the written page of these tremendous days.

Professor Otto Jespersen, the distinguished professor of English, at the University of Copenhagen, Denmark, writes:

> I am busy with a book on the development of language. Just now I am writing the chapters that are to deal with the influence of children's speech on the evolution of language in general, and I find that it would be good if I had some more examples of those new formations of words in which children's speech abounds (such as flyable = able to fly). I have a great many examples from Danish, but very few from English, and as I write in English it would be splendid if I had some more. Those who have written on this language of children (O'Shea, Sully, etc.) have paid too little attention to most of the things to which I, as a linguist or philologist, attach the greatest importance.

If any reader of the Review has material of this sort in his possession which he cares to communicate we shall see that it comes into Professor Jespersen's competent hands.

Drama

On the London Stage

OUR best dramatists hibernated during the war, and have not yet reawakened. From Mr. Galsworthy, Mr. Masefield, Mr. Granville Barker we have heard nothing for many a day. Mr. Shaw has given us only a printed play, "Heartbreak House," which may be described as an essay in mannerism with little or no substance behind it. Mr. Sutro, Mr. Hichens, Mr. Somerset Maugham, and Mr. Arnold Bennett have the stage to themselves for the moment; and though their plays are of some interest, none of them can be said to have notably enriched our dramatic literature.

Of Mr. Maugham's irresistible farce, "Home and Beauty," I need say nothing, as I understand it has repeated in New York its London success. "The Voice from the Minaret," by Mr. Robert Hichens, deals tactfully rather than powerfully with a theme which has often been treated with neither tact nor power—that of a clerical Tannhäuser in the Venusberg. In the first act, Andrew Fabian is not actually a clergyman, but has strong spiritual leanings, when, on his way to Jerusalem, he meets at Damascus Lady Caryll, wife of an Indian official, who is on her way to England to obtain a divorce from her intolerable brute of a husband. She does not go to England; she tarries at Damascus with Andrew Fabian. Unfortunately the window of their sitting-room looks straight out upon a minaret from which the muezzin, at the appropriate intervals, reminds the faithful of their religious duties; and Lady Caryll soon perceives that the reminder is not lost upon her lover. She realizes that she has an unconquerable rival in his clerical vocation; so one fine day she quietly takes her departure, and returns to the purgatory of her life in India. Andrew Fabian completes his journey to Jerusalem, both literally and spiritually, and becomes a clergyman of the Church of England. He is on the point of settling down into humdrum domesticity with an agreeable young woman who appears cut out for a clergyman's wife, when Lady Caryll once more appears on the scene, and with her Sir Leslie Caryll, her husband. This very unlovely personage divines the mystery of Damascus, and is on the point of making himself openly unpleasant, to the ruin of Fabian's career, when his opportune decease solves the difficulty. The play contains some interesting scenes, and has none of that sanctimonious sensuality which is so offensive in many plays of similar subject. But it is an ephemeral production which will scarcely be remembered after it has served its immediate purpose.

The same may be said of "The Choice," by Mr. Alfred Sutro, which is having a remarkable success at Wyndham's Theatre. It is an effectively-told sentimental anecdote. It shows how a middle-aged Captain of Industry, the Right Honorable John Ingleby Cordways, rashly fell in love with the young and flighty Lady Clarissa Caerleon, but discovered before the fatal knot was tied an incompatibility of temper which would have been disastrous had it developed six months later. The rock on which the project of marriage splits is well imagined. Cordways has dismissed one of his subordinates, because, though he is a man with a brilliant war record and with many fine qualities, he has been several times guilty of drunkenness. All sorts of influences, public and private, are brought to bear upon Cordways to induce him to give the culprit another chance, but he is inflexible. Then the man's sweetheart comes to Lady Clarissa and tells her the piteous story; and she, not knowing anything of the matter or of all that it has come to mean for Cordways, rashly pledges her word that the man shall be reinstated. Result: an insoluble conflict of will with will—which, we are told, is the very essence of drama. It is not surprising, therefore, that the scene in which the misunderstanding comes to a head proves to be a very strong one. Fortunately, though the conflict is insoluble, the engagement is not; and there is the less harm done as Lady Clarissa has another string to her bow, or beau to her string. Cordways, the stern, strong man, is supposed to be broken-hearted; but one fancies that if he had really cared very much, he would either have surrendered at discretion or arrived at some compromise. The success of the play is perhaps partly due to Miss Viola Tree's somewhat ungainly but realistic portraiture of a young woman of the ultra smart set. Mr. Gerald Du Maurier, too, an actor with an enormous following, has been gifted by nature with a jaw which renders him the ideal representative of the strong silent man.

When Mr. Arnold Bennett produces a play, the critics never fail to tell him that, because he is a professional novelist, he is necessarily but an amateur playwright. As the author of two of the most successful plays of the time, "Milestones" and "The Great Adventure," Mr. Bennett can afford to smile at this superior attitude on the part of his mentors. The fact is that the skill he shows in transmuting a novel into a play proves that he is exceptionally endowed with the dramatic instinct. "Sacred and Profane Love," adapted from an early novel of the same title, is certainly not what one would call a well-built play. Its second act might be dropped out almost entirely without leaving any sensible gap in the

(Continued on page 40)

Another C-W Achievement

The largest wireless station in the world, situated at Honolulu, H. I., is equipped with a 300 K. W. Crocker-Wheeler Radio Generator. The C-W Company manufactures generators for land stations, aeroplanes, dirigibles, submarine chasers, train signaling and a wide variety of special purposes.

President

Crocker-Wheeler Co.

Ampere, N. J.

New York
Boston
Syracuse
Chicago
Cleveland
Binghamton

Pittsburgh
Newark
New Haven
Philadelphia
Baltimore
San Francisco

TIFFANY & CO.

JEWELRY SILVERWARE WATCHES CLOCKS STATIONERY

CHINA AND GLASSWARE
A COMPREHENSIVE STOCK

PURCHASES MAY BE MADE BY MAIL

FIFTH AVENUE & 37TH STREET
NEW YORK

FOGG ART MUSEUM HARVARD UNIVERSITY

Collection of Mediaeval and Renaissance Paintings

xxiv + 356 pages Quarto 66 illustrations $7.50

ILLUSTRATIONS and descriptions of the notable collection of Primitives in the Fogg Art Museum at Harvard University. Biographical sketches of the artists represented, essays on the various schools of painting, general notes on color and symbolism, and full bibliographies contribute to make the book a most attractive history of early painting. Each article is by an expert on the Museum staff. Byzantine, Italian, Spanish, German, French, Flemish, and English works are included. The reproductions, in heliotype, are especially beautiful and provide definite help in the study of the period. For both the student and the general reader it is one of the most important art books of the year.

OTHER BOOKS ON THE FINE ARTS

ATTIC RED-FIGURED VASES IN AMERICAN MUSEUMS. By J. D. Beazley. $7.00.
A HANDBOOK OF ATTIC RED-FIGURED VASES. By J. C. Hoppin. 2 vols. $16.00.
EUTHYMIDES AND HIS FELLOWS. By J. C. Hoppin. $4.00.
GIOTTO AND SOME OF HIS FOLLOWERS. By Osvald Sirén. 2 vols. $15.00.
VITRUVIUS: THE TEN BOOKS ON ARCHITECTURE. Translated by M. H. Morgan. $4.00.
A LOAN EXHIBITION OF EARLY ITALIAN ENGRAVINGS. A descriptive catalogue prepared by Paul J. Sachs. $2.00.

Descriptive circulars sent on request
At all bookshops

HARVARD UNIVERSITY PRESS

7 RANDALL HALL, CAMBRIDGE, MASS.
280 MADISON AVENUE, AT 40TH STREET, N. Y. C.

(Continued from page 38)
action. But each individual scene is alive and moving; and, after all, a dramatist who can hold the interest of his audience throughout four acts, can scarcely be set down as a mere bungler at the job.

In the first act, a young girl, Carlotta Peel, intensely devoted to music, is thrown by chance into the company of a great pianist whom she adores, and, in an access of melomaniac passion, surrenders herself to him. The night over, she deliberately disappears from his ken —and from that of the audience—for seven years. During this time she has become a famous novelist; and in the second act we find her on the verge of becoming involved in a second love affair —with her publisher, who is unhappily married. But at the end of the act she learns that the pianist, Emilio Diaz, of whom she has heard nothing for years, has become a morphinomaniac and is living in Paris in extreme misery. She leaves her publisher to settle his domestic troubles as best he may, and starts for Paris by the night express. She finds Diaz a pitiable wreck, living under the most degrading conditions. In a scene of great power, she takes possession of him and carries him off, and in the last act we learn, not without surprise and some skepticism, that she has actually reclaimed him, and restored not only his self-respect, but his genius. Obviously this would have been a more coherent and perhaps more convincing play if Mr. Bennett had cut out the second act, with the episode of the publisher, and had interposed a new act, between his actual third and fourth, showing us some of the process of the rescue of Diaz, and (if possible) making us believe in it. His omission to do so may even awaken some doubt as to whether he believes in it himself. Be this as it may, the piece is a vivid and arresting one. Neither of the two leading characters is rendered particularly interesting. Diaz in particular, though played by an actor of ability and experience, is not in the least credible as a brilliant and fascinating interpreter of Chopin; and if we do not feel that Carlotta loves the maestro rather than the man, much of our sympathy for her is sacrificed.

The Stage Society has given us a very creditable performance of a very difficult play—Mr. Herbert Trench's "Napoleon." It is a perfect example of a play for the study rather than the stage; and even in the study it demands a good deal of thinking out. The story, briefly told, is that of a young man, half English and half French by birth, who, at the time when Napoleon is planning an invasion of England, sets forth to teach him the error of his ways, and to bring him back to the idealisms which are supposed to have inspired his Italian campaigns. The precise doctrine of the young apostle does not emerge very distinctly. It seems to be something to the effect that the family is the basis of all human welfare —a view to which one could imagine Napoleon replying that it was precisely in the interests of several millions of French families that he proposed to invade England. He does not make this retort—at least, I don't think he does, but Napoleon's ideas are not much more perspicuous than those of his self-appointed counsellor. "Dreamer! you speak in violent foreshortenings," says the Emperor at one point, with incontrovertible truth; but unfortunately he is himself much addicted to the same practice. All this bandying of ideas is hung upon a not very skilfully spun thread of nautico-military melodrama. In the upshot, both the apostle and his brother lose their lives, and Napoleon, after spending twenty-four hours in England, sets off for St. Helena, via Austerlitz, Moscow, and Waterloo. The production was a distinguished succès d'estime.

An offshoot of the Stage Society, happily entitled The Phœnix, has recently come into existence, with the object of giving performances of neglected Elizabethan and Restoration masterpieces. It has taken up the work, in fact, of the Elizabethan Stage Society, started some thirty years ago by that amiable enthusiast, Mr. William Poel. A certain section of the Stage Society has of late years developed an enthusiasm for performances of Restoration comedies with all the indecencies religiously retained; and it is this section which has now split off, and set up "on its own" as The Phœnix. I venture to prophesy that the society will do useful work (though not exactly "according to plan") in exploding the great Elizabethan-Restoration superstition. It has raged for a hundred years; it has been exaggerated to the point of absurdity by Swinburne, in his contention that "the silver age of English drama would eclipse the golden age of dramatic poetry in any other nation of modern times"; and it is now eminently desirable that we should return to sanity.

The Phœnix commenced its operations this week with a revival of Webster's "Duchess of Malfy," very appropriately chosen as being perhaps the fetish-in-chief of the Elizabethan cult. Webster, I am not altogether sorry to say, had a very bad press. Criticism has regained sufficient independence of judgment to realize the absurdity of educated men and women coming together solemnly to sit through five acts of clumsy, ill-constructed, bloody melodrama, and to listen piously to language which, if they repeated it in the street outside, would lead to their prompt appearance in the police court. There is some undeniably good writing in "The Duchess of Malfy," but why should we sit out five acts of artificial and sanguinary extravagance for the sake of thirty or forty fine lines? It may be interesting to note that the Duchess was played with great charm, but without much tragic power, by Miss Cathleen Nesbitt, newly returned from New York; and that Mr. William Rea, who has now played Abraham Lincoln for 350 nights, lent his brogue and his lugubrious countenance to the part of the villain Bosola.

William Archer

London, November 24

Books and the News

Profit-Sharing

The announcement, a few days ago, of their further scheme for profit-sharing by the Messrs. Ford, suggests some references for reading. Perhaps the first book is "Profit Sharing: Its Principles and Practice" (Harper, 1918), by Arthur W. Burritt, of the A. W. Burritt Co., President Dennison, of the Dennison Manufacturing Co.; Edwin F. Gay, and others. This is a general study; for statistics see "Profit Sharing in the United States" (Government Printing Office, 1917,) by Boris Emmet, a Bulletin of the U. S. Bureau of Labor Statistics, Whole No. 208. There are also two important British reports, "Profit Sharing and Labor Co-Partnership in the United Kingdom, 1912," and "Report on Profit Sharing and Labor Co-Partnership Abroad, 1914," both published by the Department of Labor Statistics of Great Britain's Board of Trade. Another valuable work is the National Civic Federation's "Profit Sharing By American Employers" (National Civic Federation, 1916).

An older book, an investigation of considerable length, with historical details, is Nicholas P. Gilman's "Profit Sharing Between Employer and Employee" (Houghton, 1889), while the same author, in "A Dividend to Labor" (Houghton, 1899), devotes some chapters to this subject. Charles R. Fay's "Co-partnership in Industry" (Putnam, 1913), is a brief historical sketch taking examples chiefly from England and France. Another brief book, citing experiences of employers in England, Europe and America, is Aneurin Williams's "Co-Partnership and Profit Sharing" (Holt, 1913).

"The Ford Plan" (Anderson, 1915, is a pamphlet by Henry Ford. A. H. Mackmurdo discusses the topic in "Pressing Questions: Profit Sharing." (Lane, 1913); Lord Leverhulme's "The Six-Hour Day and Other Industrial Questions" (Holt, 1919), contains chapters on "co-partnership" or profit-sharing.

Edmund Lester Pearson

THE REVIEW

Vol. 2, No. 36 New York, Saturday, January 17, 1920 FIFTEEN CENTS

Contents

Brief Comment 41

Editorial Articles:

Mock-Hysteria 43
The Jackson-Day Bombshell 44
Turkey and the Powers 45
End of the Steel Strike 46
"Two-Thirds of Both Houses" 47

Out of Their Own Mouths. By Jerome Landfield 48
Can We Improve Our Public Schools? By Caspar F. Goodrich 50
Correspondence 52
A Talk with Sir George Paish. By Charles Henry Meltzer 53
Mr. P. E. More and the Wits. By Stuart P. Sherman 54

Book Reviews:
Coöperating with Destiny 56
The I. I. I. 57
Roses and Games 58
Pointing the Way to a League of Nations 58
Attic Red-Figured Vases 59

The Run of the Shelves 60
Contemporary Painting in Washington 62

Music:
Henry Krehbiel and Ernest Newman Discuss Music 62

Drama:
"A Night's Lodging" at the Plymouth —"The Master Builder" at the People's House 65

Books and the News: Socialism. By Edmund Lester Pearson 65

MR. Bryan has never been deficient in logic. On the contrary, every one of his campaigns, one may almost say every one of his speeches, is an exhibition of logical correctness. He fixes his premises well in his mind, and rams the conclusions from them into the minds of his hearers without trickery or fallacy in the reasoning. He is a wooden thinker, a mechanical thinker, but not a loose thinker. Contrary to a widely prevalent opinion, his campaign for free silver, while it rested on a fundamentally wrong basis, manifested a very high degree of genuine debating ability. Accordingly, it is no surprise that in his Jackson-Day speech on the treaty he made a calm and convincing analysis of the situation. His habits of thought and speech are in diametrical contrast with those of President Wilson. Mr. Wilson exhorts, but does not debate; perhaps he is so sure he is right that he is too proud to argue. Mr. Bryan, too, is always sure he is right; but in his case the consequence is that he is not afraid to argue.

CONGRESS should act at once on Secretary Glass's recommendation that $150,000,000 be appropriated for immediate use in rescuing the starving populations of Austria, Armenia, Poland, and certain other countries. The Grain Corporation is in a position to send the food supplies the moment Congress gives the word. Mr. Hoover, whose recommendations are always based on knowledge and foresight as well as on right feeling, urges this action while cautioning against undiscriminating extension of credits in other ways. Usually deliberation is a virtue, but sometimes it is a crime. To hesitate or delay, in the face of such harrowing need and such clear opportunity, would be a criminal failure of duty.

GERMANY, Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan, besides Belgium and a number of other minor Powers, affixed their signatures last Saturday to the document that formally ends the Great War. The fourteen months since the armistice have been so full of trouble, and so heavy with doubt and danger, that the moment so long awaited was far from being one of elation. And the absence of the United States added much to the joylessness of the occasion. Not the least of the injuries caused by our delay in entering into the permanent relations of peace with Germany, and with the nations associated with us in the treaty, is the psychological effect of the suspense. The world is not going to forget the war the moment the treaty is disposed of; but after all, there are other things about Germany besides the great crime of 1914, and we must get to thinking about these other things some time. We must, sooner or later, if the world is not to be an inferno, fall again into the habit of dealing with Germans as men—human beings with faults and virtues like our own; men to be treated according to their individual merits, not men under a common ban for a common crime. The way to get back to that frame of mind is not to change our opinion about the war, but to stop thinking about the war except when such thinking is of necessity thrust upon us. And this will never happen until the treaty is out of the way.

DR. E. J. DILLON, in his valuable history of "The Peace Conference," vouches for the truth of the story of how the Council arrived at its decision to bring the ex-Kaiser to trial: "A few days before the treaty was signed there was a pause in the proceedings of the Supreme Council, during which the Secretary was searching for a mislaid document. Mr. George, looking up casually and without addressing anyone in particular, remarked: 'I suppose none of you has any objection to the Kaiser being tried in London?' M. Clemenceau shrugged his shoulders, Mr. Wilson raised his hand, and the matter was assumed to be settled. Nothing more was said or written on the subject." Mr. George is now going through the familiar experience that the decision so easily taken is not so easily carried into effect, and he no longer supposes, but knows, that among the English there is a strong objection to the play being staged in London. It will have taken him more time than a lull in the discussions to decide upon a solution which makes him seem true to his word while actually evading its fulfillment. The ex-Kaiser, we are now told, will be summoned to trial before an Allied Commission, and if he does not answer he will be tried in his absence.

No pressure will be brought to bear on the Netherlands Government for his extradition. Wilhelm von Hohenzollern will be left chopping wood at Doorn, while the Allied Commission hears the witnesses and reads the documents which are to establish his guilt. This certainly would be the wisest course to take. It deprives the accused of a last opportunity to play a martyr's part on the world's stage, while giving satisfaction to those who wish to see his guilt made manifest and put on record.

"BEFORE long, we may see labor hiring capital," says Sir George Paish in an interview which appears in the Review to-day. This may sound startling, but there is really nothing strange, or even new, about it. For Sir George Paish goes on to say, "Groups of working people will borrow money for their purposes on the best terms practicable." Nothing would be more desirable than such a development, and nothing would be more in accordance with the hopes—of the radicals of to-day?—no, of the "orthodox" economists of half a century ago, like Mill and Cairnes. Co-operation of workingmen in production, participation of workingmen in the ownership of capital, is what they looked forward to as the best hope of the masses. And if the money that suddenly-enriched workingmen have been spending on silk shirts or the like during the last year or two had been turned into this channel, a very substantial beginning of such co-operative enterprise could have been made by this time.

STUDENTS of the slum tenement problem have been offered a fine stimulus to work out a practicable solution. Vincent Astor, Alfred E. Marling, and others have provided for prizes aggregating $6,000, the contestants to make a study of a typical old tenement block picked for the purpose and submit detailed plans for its remodeling. The plans must not only conform to modern progress in heating, lighting, sanitation, ventilation, fire protection, privacy, etc., but must present reasonable evidence that the changes provided for will be a good business investment for the landlord. On the face of it, this seems to be an unusually intelligent prize undertaking. Entirely apart from the prizes, the effort will be well worth while to every contestant who enters the lists with sufficient preparation to warrant him in dealing with such problems of domestic architecture at all. The New York State Reconstruction Commission and the Joint Legislative Committee on Housing are co-operating in the movement.

TENANTS in New York apartment houses were startled, a few days ago, by a court decision apparently giving the right to dispossess an occupant merely because the landlord deemed him "undesirable," without the necessity of alleging and proving any specific ground of undesirability. The judge has now stated that the decision had been misunderstood, and tenants are free from the danger of being ejected as undesirable merely because there is someone in the background ready to pay a higher rental. It is still true, however, that apartments in New York are quite generally held under leases wholly one-sided, giving the tenant very little power to enforce even the rights which his contract, on its face, appears to secure. The Tribune has well suggested that a standard form of contract should be prescribed by law, covering the leasing of apartments for residence purposes, for fixed terms. On the tenant's side, the standard lease should make sure the constant delivery, in full measure, of the heat, water, elevator, and other forms of service for which he pays, or give a speedy and inexpensive road to adequate recompense when any part of such service fails. To the landlord, it should secure the right to enforce the proper care and use of the apartments leased, and to receive reasonably punctual payment therefor, but not unreasonably pre-punctual. And in the interest of both owners and respectable tenants, there should be no bar to the speedy dispossession of undesirable occupants, subject to the tenants' right to demand the presentation of proper evidence.

WHAT purport to be the official statistics of the French Flying Corps are nothing short of staggering. In the whole course of the War the losses in the zone of military operations were 1,945 pilots and observers killed, 1,461 missing, whose death may now be accepted as certain, and 2,922 wounded. To this must be added 1,927 pilots and observers killed outside the zone of operations. In view of the care exercised by the French in training their air forces the last item is amazingly high. In round numbers, the casualties were eight thousand out of a full strength of thirteen thousand, or something over sixty per cent. The stark figures, at once splendid and terrible, are more impressive than any comment.

MR. BERNARD SHAW was present at the great fight between Carpentier and Beckett, and has granted the London Nation the privilege of printing his impressions. Why should a paper so undauntedly pacifist give prominence to the description of a prize fight, and why was Mr. Shaw requested to write it, who confesses not having attended a boxingexhibition in thirty-fiveyears? Mr. Shaw has not abstained for thirty-five years from attending a boxing match because he disapproves of the sport, but because of his conviction that the English are congenitally incapable of the art. But Carpentier is different. His display "overawes the spectators; it often reduces them to absolute silence." Even the perspicacious Mr. Shaw does not know what to make of him. At his first entrance he was startled by the apparition: "Nothing less than Charles XII, the madman of the North;" but during the fight he recognizes in Carpentier "the complete Greek athlete. The unmistakable Greek line digs a trench across his forehead." In less exciting moments he is to Mr. Shaw what he is to others, the French pugilist. What golden opportunity was here lost to his disagreeing wit! If Mr. Shaw had only known that Carpentier's cradle stood in Holland! He could have startled his readers with a paradox which was a truth.

Mock-Hysteria

THE act of folly with which the lower house of the New York Legislature began its session may prove a benefit to the country. We have not been among those who believe that the nation is in a state of hysteria over the Red danger; but it is quite possible for a mock-hysteria —a thing that has the outward marks of hysteria, although it has no real hold on the patient—to do even more harm than the genuine article. And "it is time," as the hero of Tennyson's Maud exclaims, "it is time that old hysterical mock-disease should die."

The prompt and well-weighed condemnation which the course of the New York Assembly has evoked from high Republican, as well as from Democratic, sources, should have a sobering effect in more directions than one. If the sharp shock which the suspension of the five Socialist Assemblymen gave to the political and juristic instincts of men like Judge Hughes and Senator Harding, the scathing rebuke which it evoked from an organization like the Young Republican Club of New York, the condemnation it drew from papers like the New York Tribune, the energetic action of leading members of the New York Bar Association, the prompt cognizance taken of the situation by the New York City Club and Citizens Union—if this remarkable movement of protest shall serve to awaken public men, in both parties, to a sober sense of their responsibility in dealing with one of the gravest of possible issues in a Republic, the sensational coup at Albany will have brought about a sorely needed improvement in the temper of our dealings with the problem of revolution.

For there is no essential difference between the way in which Speaker Sweet has sought to deal with the presence of the five Socialist Assemblymen and the way in which Attorney General Palmer has been conducting his anti-sedition crusade, or in which Representative Graham and his sub-committee of the House Judiciary Committee have been drafting their sedition bill. In all three of these instances, there may be real reason for the substance of what is being done or proposed; that is a question whose merits can be determined only by close and careful examination. But in all such matters the method is as important as the substance; and, so far as immediate effects are concerned, the method is infinitely more important than the substance.

When Mr. Palmer, without a word of authoritative public explanation, sweeps thousands of members of the Communist parties—big and little, ring-leaders and thoughtless or ignorant followers alike—into his dragnet, he arouses a maximum of justifiable resentment with a minimum of salutary effect. When Mr. Graham exhausts the possibilities of the dictionary in specifying the greatest conceivable variety of acts which he proposes shall be declared seditious felonies; when in his eagerness he actually defines some of these as treason, and, though he had been at work on the bill for months, discovers only after its text had been published that the Constitution (in one of its most familiar provisions) forbids any such definition of treason; when, after making this discovery, he imagines that he can remedy the difficulty by simply substituting the word "sedition," or the word "felony," for the word "treason," while yet retaining the death penalty prescribed for the crime so labeled—when such things as these are done, we are in the presence of that same phenomenon of the creation of a maximum of odium with a minimum of benefit. And precisely that is true of the performance at Albany.

Let us try to imagine what course would have been taken by the Chairman of a legislative body confronting in a serious spirit the serious problem presented by the election of a group of men whose party obligations were such as to make their exclusion necessary from the standpoint of high public policy. He would have sought, first of all, to make it manifest that he realized the extraordinary character of the proceeding which he was about to recommend. He would have taken care to make it impossible to charge him with springing a sensational surprise upon the men against whom the proceeding was to be directed. He would have made it plain that they were to have all the benefits of the presumption of fitness for the seats to which they had been duly elected until they had been deliberately adjudged unfit. Above all, so far from asking for an immediate judgment—even such provisional judgment as that calling for their suspension pending investigation—he would have impressed upon the legislators the imperative duty of deliberate consideration of so vital a question before action of any kind was taken upon it.

Had this been done, how different would have been the effect on the public mind! Fair-minded men might still have decided against the proposed exclusion either as being a violation of the general spirit of representative government, or as being contrary to the dictates of political wisdom; but they would have felt that a case had been put before them which could be calmly argued upon its intrinsic merits. Attention would have been focused upon the one substantial question in the case: have these men entered into an obligation with their party organization which is inconsistent with their oath of office? As it is, the thought of the public is centred on the crude brutality of the onslaught, to the exclusion of the question whether occasion existed for any action at all in the premises. Speaker Sweet may make all the distinctions he pleases between proscription of opinion and exclusion of disloyalty; people who begin by siding with the Socialist members simply because they have not had a square deal will refuse to split hairs on the subject.

The resolution suspending the Socialist Assemblymen was passed without debate, and with only two dissenting votes besides those of the Socialists themselves. This may very naturally be pointed to as evidence of a state of acute hysteria. Only under the influence of intense excitement, it may be said, could Republicans and Democrats alike have been swept into such sudden action. But the truth, to our mind, is precisely the reverse of this. The thing was done with the haste of a mechanical habit, not that of intense feeling. We have fallen into the way of going through the motions of hysterical excitement without the least evidence of experiencing the excitement itself. The rank and file of the legislators were as much taken by surprise as were the Socialist members. The thing presented itself to their minds as a question of pronouncing a shibboleth rather than of deciding a high question of law or of public policy. The doctrines of the Socialist platform are abhorrent to normal Americans; and what the legislators, with no time for reflection, thought they were doing was simply to express this abhorrence.

The appearance of hysteria which we encounter in so many ways arises from a failure to distinguish between the mere freeing of one's mind and the taking of responsible public action. If we were under the strain of real anxiety over an immediately threatening peril, we should be infinitely more careful than we are in deciding upon our course of conduct. We should be calculating consequences, instead of merely expressing desires. There might be a greater amount of genuine hysteria, but there would be incomparably less of the mock variety. And while there would be vastly less of spectacular moves, either legislative or executive, there would be much more effective defense against the actual danger of revolutionary agitations. To deny that that danger exists is as foolish as to lose one's head over its immediate formidableness.

The Jackson-Day Bombshell

Mr. Wilson's Jackson-Day letter was almost universally understood by the press as a declaration against the settlement of the treaty question by any practicable adjustment of the difference between the Democratic and Republican position in the Senate. Acting upon this interpretation, the three leading New York papers which have stood by the President through thick and thin promptly expressed their emphatic disapproval of his attitude. The World, the Times, and the Evening Post were all equally outspoken in their condemnation. This would in itself be an impressive phenomenon; but its import is heightened by the fact, which no reasonable person can dispute, that public opinion had for weeks been manifestly and overwhelmingly displayed to the same effect. There is plenty of room for doubt as to what the country thinks ideally desirable in regard to the Covenant; there is no room whatever to doubt that its practical wish is for an immediate ratification of the treaty upon such terms as a reasonably conciliatory spirit on the two sides in the Senate is capable of bringing about.

If this popular desire were opposed to the convictions or the judgment of the Senators themselves, it would be their duty to stand out against it. But it is quite certain that the sentiment of the Senate is in agreement with this wish of the people. As Mr. McCumber said, in a speech which he made in New York at the very moment when Mr. Wilson's manifesto was being read in Washington: If the President would say to-morrow, "it is now up to the Senate, as a coordinate branch of the treaty-making power, free from Executive dictation or pressure, to perform its function, and up to each Senator to exercise his own judgment," the treaty could be put through, with the League of Nations, within twenty-four hours.

It now looks as though the Democratic Senators were going to perform their Constitutional function without waiting for the President's permission. The spectacle of their paralysis has been pitiful. It has been all the more pitiful because they have bowed to the President's will without even knowing, without even professing to know, what that will was. They do not know now. They are perfectly justified in asserting, as some of them have explicity done, that the President's Jackson-Day letter does not clearly shut the door to compromise. Its language, though arrogant in tone and giving no indication that he recognizes any necessity of yielding an inch of his original position, does not expressly assert that he will not yield. Only when the plain question of yes or no is put up to him through the adoption of a resolution of ratification by a two-thirds' vote of the Senate will it be possible to determine what his answer will be. There is reason to hope that the Senate will at last shoulder its share of the task and thereby compel the President squarely to shoulder his. Not until that is done shall we know whether Mr. Wilson is prepared to take upon himself the awful responsibility of preventing our country from bearing its part in the effort of the nations to safeguard peace, and to restore prosperity, in a war-racked world.

Never has the President given a more striking illustration of the possibilities of a single-track mind than on this occasion. Half a year ago, when the treaty was first presented to the Senate, he made an agonized plea for its prompt ratification on the ground of the world's desperate need for a speedy settlement. Now he has so completely forgotten that need that it is not even remotely alluded to in his letter. But the country has not forgotten it. It is that consideration, and no other, that has led men of all shades of opinion, with the exception of those who are fundamentally opposed to any compact of the nature of the League Covenant, to waive their personal opinions and preferences. The state of the world is neither more satisfactory nor more assured than it was six months ago. Almost everything we hear from the other side of the water indicates the eagerness of European nations to accept America's participation in the League on any reasonable terms upon which it can be had. The vague rumors that the President or the State Department had knowledge of difficulties that would be set up by some of the Allied Powers if any substantial reservations were made, have ceased to be heard. The President makes no reference to anything of the kind; so far as anybody knows, he is acting solely upon his own personal judgment, with no more counsel from foreign statesmen than from the public men of his own country—and that is about as near to absolute zero as one can get.

With regard to the President's suggestion that "if there is any doubt as to what the people of the country think on this vital matter," the next election should be given "the form of a great and solemn referendum" upon it, there is room for an interesting conjecture. As a reason for postponing action on the treaty, the suggestion is absurd. But it would be entirely possible for Mr. Wilson, in case a ratification with reservations were presented to him, to take the position that his acceptance of that result does not preclude the adoption of the referendum proposal. It would be a bold, but not a reckless, political stroke for him to say that he takes half a loaf not as a substitute for a whole one, but as an instalment. He declares that he knows what the country wants—it wants the Covenant as it was drawn, and a whole-hearted execution of all its provisions. If this is his sincere conviction, the way is perfectly open for him to act upon it without placing at hazard the collapse of all that has been accomplished, and without keeping the world in a state of intolerable uncertainty for fourteen months.

The only way in which, in any case, the referendum could be effectually held would be by Mr. Wilson being himself the candidate of his party for the Presidency. With the treaty unratified, this would be a monstrous and wicked gamble—a game of double or quits, with the world's peace and happiness as the stake. But with the treaty ratified it would be a fair and normal contest on principles and policies. The issue indeed would be momentous, but the contest would not in itself be a calamity. Mr. Wilson's triumph would be accepted by the nation as conclusive, no matter what subsidiary causes might have played their part in the contest. If he really desires that solemn referendum, let him insist upon it by all means; but let him not demand that his wish be gratified at the cost of untold evil and incalculable danger to the country and to all the world.

Turkey and the Powers

THE dying body of the sick man has been lying on the operating table ever since, by signing of the armistice, he surrendered it to the mercy of his surgeons. He had not deserved any, and, until recently, could not expect to receive it. He was not laid there to be cured, but to be made harmless. For in health and in sickness he acted the tyrant over the family of races under his rule, and to maim him into incapacity for evil was a duty which the men in consultation round the patient owed to humanity and civilization.

But the operation was postponed from month to month. The United States was blamed for the delay by Mr. Lloyd George, whose words to that effect we quoted last week. Expectations roused by statements of Mr. Wilson and Colonel House gave the Allied diplomats reason to hope that the acceptance by this country of a mandate for Constantinople and Armenia would free them from the difficult task of settling the disposal of Turkey among themselves. America's aloofness, however, leaves them no other choice than to proceed without her assistance, with the prospect of disturbing their own harmony or, in order to keep that in tune, of restoring the patient to life. Sentiment, both in America and Europe, is opposed to leaving the Turk in possession of Constantinople and Thrace, but sentiment does not preside at the councils of diplomats. Ideas of justice and honor give way there to considerations of interests, and the clash of these may result in serving no one's interest but the Turk's.

The Porte has always traded on the rivalry between the Powers. Fear and distrust of Russia made England, in 1853, fight Turkey's war in the Crimea, and caused Disraeli, in spite of Gladstone's denunciation of Turkish horrors in Bulgaria, to plead for the criminal at the Berlin Conference of 1878. This policy of thwarting Russia by aiding Turkey had the additional advantage of raising England's prestige in India. By propagating the notion that Constantinople was the Dar-ul-Islam, the seat of Mohammedanism, the British could pose as the protectors of the Caliphate. His reputed sanctity is actually a development of recent growth in India, and is now an obstacle to the Eastern policy of the very Power which favored its spread. For the situation in the near East has changed. Russia no longer covets the city that controls the straits which are the key to the Black Sea. To oust the Turk from Europe would not be playing Russia's economic game, but it might cause indignation and unrest among the Indian Moslems whom England herself has taught to venerate the Ottoman Sultan as ipso facto Caliph. And discontent in India must be prevented at any price, as the new Russian danger is in the exploitation of such discontent for the spread of Bolshevism in Asia.

It would seem, therefore, that England's safety would prescribe to her a policy that would concur with that of the Quai d'Orsay. For reasons similar to those which, in the days of the Tsardom, made Great Britain an ally of Turkey against Russia, the French prefer a continuation of the Sultan's rule in Constantinople to a British mandate for the city. In spite, however, of this double advantage of placating both India and France, the Government in London is reported to favor a different solution of the problem. Two years ago Mr. Lloyd George did not yet contemplate expelling the Sultan from Europe. On January 5, 1918, he declared: "We are not fighting to deprive Turkey of its capital or of the rich and renowned lands of Asia Minor and Thrace, which are predominantly Turkish in race." What has happened since then to make the British Prime Minister change his mind?

Public opinion in England is probably responsible for this volte face. The massacred in Armenia and the dead of Gallipoli call from their graves, and the prospect of a Constantinople wrested from the Asiatic usurper makes an appeal to the popular imagination too strong to be ignored by the Government. Lloyd George will have to find a solution that is a compromise between British sentiment and the practical policy of Paris. The former requires that it shall not be Great Britain, the latter that it shall not be the Turk, who in future will control the bridge between Europe and Asia. If Clio were an arbiter at the Council of Paris, she would assign the mandate for Constantinople and Turkish Thrace to the one nation that can claim it with any right consecrated by the past. But Mr. Venizelos will plead in vain. Italian jealousy will oppose a Greek mandate, and the bitter hatred between Bulgarians and Greeks, which would expose Constantinople under Greek control to Bulgarian raids and invasions, makes that solution inadvisable. The substitution of an international state for the Sultan's rule in European Turkey seems, under these conditions, the only possible solution. It is better to charge the various conflicting interests with a common responsibility for the future of the city than to entrust its control to a disinterested outsider who, if a great Power, will, in course of time, by his political ascendancy become a dangerous rival of the others in the economic field as well. And a small Power, as a mandatory for Constantinople, would scarcely escape being made the dummy of either France or England, or, if it did escape, would all the same be suspected of being one. Norway, it is rumored, will be offered the mandate for Armenia. A similar responsibility for Constantinople is evidently, and justly, not suggested to her. An international régime such as controls the navigation on the Rhine and the Danube is doubtless the best that can be devised for the city whose situation on the Straits, controlling navigation between the Black Sea and the Mediterranean, makes it a bone of contention between the Powers.

The Sultan's loss of his temporal power over Stamboul and European Turkey need not involve his expulsion from the city. If the veneration of the Moslem in India for the Dar-ul-Islam and the Caliphate is actually as genuine as it is said to be, it would be wise policy to leave the Sultan like the Pope in Rome, as the spiritual head of the Sunnite Mohammedan world, in the holy seat of Islam.

End of the Steel Strike

At its begnning, and for a few weeks thereafter, the steel strke took a leading place in the news columns of the dailies, in editorial comment, and in the thought of the masses. Its officially declared ending, last week, and the resignation of William Z. Foster, the secretary by whom it had been organized and largely directed, drew a sensational headline from no single newspaper that has come under our observation. To all intents and purposes, as a strike, it had passed out of existence long before its demise was officially announced.

In truth, the germs of its inevitable dissolution were visible from the start to competent observers from the outside, and probably to many of the better informed labor leaders themselves. Its lurid pictures of alleged conditions in the steel industry were not generally believed, indications pointed to different aims from those openly set forth, and its management was largely directed by men distrusted because of known revolutionary beliefs and connections. Under such conditions, its appeals for popular sympathy and support were futile. If there is satisfaction to any in the belief that it nevertheless cost the steel interests scores of millions of dollars, this satisfaction can not be denied. It was a costly experience, nor did the loss and inconvenience stop with the manufacturers and immediate consumers of steel. The evil effects of such an interruption in any great productive industry extend in greater or less measure to all. In proportion to ability to stand the loss, perhaps the greatest sufferers were the workmen and their families.

Are there any gains to set off against this loss? If not, if such an experience could leave a country without at least some lessons of value for the future, the hope of progress would be small indeed. The steel strike, we think, has helped to convince most laborers themselves that no strike any longer holds promise of success if it does not command the moral support of the mass of citizens not immediately connected with either side of the controversy. This is a limitation of the strike imposed by the very nature of free society, and the sooner labor leaders accept it and conduct themselves accordingly, the less likely will they be called upon to accept limitations of a severer nature imposed by the law of the State. The riot of striking which has marked the past year has strained the public patience to the point where a continuance of the nuisance would soon make it impossible to get popular sympathy even for justified strikes.

If labor leaders will not take this lesson seriously to heart, substantial injury to their legitimate interests may easily be the result. There is danger of this in the case of the steel workers themselves. There has been great improvement in their wages, and in the conditions under which they work, but there is warrant for the belief that a satisfactory state has not yet been reached. It seems probable, though exact information is hard to obtain, that the twelve-hour shift is far more common than is consistent with the interests of the workers and with sound public policy, which will not seek increased production at the cost of vital injury to the manhood which produces. It must not be forgotten, of course, that for four hours of the twelve-hour shift the workman receives "time and a half" in wages, a difference which may easily mean to many the purchase of a home within a few years' time, or a good savings account against the mischances of the future. The question is whether the opportunity to make this extra money can be retained without compelling to the twelve-hour shift thousands who do not desire it, and to whom it is a great evil and hardship. But the misrepresentations of existing conditions uttered by Foster in support of the strike served only to exasperate employers and disinterested citizens, and to take their thoughts away from the existence and the needed solution of such problems.

The resignation of William Z. Foster may indicate that another needed lesson has been at least partially learned. His good American name does not alter the fact that he had deeply identified himself with agitators and ideas wholly alien to the Americanism which the great majority accept, and stand ready to defend with life if it shall be seriously assaulted. Against his claim to have abandoned these offensive ideas, the public could only place his former assertion that none of the commonly accepted standards of moral obligation must be allowed to stand between the social revolutionist and his object. The man who has thus given himself license to lie if he chooses, in order to promote an offensive purpose, is not likely to convince thinking men, by his word alone, that he has given up that purpose. The presence of Foster at its head indissolubly connected the steel strike, in the minds of thousands, with revolutionary ideas, persons, and purposes, thus contributing heavily to its unpopularity and injuring its power to aid in the removal of such genuine causes of grievance as may exist. The American Federation of Labor and minor organizations may move slowly and gently in letting down a few objectionable individuals, but the coming year is pretty likely to show a marked reaction against being "bored from within" by agitators of the William Z. Foster type, whether they have professed conversion or not.

But the very facts which thus made the failure of the steel strike inevitable, also estop us from considering that failure as a final settlement of the labor problem in the steel industry. With the immediate menace to that industry removed, it becomes the duty of the heads of the Steel Corporation to consider the underlying causes of labor unrest in a more fundamental way than they have yet done. The Steel Corporation's case, by its magnitude and complexity, is, to be sure, in a class by itself, and it would be rash to make any specific recommendation concerning it. But we trust that the problem of the best practicable relation between employer and employed will receive, at the hands of Judge Gary and his associates, that earnest and intense attention which its vital importance deserves.

"Two-thirds of Both Houses"

In a case in which Mr. Root is acting as chief counsel, it is claimed that the Eighteenth Amendment is null and void because two-thirds of the members of Congress did not, by joint resolution or otherwise, declare that they deemed it necessary. The language of the Constitution on the subject is as follows: "The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution." Nothing is said about a two-thirds vote; nothing is said about the members present; what is called for is "two-thirds of both houses." The objection thus raised rests on no fine-spun or metaphysical view; it is simply a question of fact. It was not "two-thirds of both houses," but only two-thirds of the members voting, that placed the Eighteenth Amendment before the Legislatures for ratification. The Supreme Court, when the case is brought before it, will have to pass upon the question whether two-thirds of the members voting are to be regarded as two-thirds of the house.

The point derives a great deal of added force from the fact that in the provision of the Constitution which refers to the ratification of treaties, the language is altogether different. The President, it says, "shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the senators present concur." The presumption is very strong that if the like had been the intention in the case of proposal of amendments to the Constitution the language would have so stated with the same clearness. Furthermore, there is strong inherent reason for a distinction between the two cases. A treaty, generally speaking, comes up as part of the ordinary business of the nation; an amendment to the Constitution makes a permanent change, possibly a change of underlying and structural importance, in the frame of our government. The vote of two-thirds of the members present may not only fall far short of two-thirds of the whole, but may conceivably be barely more than one-third of the whole, since a majority is sufficient for a quorum.

If, over and above the import of the words themselves, the Supreme Court should feel it proper to take into account the circumstances of the particular vote now in question, this would add greatly to the force of the contention against the amendment. It was passed by Congress at a time of abnormal tension, in the midst of the greatest of wars, and when the thought of the nation could not be effectively directed to the subject. It had been promoted by a propaganda organized with unprecedented efficiency, which never for a moment relaxed its pressure. It had not been an issue—that is, not openly an issue—in the elections. Every circumstance that should distinguish the character of the process by which an amendment is adopted was absent. The emotional force of the spirit of sacrifice evoked by the war was capitalized to the utmost in the interest of a measure which was not to go into force until the war was over, and which was thereafter to affect the lives of all the inhabitants of the nation for generation after generation. If there ever was a case for insisting upon the rigorous fulfillment of the requirements of the Constitution, surely this is such a case. If the Constitution is to be subjected to amendment by snap judgment—and above all to amendment of a character so revolutionary as this—we have a right to demand that, however much the spirit of our organic law may be violated, its letter at least shall be strictly observed.

THE REVIEW

A weekly journal of political and general discussion

Published by
THE NATIONAL WEEKLY CORPORATION
140 Nassau Street, New York
FABIAN FRANKLIN, President
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER, Treasurer

RODMAN GILDER, Business Manager

Subscription price, five dollars a year in advance. Fifteen cents a copy. Foreign postage, one dollar extra; Canadian postage, fifty cents extra. Foreign subscriptions may be sent to Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons, Ltd., 24, Bedford St., Strand, London, W. C. 2, England.
Copyright, 1920, in the United States of America
Editors
FABIAN FRANKLIN
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER

Out of Their Own Mouths

THE publication by the State Department of a "Memorandum on Certain Aspects of the Bolshevist Movement in Russia" is a departure of unusual importance. It is obvious that much of the information obtained by the Department in the conduct of its work is private and confidential, and delicate negotiations might be jeopardized by making it common property; but the more the public is made acquainted with the facts the better. The State Department has better sources of information than other agencies, and by giving out to the public all that is permissible and consistent with the public interest it not only forestalls and confounds those who deliberately circulate false information for their own purposes, but establishes a sound basis for popular support of its policies. This is preëminently the case with the pamphlet that has just appeared. Complaint has been made that its publication was delayed some three months after it had been prepared and printed, and that this delay was due to uncertainty as to the attitude of the President. But—better late than never; for the clear showing in its pages puts an end once for all to any talk of recognizing the autocracy at Moscow or compromising with evil because it appears triumphant.

In this connection, the introduction is illuminating and shows plainly the conclusions reached by the State Department after its examination of the Bolsheviks' own material.

The Russian Division of the State Department has prepared from original sources this brief summary of what appear to be some of the fundamental Bolshevist principles, methods, and aims. As will be seen, the statements are based almost entirely on translations from the Bolshevist newspapers in the files of the Department. These newspapers are the official organs of the All-Russian Central Executive Committee of Soviets, of local Soviet committees, or of the Russian Communist Party Bolsheviks . . .

The theoretical "dictatorship of the proletariat," acknowledged to be the rule of a minority, with a definite policy of preliminary destruction, is found in fact to have degenerated into a close monopoly of power by a very small group, who use the most opportunistic and tyrannical methods, including "mass terror."

While existing on the accumulated wealth of the country, the Bolshevist régime has brought about a complete economic collapse, with consequent famine and epidemic. The claim of the Bolsheviks that economic isolation is wholly responsible for economic chaos in Soviet Russia cannot be sustained. The Bolshevist program has not worked and Bolshevism has to its credit no constructive accomplishment.

One of the main aims of the Bolshevist leaders from the very beginning has been to make their movement a world-wide social revolution. They incidentally declare that success in Russia depends on the development of corresponding social revolutions in all other countries. Bolshevist policies and tactics are subordinated to the idea of the international proletarian revolution. Apparent compromises with "bourgeois" governments or countries have proved temporary and tactical.

The Memorandum is a scholarly production and its method is above criticism. It takes up in turn various phases of Bolshevik rule, including the "dictatorship of the proletariat," the elections to Soviets, the Extraordinary Commissions, mass terror, class discrimination in food rations, the Red Army, and the protests of the peasants, and in regard to each quotes verbatim the official Bolshevik decrees and newspapers. Similarly it describes the economic results of Bolshevist control, showing the abandonment of announced principles, the policy of destruction, the issue of billions of worthless paper money, the disorganization of administrative machinery, the tyranny over labor, the breakdown of transportation, the distress in the agricultural districts, and the general industrial collapse. Finally, there is set forth the Bolshevist programme of world revolution, in which frank acknowledgment is made of the propaganda carried on throughout the world, as well as cynical disregard of any treaties or agreements which may be entered into. Half of the Memorandum is devoted to translations of the Bolsheviks' own decrees and documents—indisputable and complete evidence.

Among the quotations from the official Bolshevik papers, some are especially striking. A man in the Province of Tambov writes to Izvestia the following, which is pretty good evidence as to why the peasants hate the Bolshevik Government:

Help! We are perishing! At the time when we are starving, do you know what is going on in the villages? Take, for instance, our village, Olkhi. Speculation is rife there, especially with salt, which sells at 40 rubles a pound. What does the militia do? What do the Soviets do? When it is reported to them, they wave their hands and say, "This is a normal phenomenon." Not only this, but the militiamen, beginning with the chief and including some communists, are all engaged in brewing their own alcohol, which sells for 70 rubles a bottle. Nobody who is in close touch with the militia is afraid to engage in this work. Hunger is ahead of us, but neither the citizens nor the "authorities" recognize it. The people's judge also drinks, and if one wishes to win a case one only needs to treat him to a drink. We live in a terrible filth.

The following figures given out by Rykov, President of the Supreme Soviet of National Economy, in a statement to the Moscow Soviet last March and published in the Severnaya Kommuna, express more clearly the economic ruin wrought by the incompetence of the Soviet authorities than any statement made by their adversaries.

We have 100,000,000 puds (1,650,000 tons) of coal, 10,000,000 puds of grain, and several million puds of fish at our disposal which we can not move. In the spring a part will spoil. Transport is impossible, as we have no fuel, and the situation in regard to the want of it is that 2,000,000 puds of machine oil had to be used as substitute for want of liquid fuel. Railroad communication will have to be reduced, which will again reflect on the supply of food. We have, therefore, to utilize transport by river as soon as navigation is opened. We also will have to fight with the local Soviets, who often hide their stocks, as, for instance, the Yarovlav Soviet hiding 500,000 puds of petroleum. The textile industry is also in a critical state; up to 10,000,000 puds of cotton is wanted and flax is scarce, as the peasants spin for their own needs or use it for heating purposes. A way out of these difficulties would be to take the Caucasus with its supply of petroleum and to increase productiveness of labor. At present we produce only five pairs of boots for 100 people, and however so many Kerensky rubles we would pay to workmen, only 1 in 20 can receive a pair.

The same paper quoted a report made by Zinoviev at a meeting held in connection with the strike at Putilov factory to the effect that from August, 1918, to February, 1919, the factory had turned out only five locomotives, while for the year 1918 the factory had cost the State a deficit of 58,000,000 rubles.

This Memorandum of the State Department will serve another good purpose. It will open the eyes of America to the militant danger of Bolshevism. Hitherto there has been a tendency to regard our own Bolsheviks as misguided individuals, mostly aliens ignorant of or out of sympathy with our democratic institutions. Now we know that they are the flying squadron of the propaganda army and that we have among us citizens invoking for these agents the protection of the rights of free speech merely as a smoke screen to cover their hostile activities.

The Bolshevik régime in Russia has become an aggressive imperialistic power, disposing of a large military force and directing also a vast and well-trained propagandist army. It is no longer a contest of ideas that confronts us—if indeed it ever was.

These imperialistic aims are expressed in a programme for world revolution, and the extent to which any government could count upon their good faith in making agreements or treaties is made clear in their own singularly frank announcements. Thus Trotsky in his "Peace Program," says:

> If in awaiting the imminent proletarian flood in Europe, Russia should be forced to conclude peace with the present day Governments of the Central Powers, it would be a provisional, temporary, and transitory peace, with the revision of which the European Revolution will have to concern itself in the first instance. Our whole policy is built upon the expectation of this revolution.

A similar attitude is disclosed even more strikingly in the speech made by Zinoviev, President of the Petrograd Soviet, last February:

> We are willing to sign an unfavorable peace with the Allies. . . . It would only mean that we should put no trust whatever in the bit of paper we should sign. We should use the breathing space so obtained in order to gather our strength in order that the mere continued existence of our Government would keep up the world-wide propaganda which Soviet Russia has been carrying on for more than a year.

Lenin himself, however, sets forth the whole plan with singular clarity and characteristic Bolshevik logic in his proclamation calling the Congress of the Communist International:

> The present is the period of destruction and crushing of the capitalistic system of the whole world, and it will be a catastrophe for the whole European culture, should capitalism with all its insoluble contradictions not be done away with.
>
> The aim of the proletariat must now be immediately to conquer power. To conquer power means to destroy the governmental apparatus of the bourgeois and to organize a new proletarian governmental apparatus.
>
> The new apparatus of the Government must express the dictatorship of the working class (and in certain places even the dictatorship of the half-proletariat in the villages, that is, the peasant proletariat), that is, to persist in the systematic suppression of the exploiting classes and be the means of expropriating them. No false bourgeois democracy—this treacherous form of the power of a financial oligarchy—with its mere external equality—but a proletarian democracy able to realize the freedom of the working masses; no parliamentarism, but the self-government of the masses through their elected organs; no capitalistic bureaucracy, but governing organs which have been appointed by the masses themselves, through the real participation of these masses in the governing of the country and the socialistic work of reorganization—such ought to be the type of the proletarian state. The Soviet power or a corresponding organization of government is its concrete expression.
>
> The dictatorship of the proletariat must be the occasion for the immediate expropriation of capital and the elimination of the private right of owning the means of production, through making them common public property. The socialization (meaning doing away with private property and making it the property of the proletarian state, which is managed by the workers on a socialistic basis) of the large-scale industries and the central bodies organized by the same, including the banks, the confiscation of the capitalistic agricultural production, the monopolization of large-scale commerce, the socialization of the large buildings in the towns and in the country; the establishment of a workmen's government and the concentration of the economic functions in the hands of the organs of the proletarian dictatorship—are the most essential aims of the day.
>
> In order to protect the socialist revolution against external and internal enemies, and to assist the fighting proletariats of other countries, it becomes necessary to entirely disarm the bourgeoisie and its agents and to arm the proletariat.
>
> The world situation demands immediate and as perfect as possible relations between the different groups of the revolutionary proletariat and a complete alliance of all the countries in which the revolution has already succeeded.
>
> The most important method is the mass action of the proletariat, including armed struggle against the Government power of capitalists.
>
> The destruction of State authority is the aim which all Socialists have set for themselves, Marx included and at the head; without the realization of this aim true democratism, that is, equality and liberty, cannot be realized. This aim can be realized in actual fact only by a Soviet or proletarian democracy, for by bringing into constant and actual participation in the administration of the State the mass organizations of the toilers, it begins immediately to prepare for the complete decay of any State.

The national anti-Bolshevik movements in Russia have failed, and the spring may see Poland and Rumania swept by the Red armies. Then Europe faces another war, a war for which the Allies are ill-prepared, a war from which America can scarcely stand aloof. With eastern Europe in revolution and all Asia ablaze, we may have again to throw our forces into a struggle that is a greater menace to civilization than was German imperialism.

And those who are accounted statesmen are taking no wise or adequate measures to meet the menace. Mr. Lloyd George seems inclined to come to terms with the Soviet Government if only it will promise to cease its campaigns against Persia, Afghanistan, and India, hoping at the same time to win to himself the pro-Bolshevik labor element in his own country. Of course, the promise would not be kept, but even if it were, one can scarcely picture a proud and self-respecting nation buying peace on such craven terms. M. Clemenceau still clings to the cordon sanitaire and barrier-state idea, an equally ineffectual and dangerous plan. It is, indeed, repugnant to think of egging on the weak new states of eastern Europe, already torn with long-continued warfare, with unstable governments, and disorganized economic life, to do our fighting for us. Furthermore, nothing would tend more to consolidate the Bolshevik power and rally to it Russian national feeling. Every Russian would feel that these countries were being hired for the task and that slices of Russia would be the price paid. They already believe that the Allies, and especially England, covertly desire that the Russia of the future shall be weakened by dismemberment. Lloyd George practically admitted as much in his speech of November 19.

Our situation in the face of the new menace is similar to what it was when German imperialism threatened the world. The same forces are at work to blind us to the issues. Bolshevik tools and dupes are among us, arousing feeling against Great Britain by false tales of oppression in India, by pleas for Egyptian independence, by Sinn Fein propaganda; stirring up animosity against Japan; inciting labor troubles and class hostility; and camouflaging all their multifarious activities under the cloak of "liberalism." We have let go the opportunity to act in time to save the greater sacrifices. A year ago generous aid in money and supplies to the loyal Russian forces would have eradicated the cancer from Moscow, without the need of sending a soldier. But the moral issue was not clear, for our people listened to cunning propagandists, who represented Kolchak and Denikin as reactionaries and restorers of Tsarism and diverted attention from the actual tsarism of Lenin and Trotsky. The opportunity passed, and millions of lives have already paid the price of delay.

JEROME LANDFIELD

Can We Improve Our Public Schools?

FOR holding the views on the subject of education which are expressed in this article, the writer has been accused of heresy. Granted that a plain sailor can not pretend to be an authority on such matters, yet, as the onlookers at a game of chess often perceive situations and possibilities that escape the notice of the players themselves, he has reached the conclusion that in some respects the present scheme of public education is fairly open to criticism. It is in the hope that his humble contribution to the discussion of an important topic may prove useful that he offers these random observations, if only as a man of straw to be knocked down.

To begin at the beginning—can anything be more depressing than the sight of children, some of them tiny tots, lugging home piles of text-books every afternoon that the next day's lessons may be learned by them out of school hours, or, as is more frequently the case, taught them by their parents? Why should such a practice be tolerated? What are teachers for if not to teach? Why should parents be called upon to do work for which teachers are paid, thus turning the latter into mere hearers of lessons? The custom seems quite universal and encouraged, or at least not discouraged. Yet, in my opinion, thus to encroach upon a child's play hours, which should be devoted to healthy exercise, is little less than a crime. Never do my eyes fall on this painful spectacle but I say to myself, "The school that child attends is rotten." If the school hours are adequate, must we not believe that they are misused—wasted? To extend them is unthinkable. Going a step farther, I am convinced that the taking home of text-books and the studying there of lessons should be positively prohibited to boys and girls under, say, thirteen years of age. Their health and strength and growth are too precious to themselves and the nation to be jeopardized. Had I a child subjected to this merciless régime, I should peremptorily forbid it to bring any text-book out of school.

Still another step along this iconoclastic road which I am inviting my readers to tread with me; why any text-books at all for these young scholars, saving only history and readers? As they seem unnecessary to me, I am led to wonder whether schoolmasters and schoolmistresses do not follow the line of least resistance and assign lessons to be learned from text-books rather than do the teaching themselves. It is distasteful to suggest that they should choose upon which horn of the dilemma to impale themselves, laziness or incompetence; therefore some other reason must exist as to which my ignorance needs enlightenment.

Except readers, there were no text-books at Professor Thomas's school in New Haven, which I attended when a youngster, and as, in my belief, no better primary school ever existed on this planet, I have good ground for my opinions. Of course, I must admit that he was an extraordinary master—his Christian name should have been Deodato, for surely never was a pedagogue more truly God-given. When his school closed for the day his scholars were absolutely free. What results attended his system, it may be asked. Suffice it to say that his boys of twelve could read well, write well, indite a good letter in accepted form, both business and personal; spell excellently, draw maps from memory, cipher with the best. They knew their history thoroughly as far as he carried them, and a little about chemistry and mineralogy as well, through practical demonstrations; many of them could set up type, and they did with their own hands make out, compose, and print the weekly school standing; all could keep books in double entry. The secret lay in that Professor Thomas did nothing himself which he could make his boys do for themselves. Few were the lessons he heard in person or the exercises he corrected, although from his raised platform he supervised all. In spelling, geography, and mental arithmetic, for example, the boys themselves conducted the quiz after the manner of the good old New England spelling bee. In dictation each boy pointed out the mistakes on some other boy's slate (for of course the wasteful pad had no place in this model school), and was marked not only for his own errors, but for those also which he had failed to note on the slate passed to him.

Under Professor Thomas, scholars acquired those most essential of all faculties, mental abstraction and the knowledge of how to study. Do these find their place in our common schools? I greatly fear not, yet even after the lapse of many years they still remain with me as priceless possessions.

In the great world outside the schoolroom every man finds himself working under the inexorable law of rewards and penalties, and he whose career is crowned with success has won more of the former and incurred fewer of the latter than his fellows. What rewards do our schools hold out for close application and the rapid accomplishment of the daily task? Absolutely none except, possibly, the prizes offered at the end of the term. To expect the average boy to work hard over his books during what seems to him an eternity that he may at its end receive, perchance, a book of poetry, is mere folly; something more immediate and appealing to his nature is required.

Let us digress a moment and inquire into what it is that makes progress so slow in our schools. Undoubtedly the cause lies in the fact that the so-called dull boys hold back their brighter comrades, just as in the navy the speed of the slowest ship is that of the squadron. To increase the latter the former must be increased. There is no alternative. I do not know whether the expediting of the laggards is the guiding principle in our schools, although convinced that it ought to be; while I have no reason to suppose that the teaching of how to study is recognized as the most important part of a master's duty. If that is achieved all the rest of education becomes plain sailing. I may be a heretic in holding that unless a master or mistress can teach how to study he or she is of little value. This can not be done by punishment, as, for instance, "keeping after school." Experience has demonstrated the futility of such a procedure. Why not take the other tack and try the virtue of competition and rewards, the very basis of business management?

To illustrate, suppose I were given a free hand in dealing with one average class. I would first see to it that a playground for pleasant and a gymnasium for foul weather were available. I would then address my boys somewhat after this fashion:

"I have a stop-watch here by which to time you in learning a certain poem. When I say 'go,' open your books at page 82 and begin to memorize the poem. As soon as any one of you knows it perfectly, let him raise his hand. At my nod, he can leave the schoolroom and play outside until the bell sounds at the end of the hour, when of course he must return. Now be sure that you do know the poem perfectly. I have someone waiting outside who will test you and send you back if you do not. Moreover, your word next time will not be fully accepted; you will have to pay for your error by remaining in your seat for a while. And let me warn each of you not to get into the habit of deceiving himself. The one person with whom you must always be honest is your own self. Now for the race—Go!"*

I would note the exact time required for each boy to do the task—thus getting a measure of his mental speed and self-honesty, as well as data upon which to gauge and record his progress in concentration. It is to the laggards, thus self proclaimed, that I would then devote all possible attention, helping them to lubricate their brain mechanism by taking them under intensive training through one small part of the lesson at a time. Eventually I should be in a position to report to the Superintendent that Johnnie Green, for example, was mentally so far below normal that he should be set apart and not be kept in the class to hold back his fellows—a rank injustice to them. It is the best pace of the normal or average boy which should be accepted for the whole class—not that of the cleverest or of the dullest.

*I have taken the simplest case, that of pure memorizing. The reader can easily extend the idea to cover more complex cases.

Granted that some boys are brighter than others, just as some machines work with less friction and more efficiency than others, yet I feel strongly that very often the so-called dull scholar merely lacks the faculty of abstraction and close attention. He will confidently assert that he has devoted the whole hour to his lesson and he really thinks he has done so. As a matter of fact he has done nothing of the sort. His mind has wandered from the text-book pages to dwell upon the next baseball game, the coming of the circus, etc., etc. He longs for the ending of the school session and wishes he were a man with this horrid confinement and repulsive study behind him. The consequence is that of the hour allowed he really gives but a fraction to his study. To such as he is the chance of getting out of doors and of joining his playmates comes like manna in the wilderness, furnishing a powerful incentive to stick close to the lesson. It is difficult to determine in advance how much time he would in this way gain for his sports, but I am sure it would prove astonishingly great.

The laws of physics apply here as everywhere else. Exactly the same amount of mental energy is expended by each boy in learning any given lesson, the difference being that some work with the minimum of friction and without stopping; others with undue friction or intermittently. It may be possible to lubricate the gears—as to this I can only hope—but it is eminently practicable to keep the wheels moving uninterruptedly. Is not this worth attempting? And is not the method I suggest extremely promising? So entirely convinced am I on this point that I am almost ready to engage to take any class, and, after a few months' training, prove that the hour allotted to study could be reduced possibly to twenty minutes without detriment. If I am correct in my forecast, this class could eventually have its tasks doubled in length and yet have twenty minutes playtime out of every hour. Of course these figures are only hypothetical, but I have seen at Professor Thomas's school such extraordinary results of the mental concentration and the knowledge of how to study inculcated there that I can not think them wildly visionary.

This supposititious class would, if I am right, go easily and thoroughly over the school course in half the time now allotted. It could keep up its speed in the grammar and high schools and be prepared for college at the age of fourteen, to graduate at eighteen, then to enter a university and go out into the world at twenty-one equipped at once to undertake its life work.

The objection will be raised that boys of fourteen are too young to leave home. Quite true, if they go to a university where the student is regarded as a man fully competent to take care of himself. What I have in mind is a small college exercising supervision over the conduct, habits, and morals of its charges. That I myself went to the Naval Academy at fourteen years of age and, thanks to Professor Thomas, went through the four years' curriculum in three years, graduating before I was eighteen, shows that my ideas are not so very chimerical after all, since I was merely an average lad, except in this, that under dear old Professor Thomas I had learned how to study and how to abstract myself from my surroundings. He discarded text-books, other than readers, completely, using wall maps and similar displays for other branches such as spelling, arithmetic, etc. To any person really anxious to learn Professor Thomas's system in detail the invitation is freely extended to come to me for a conference. A private school in any one of our large cities would, I am convinced, prove a gold mine if faithfully conducted on his lines. Our public schools would, I fear, not consider such a tremendous change, imperatively necessary as this heretic thinks it to be.

CASPAR F. GOODRICH

Correspondence

Mr. Roscoe and the Church of England

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

In his article on "The Established Church of England," in the Review of December 20, Mr. E. S. Roscoe leaves little unsaid that might be said in its dispraise. He is, indeed, so apparently confident that the Church of England is a dead thing that he almost persuades one that it must be so. If he is to be credited, not only has the inefficiency of the Church as an organized body "been clear for a long time to impartial observers," but it is even recognized by the Church itself. Surely a parlous state. We are also reminded that the Church of England has been out of touch with national feeling in England, and "never more so than during the Great War"; and that it is "tolerated good-naturedly by the nation as a whole." The Church is "characterized by lack of enthusiasm"; it "produces no great divines"; it lacks both "the simple emotionalism of the Nonconformist Churches" and "the simple-minded and unquestioning devotion of the Roman Catholic Church to its faith and to its purpose"; it "appeals now, wholeheartedly, neither to reason or feeling; it has neither an intellectual nor an emotional influence." A most comprehensively damning indictment. If all this were true, as of course it is not, in spite of Mr. Roscoe's contrary belief, this corporate Esau might well lament the loss of both a birthright and any vestige of a blessing.

It would be insulting the intelligence of your readers to attempt to tell them what the Church of England has done in the past, and what it is doing to-day, in the general cause of Christian civilization, what it has contributed to the education of England's sons and daughters, what a factor it has been in the social life of that country, how its members clerical and lay did their part in the Great War. It has been a living force, and is still a living force, in England, as it has been and still is throughout the British Empire, and as the sister church has been and is in the United States. It does seem to me that the Church of England, or the Protestant Episcopal Church, stands for certain things that were never more vitally important than they are to-day. It stands for broadmindedness, for tolerance of the views of others, for intelligent patriotism, for the reasonable freedom of the individual, for self-control rather than control by the state. It teaches its members to be charitable in the broadest and best sense of the word, to be helpful but not meddlesome, to pray but not in the market-place, to be good citizens, to play the game, in a word to be gentlemen and gentlewomen. Any church that does these things, or even makes an honest attempt to do these things, will live.

L. J. B.

Ottawa, Ont., January 1

Inviting Revolution

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

Now, as always, it is the Reds who desire the coming of the "Social Revolution"; but many of the invitations to this festive chaos are at the present moment being issued by the Repressionists. Undepreciated Americanism demands that both the Reds and Repressionists be dealt with as enemies of the Republic; and it is the task of the much abused and discredited Liberals in this country to make the demand effective. For so doing, this party of orderly progress may expect to be bitterly attacked by both sets of extremists; but it may also confidently hope to avert a disastrous social upheaval. This is the day of the Liberal; not the day of his prosperity and popularity, but the day of his opportunity. Liberalism alone can offer adequate backing for that salutary doctrine—now, unhappily, in eclipse—which requires justice for those "to whom we do not wish to be just."

The Liberal can not tolerate the use of revolutionary expedients by either of the parties to an industrial dispute, nor by the Government itself. When organized labor prepares to compel political change by means of a general strike, the Liberal, however much he may sympathize with labor's grievances, must needs oppose this method of redressing them. When organized capital presumes to use as one of its weapons the withdrawal, in certain districts, of the ordinary citizen rights of free speech, free assemblage, the even-handed public justice, the Liberal is driven to protest, even though he fears the impending tyranny of labor. And similarly, the Liberal is bound to oppose in every lawful way any action by the Government in which it seeks to guard the general welfare by discriminating, wittingly or unwittingly, against one industrial class and in favor of another. In each of these cases the guiding principle of Liberalism is an unflinching adherence to orderly justice.

It would be superfluous to urge so obvious a principle as this, were there not in the social chaos of to-day many and powerful temptations to violate it, and a widespread yielding to these temptations.

The Liberal whose sympathies incline toward the Reds often allows himself to drift into the position of acquiescing in revolution, if not of actually inviting it. He may be skeptical about the reality of the so-called democracy in the United States to-day, reasoning somewhat as follows:

> Our democracy is political only; in industry we still have autocracy. And even our political democracy is more apparent than real. Are we not in fact under a minority control, thanks to public inertia, indifference, and timidity, ignorance and mis-education; thanks also to plutocratic pressure on newspapers and magazines, on hired brainpower in general, and on political parties and officials? Is not our democracy, after all, essentially a minority dictation in the interest of stability and the capitalist class? Would it not probably involve more of gain than loss if, by "direct action," another minority dictatorship were substituted, in the interest of change, perhaps progress, rather than stability, and of the labor class instead of the capitalist?

The Liberal who answers this last question in the affirmative has ceased to be a Liberal. He has become a Red. By hesitating to give it a negative answer, many Liberals are at the present moment inviting revolution. To distrust the use of unlawful violence as a means to progress is the very essence of Liberalism; and the demand for "direct action" is a clear call to unlawful violence against our Governmental institutions.

The Liberal whose sympathies incline toward the Repressionists is in an equally perilous predicament. He sincerely believes that law and order must be maintained at any cost in these unsteady times; hence he finds it easy to condone the "treat 'em rough" tactics so commonly used against "undesirable citizens." The following news item will illustrate:

> Cincinnati, Nov. 18.—Three hundred members of the American Legion, led by their officers, raided headquarters of the Socialist party here to-night. Hundreds of pounds of literature were thrown to the street, where it was burned.

However bitter the Liberal's opposition to Socialism may be, and however enthusiastic his support of the American Legion, his plain duty is to condemn this outrage and do his part in seeing that it receives a suitable punishment. To do anything else is to fall weakly into line with those who are inviting revolution.

The Industrial Workers of the World provide many similar illustrations. Because the Liberal abhors the I. W. W. and all its works, his soul rebels against the duty of shielding its members from unlawful violence. Is not lawlessness the very cement that binds them together? Is it not their common aim to overthrow in an unlawful manner the basic institutions of modern society? What right, therefore, have they to claim the protection of the law or equitable treatment in the courts? If the Liberal be intelligent, arguments such as these proceed from his angry heart, not from his cool head. For a very little of sober reflection can not fail to convince him that it comports ill with the dignity of a great people to fight crime with crime, and that the ultimate safeguard against revolution is a record of even-handed justice to all. And he must feel grave concern as he reads the bitter arraignment of modern society by the Reds, and knows that many of their charges are based upon fact. Every crime committed against a Red, whether by a court, a public administrator, or by a "law and order" mob, is an invitation to revolution—an invitation that thousands will accept and other thousands seriously ponder. The all-important job of the Liberals during the next few months is to lessen the number of such invitations.

HENRY W. LAWRENCE, JR.
Middlebury, Vermont, December 20

A Talk With Sir George Paish

AFTER reading of Sir George Paish in the "yellows," one might be pardoned for imagining that expert on finance as a delusive, wily, rather dangerous person. Those who meet him face to face, and exchange views with him, will be surprised to find that he is just the contrary.

I had the pleasure of a long and serious talk with him the other day, when he explained to me some features of his mission. He had been disconcerted by the comments of those "yellows" on what they fancy he is trying to do in this country.

"I can not understand," he remarked, "why I have had my mission so misrepresented. On my arrival I supposed I had made it clear that I had come here, not to arrange an enormous loan for any government, but as the spokesman of a philanthropic group, the Fight the Famine Council, to enlist the sympathies of moneyed men and others in the United States on behalf of starving Europe.

"It is no part of my purpose to induce your Government to lend billions of dollars to Great Britain. What I desire is to convince you of the urgent need of the unhappy peoples over there who have been victims of the war. I would not for a moment even criticize the attitude of your public men or anyone at all here on this point. But, in a few days, I may venture to reply to Mr. Hoover and some others.

"I feel, as we all do in Europe, that the assistance which the United States has rendered the Old World has been magnificent. Nothing could have been finer than the way in which your armies fought with us, or than the way in which, at a most crucial time, you sent us food for lack of which we must have perished.

"I am here to try to show you the need of not withholding the supplies which you, above all, can assure the stricken nations. All that we ask is that you should go on exporting what you raise to Europe. I wish to show how you can do that in a normal way—not by extending credit on a gigantic scale with risk of loss, but with safety to yourselves, with guarantees. I mean guarantees of a responsible Government."

"What's wrong with the whole world just now, Sir George?"

"The world has been disordered by an explosion. It must be brought back to its normal state. I do not doubt—indeed, I have never doubted that, soon or late, the United States will realize this fact and do its part to restore order. In the long run I have never known America to fail in doing what is right. Since my arrival, after conferring with important business men, I have convinced myself that henceforward business interests here will see that their future lies not only in the development of domestic trade but also in the expansion of foreign trade. In the future, I believe, this country and Great Britain will work amicably together, more or less as partners. There will, of course, be friendly competition. But Great Britain will not try to get monopolies of trade in certain countries —for example, in the Far East. And the United States will, I believe, be equally generous.

"The war, you know, has taken from us two great fields on which we used to draw for our supplies—Russia and Rumania. This country is to-day the only source from which we can hope to get the things we need urgently.

"It was most fortunate for us that, at a crisis of our fate, you Americans awoke to a new consciousness of your own foreign interests. What you did by sending us wheat can not be overestimated. You know what happened. The normal production of wheat and so on here increased enormously; so greatly as to make up all the deficit in production on our side. When it again sank, owing to bad harvests, you economized. Had you not done so, we might have been ruined, though I believe that England could have starved a little longer, at the worst, than Germany."

As to Russia, Sir George held the opinion that it would be advisable and even necessary to let the Russians work out their own fate without interference. There seemed, indeed, to be no possible alternative, as the French and British soldiers baulked at fighting Russians. He had also much of interest to say as to the ferment of the world regarding social issues.

"I have had occasion," he remarked, "to talk with soldiers at the front. I asked one group of men—about seven hundred Tommies—what they thought. In answer, I was asked if it was true that, while they were offering up their lives to serve their country, the profiteers at home were growing rich. There is no doubt, of course, that while the late war lasted, outrageous profits were made by many employers. As a natural consequence, the working people insisted on their share of those huge profits. So wages were put up. And this in turn increased the cost of living. The cost of living must be gradually reduced. It is at the root of all the trouble in the world. The workers are unhappy because they are having a bad time of it at home. The women understand that it means more to their men folk and their families to lower expenditure than to get higher wages. A great portion of the burden of the people must be reduced by taking away excessive profits.

"The tendency in England, as I see things, is towards what is known there now as Guild Socialism—really a movement in the direction of coöperation in production and distribution. There have been efforts to attain these ends in England, due to the initiative of broadminded employers. But we may see the attempt on a much bigger scale. Between capital and organized labor, what we call the middle classes (and more particularly the professional classes, clerks and so on) have suffered greatly. It is but fair that they should be considered in all social re-adjustments. I do not know exactly what has been accomplished so far by the middle class unions and leagues in England. We hear much less of them than you suppose. Such organizations are, however, badly needed."

And then, after a pause for thought, Sir George said this of what to him seemed an impending social change of vast importance, "In times past, capital has been in the habit of hiring labor. Before long we may see labor hiring capital. Groups of working people will borrow money for their purposes on the best terms procurable. And, as the working people grow in intelligence, the terms on which they will be able to raise money will grow easier."

"But will that help the rest of the community?"

"Yes, in the end, I think it will. The workers will not be able to dispense with the assistance of the professionals, whose interests are perhaps nearer to their own than to those of the capitalists. Eventually all classes may coöperate, and share the profits of production and distribution."

In quoting Sir George Paish, I have not always tried to repeat his very words. At times he took some pains to make it plain that he was not nailing himself down to rigid prophecies, but merely formulating views with which he sympathized. His general outlook on the future seemed optimistic. Especially as to the willingness of American business men, or at least the more farsighted of them, to do their share in restoring peace and order to a distracted world.

CHARLES HENRY MELTZER

Mr. P. E. More and The Wits

IF Mr. Howells is the dean of our fiction, Mr. More is the bishop of our criticism. His classical and Oriental scholarship, his reverence for tradition, his reasoned conservatism, his manner, a little austere at first contact, and his style, pure and severely decorous, all become the office. By the serenity of his pleasure in letters and the life of the mind he recalls those substantially happy old churchman-scholars of the eighteenth century, Warton and Percy and Warburton. By the range of his deep and difficult reading he suggests Coleridge, to whose intellectual dissoluteness, however, his intellectual organization and concentration are antithetical. By his aloofness from the spirit of the hour and its controversies he reminds one of Landor, striving with none, because none is worth his strife. By his touch of mystic ardor and his sustained moral intensity and philosophic seriousness, he belongs with Savonarola and the great French ecclesiastics of the seventeenth century, inspired by the poignancy of a Pascal and the weight and amplitude of a Bossuet. One may visualize him in these later years, since his retirement from editorial duties, as sitting in external and internal placidity under a pallid bust of Pallas in a commodious library, learnedly annotating in fine small hand an interleaved edition of Plato, or poring with a reading glass over the Latin folio of Origen, or perhaps quite lost to the world in the wide wilderness of Leo XIII's Aquinas.

Men with such companions are less solitary than they seem. Upon a scholarly leisure so austerely industrious, you and I would not lightly venture to intrude, even though we had heard that after a week with St. Augustine Mr. More enjoys a Saturday evening with Anna Katharine Green; or will good-humoredly meet the Princeton pundits and Bluestockings at a rubber of bridge, bringing to the solution of its problems the logical rigor of Duns Scotus and the transcendental insight of Plotinus. On another night, at tea-time or after, Samuel Johnson would not hesitate to stumble in, and, stretching his great legs towards the fire, challenge Henry Holt's views of Patience Worth and the ouija board, or put the Princeton Platonist to a defense of the thesis, somewhat wearily stoical, which he has carved in tall Greek letters across the face of his mantel shelf—a thesis of which this is the gist: "Man's affairs are really of small consequence, but one must act as if they were, and this is a burden." Later in the evening one can imagine that saturated student of Queen Anne's time, Professor Trent, completing the semicircle; and then the three of them, confirmed Tories all three, joining in an amiable but heated altercation on the merits of Milton and Defoe, or more harmoniously discussing, judging and gossiping over the "wits" of tavern and coffee-house whom Mr. More has gathered into his latest volume*: first, Beaumont and Fletcher, Halifax, Mrs. Behn, Swift, Pope, Lady Mary, Berkeley, the Duke of Wharton, Gray; and then, more summarily, those golden bugs, those "decadent" fellows, who wore the green carnation and sipped absinthe for coffee between the reign of Wilde and the reign of G. B. Shaw.

It is good literary talk—better is not to be heard in these degenerate days. It is talk now grave, now gay, richly allusive and erudite and deliciously seasoned with malice—"at every word a reputation dies." For the host, quoting Samuel Butler, has given his guests this note: "There is nothing that provokes and sharpens wit like malice." What a lurking Whig or a modern Democrat or a Romanticist would miss, if he were eavesdropping there, is a clash of fundamental belief and theory. Professor Trent may differ tenaciously on a nice point, such as the circumstantial evidence in the case of Lady Mary's virtue. But as to the a priori evidence, they are all in substantial agreement; for they accept with a dreadful Calvinistic accord man's natural predisposition to evil. They all applaud the wits for saying so sovereignly well those infamous things about human nature, which, alas, every now and then, human nature deserves to hear. They all speak suspiciously and derogatively of the mobile vulgus. And they fail, as nearly every militant classicist does, to recognize the "grand style" in Shakespeare, though, as Mr. More's favorite abomination, Professor Saintsbury, truly says, the heretic has but to open the plays anywhere and read fifty lines, and the grand style will smite him in the face "as God's glory smote Saint Stephen." Mr. More, receding from the position taken in the second series, now admits, indeed, that the greater plays are in their substance "profoundly classic," which is as much as one ever extorts from a defender of the Acropolis; but he clings to his heresy in the case of "Romeo and Juliet," ranking its exquisite symphonies of meaning and music below the ethical plain-song of the "Hippolytus."

We are interrupting better talk than our own. "Stay, stay," as a German visitor exclaimed on another occasion, "Toctor Shonson is going to say something."

"Sir," cries the Doctor dashing at "P. E. M." with brutal downrightness, "in your essay on a Bluestocking of the Restoration, you have applied a vile phrase to Congreve. You have done an injustice to Congreve by coupling him with Wycherley and Mrs. Behn as 'wallowing contentedly in nastiness.' A critic should exert himself to distinguish the colors and shades of iniquity. Wycherley splashed through the filth of his time like a gross wit. Mrs. Behn dabbled in it like a prurient and truckling wit. Swift, indeed, wallowed in it, not contentedly but morosely, truculently, like a mad wit. But Congreve picked his way through it disdainfully, like a fastidious wit."

"But did you not," inquired Mr. More, "in your Lives of the Poets remark that the perusal of Congreve's works will make no man better?"

"True," retorts the Doctor, "but I acknowledged that I knew nothing of Congreve's plays. Years had passed since I had read them. I am better acquainted with them now. Sir, in the Elysian Fields, Hazlitt, Thackeray, and Meredith, your best judges of wit and the beauties of English prose, converse with the members of my Literary Club in the language of Congreve. In my days of nature, I did him at least the justice of recording that he could name among his friends every man of his times, Whig and Tory alike, whom wit and elegance had raised to reputation. A man who wallows in filth does not win universal esteem. No, sir; Congreve was an acute critic, a man of taste, and a fine gentleman, a very fine gentleman. In your next edition you must retrieve your blunder of representing the patrician wit of the Restoration as wallowing in nastiness."

"I will make a note of it," says Mr. More with an audible sigh of regret. For, to tell the plain truth, Mr. More values the writers of the Restoration chiefly for their wickedness. It is such good ammunition to use on the humanitarian enthusiasts and the whitewashers of human nature. He can forgive Pope his virulent personal satire, but not his deistic optimism. He praises Swift above Pope for his consistent adherence to the representation of his fellows as "the most pernicious race of little odious vermin ever suffered to crawl upon the face of the earth." He requires, or thinks he requires, the Yahoos as hideous caryatides to uphold the towering superstructure of his aristocratic political and social philosophy.

"Cheer up, More," interposes Professor Trent jocosely, "don't let the loss of Congreve shake your beautiful faith in human depravity. The Doctor allows that Congreve was a rare bird, a very phœnix. I'll tell you a Yahoo friend of Defoe's that you can put in his place. Swift knew his English people. For my part, give me the Turks."

A belief in the baseness of average human nature is, as I have said, something that Mr. More requires as a builder requires a basement, not expecting to live in it. Despite his profession of love for Pope, I suspect he has little more fellow-feeling for the sad wags of Anne's time or of Victoria's than Milton had for his kitchen-folk. When Professor Trent and Doctor Johnson grow weary of impaling ghosts on epigrams and are packed off to a nightcap and to bed, one can fancy "P. E. M." returning to the library to recover possession of his soul. Extinguishing the lights, he sinks into his easy chair, and watches for a time the flickers of his expiring fire fingering the dusky folios, while the Princeton chimes announce the midnight, and silence envelops that quaint little imitation-English city, striving so bravely, amid the New Jersey oil-refineries, to be a home of lost causes and to dream, under the Cleveland memorial tower, like the Oxford of 1830. As he meditates there in the fitful gloaming by the hearthside—Mr. More is one of the last of the meditative men—the gossip and scandal of the evening's talk rise from his mind like a phantasmal smoke, in which the huge illusory bulk of Johnson appears but a whirling eddy in knee-buckles and the slighter form of Professor Trent but a momentary shape in frock coat, floating wisp-like heavenwards.

*With the Wits. Shelburne Essays. Tenth series. By Paul Elmer More. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co.

From his mood of recreative dissipation "P. E. M." passes into his mood of critical self-collection, thence into his mood of philosophic contemplation, and so to his mood of mystical insight, in which space and time, like insubstantial figments of the imagination, dissolve and mingle with the smoke and the Professor and the Doctor, and drift up the flue into night and nothingness. "Such stuff as dreams are made on," he murmurs in a mood like that in which Carlyle saw through the transparent body of Louis XVI the Merovingian kings wending on their ox-carts into eternity. A chill pervades the still air of the study. Into the vacant chairs glide one by one the quiet ghosts of Henry More the Platonist, and Sir Thomas Browne, for whom Oblivion scattered her poppy in vain, and Cudworth rising from his tomb in "The True Intellectual System of the Universe," and pale John Norris of Bemerton, wafted hither by a passion of loneliness from his dim prison in "The Theory of an Ideal World." There is no sound of greeting; but the four silent figures commune together in perfect felicity on That Which Endureth Forever. They speak not a word, yet they understand one another by a mere interpenetration of their beings. . . . And when the Northern Waggoner has set his sevenfold team behind the steadfast star, and Chaunticlere warns erring spirits to their confines, "P. E. M." rouses himself from his deep trance, and says to himself, softly under his breath, "Hodie vixi—to-day I have lived!"

After two cups of coffee and a bit of toast, he goes to his desk and, without haste or rest, sets to work upon—what? A man who keeps such company and lives such an internal life should write his memoirs, a new Biographia Literaria, a philosophical autobiography. Such a book from Mr. More, delivering in his pure grave style a continuous narrative of the travels and voyages of his spirit from Shelburne, New Hampshire, by way of India to ancient Athens, making all ports which for storm-tossed sailors trim their lamps—such a narrative, plangent through all its reserves with nostalgia for the infinite, would be of unique interest and value to us, complementing the brave venture of Henry Adams, and deepening the resonance of American letters.

But Mr. More, returning to his desk, either continues his history of Neo-Platonism, which I wish he could leave to a scholar with no autobiography to write; or else, which fills me with malice, he supplants that great work by a Shelburne essay on Aphra Behn. This "pilgrim of the infinite"—what has Aphra to do with him, or he with Aphra! But what is a Shelburne essay? It is generally an imperfect, fragmentary cross-section, sometimes only the outer bark of a cross-section, of the character and personality which I have been sketching. It is criticism, it is history, it is philosophy, it is morality, it is religion, it is, above all, a singularly moving poetry, gushing up from deep, intellectual, and moral substrata, pure, cold, and refreshing, as water of a spring from the rocks in some high mountain hollow. This poetry of ideas was abundant in the first and the sixth series of the Shelburne essays, and was nearly continuous in some of the single essays like The Quest of a Century in the third series and Victorian Literature in the seventh. By its compression of serious thought and deep feeling it produces the effect of one speaking between life and death, as the Apology of Socrates does. There is a pulse in the still flow of it, as if it had been stirred once and forever at the bottom of the human heart. It is for this poetry that we love Mr. More. But one has to go so far for it! In the long series, it is so intermittent! There is so much territory through which it does not flow.

A young friend of mine who takes his world through his pores, little experienced in literary exploration, unable to discover the spring, announced to me, after a brush with the "wits," that the essays are "dry." He is mistaken. A Shelburne essay is not infrequently, however, astonishingly difficult. Mr. More has not attended to the technique of ingratiation by which a master of popularity plays upon an unready public with his personality, flattering, cajoling, seducing it to accept his shadow before his substance arrives. He takes so little pains, I will not say to be liked, but to be comprehended, that I sometimes wonder whether he has ever broadly considered the function of criticism—in a democracy, as different as ours is from that in Athens. He writes as if unaware that our General Reading Public is innocent of all knowledge of the best that has been said and thought in the world. He writes at least half the time as if he contemplated an audience of Coleridges, Johnsons, and Casaubons.

Let me illustrate. Occasionally he will give you some paragraphs of literary history as plain as a biographical dictionary and as dry as, let us say in deference to Mr. Mencken, as dry as a professor of English. But of a sudden, in a harmless-looking essay, say that on the eighteenth-century dilettante, William Beckford, you, if a plain man, stumble and lose your footing over "the law of autarkeia, the perception of the veritable infinite within harmonious self-completeness which was the great gift of the Greeks to civilization;" and down you go whirling headlong into the bottomless pitfall and abyss of a discussion of the difference between the Oriental and the Occidental sentiment towards the infinite and towards personality, while Hinduism, Semitism, Alexandrianism, Platonism, and the Gnostic and Manichean heresies rush past you with the flash and roar of the wheels within wheels that dazzled Ezekiel when the heavens were opened and he saw "visions of God"—and "my word," as Mr. Drinkwater's Lincoln would say, what a God! You are, it is true, brought out of that headlong plunge into the unfathomable, as a skillful sky-pilot brings you out of a "nose-spin," or as a dentist brings you out of the gyrations of a nitrous oxid trance; and you hear Mr. More at your side quietly, suavely, assuring you that now you understand "why Goethe curtly called romanticism disease and classicism health." Maybe you do; but it is not by reason of your ride behind him on the Gnostic nightmare. What passed in that flight is only a shade more intelligible to you than a Chinese incantation. Your education was imperfect; you are neither a Coleridge nor a Cudworth.

"Perverse as it seems to say so," remarked Matthew Arnold in reply to Professor Newman's charge that he was ignorant, "I sometimes find myself wishing, when dealing with these matters of poetical criticism, that my ignorance were even greater than it is." How often one wishes that Mr. More would steal an hour from the study of Neo-Platonism to meditate on that paradoxical utterance! How often one wishes that Mr. More's ignorance were far, far greater than it is. With many of Arnold's fundamental intentions in criticism he is profoundly sympathetic; but he has never, as it appears to me, felt in a compelling way the Englishman's passion for diffusing his ideas, for making them "prevail," for carrying them from one end of society to the other. He has never taken adequately to heart Arnold's true and memorable description of the "great men of culture." They are those, he declares, "who have labored to divest knowledge of all that was harsh, uncouth, difficult, abstract, professional, exclusive; to humanize it, to make it efficient outside the clique of the cultivated and learned, yet still remaining the best knowledge and thought of the time, and a true source, therefore, of sweetness and light."

When I ask myself why "P. E. M." has not taken these words more obviously home, why he writes so exclusively for the "clique of the cultivated and learned," I come invariably to one conclusion, namely, that his interest in the uncultivated and unlearned is horribly chilly, is not much livelier, in fact, than his master Plato's concern for the Helots, who are silently to bear on their shoulders the burden and splendor of the Athenian Republic; is not much warmer than his master Burke's concern for the driver of oxen, the carpenter, and work-master, who are not to be sought for in counsel but are "to maintain the state of the world." When I consider how rich "P. E. M." is in the very wisdom which our democratic populace needs and vaguely desires, and when I observe how persistently he repels the advances of the vulgar by flinging a handful of political and social icicles in their faces, I wish from the bottom of my heart that he had loved the exclusive, metaphysical, aristocratic Plato less, and the hobnobbing, inquisitive, realistic, democratic Socrates more.

If Socrates were among us to-day, I am convinced that he would be leader of the Democrats in the House; but Plato, I suspect, would be a member of the Senate from Massachusetts. Having Plato as his monitor, Mr. More sides politically and socially with the little group of Americans who hold that there are only half a dozen great families, all in the Republican party, capable of governing and guiding the destinies of the United States. Though they may pass without question for "good" citizens, distinguished and patriotic, they have never accepted one characteristic word that Jefferson wrote into the political Scriptures of the American nation; they have never felt one generous throb of the faith, regenerative and sustaining and uniting, which Jefferson poured broadcast upon the spirit of the American people—faith in the sense and virtue of the community and in the sense and virtue of the majority of its components.

With Socrates as his guide through the modern world, "P. E. M." might have left his library and have broken from the circle of his Immortals, to stand on one leg and grow wise in the market-place. He might have suppled and vulgarized his tongue to chat with the work-master and carpenter and the driver of oxen who have had an American education and have fought under the American flag from Verdun to Archangel for, as they thought or hoped, an American democratic faith. He might have fallen in with the young carpenter, cited for gallantry in the Argonne, who is repairing my roof; or with another, concealing a Carnegie medal, who built me a tolerable bookcase after saving, single-handed, seventeen lives in a fire. He might have met with a Northern peasant farmer of my acquaintance who, after recounting the hardships of his winter work in the absence of his eldest son, said to me, with a smile as profoundly philosophical as anything in Epictetus: "Well, I suppose that is what we are here for." He might have read the halting, ill-spelled letters of that stalwart eldest son who, while breaking mules for the Expeditionary Force in France, wrote to his old mother with a filial piety as beautiful as anything that Mr. More commends in Pope.

If he had enjoyed opportunities such as these—somehow he seems always to have evaded them—he would have recognized with dismay that Swift and the wits have coarsely libeled the mobile vulgus and have deceived him about its capacities and tendencies. He would have discovered in the average man—along with healthy self-interest, petty vices, and envy enough to keep him stirring—courage, fortitude, sobriety, kindness, honesty, and sound practical intelligence. If he could have pressed critically into the matter, he would have discovered something even more surprising. He would have learned that the average man is, like himself, at heart a mystic, vaguely hungering for a peace that diplomats can not give, obscurely seeking the permanent amid the transitory; a poor swimmer struggling for a rock amid the flux of waters, a lonely pilgrim longing for the shadow of a mighty rock in a weary land. And if "P. E. M." had a bit more of that natural sympathy, of which he is so distrustful, he would have perceived that what more than anything else to-day keeps the average man from lapsing into Yahooism is the religion of democracy, consisting of a little bundle of general principles which make him respect himself and his neighbor; a bundle of principles kindled in crucial times by an intense emotion, in which his self-interest, his petty vices, and his envy are consumed as with fire; and he sees the commonweal as the mighty rock in the shadow of which his little life and personality are to be surrendered, if need be, as things negligible and transitory.

I am speaking of the average man and traits of his which I can never contemplate, being one myself, without a lift of the heart; and I frankly avow that it vexes me to hear this emotion which does so much to keep us average men from weariness, and from the devastating cynicism of the wits, and the horrid ennuis of the great, and from their sense that the affairs of men are really of small consequence—it vexes me to hear this emotion dismissed as fatuous democratic self-complacency.

But even as I write these words, I seem to hear Mr. More, in an accent slightly eighteenth century, exclaiming not without asperity, yet rather in pity than in anger: "Sir, I perceive that you are a vile Whig!"

To which I reply, not without animation yet more in affection than in malice, "Sir, I perceive that you are a stubborn Tory."

"Sir," says Mr. More, "I am obliged to lean a bit backward to counterbalance the vileness of your Whiggery."

"And Sir," I conclude, "I am obliged to lean a bit forward to counterbalance the stubbornness of your Toryism."

STUART P. SHERMAN

Book Reviews

Co-operating with Destiny

IDEALS OF AMERICA. Analyses of the guiding motives of contemporary American life by leaders in various fields of thought and action. Prepared for the City Club of Chicago, 1916-1919. Chicago: A. C. McClurg & Co.

THE reviewer wolfed a mouthful of books from the shelf behind the editor's desk and trotted off to the smoking-car before he dropped his prey to sniff at it and see what he had caught. He slipped inside the first red cover, labelled "Ideals of America," and splashed into the following:

> An era ended in July, 1914. A civilization reached its conclusion. We are now far enough away to begin to see its affairs in perspective. Nineteen hundred and fourteen is detached from the present. The year so recent has begun to take its place with 1896, 1861, and even with 1775. This almost immediate past is already becoming as alien to us as are the epochs we have learned through the written chronicles of the past. What is ahead we can not say with assuredness, although the rude outlines of the future are visible now to the clear-eyed as objects perceived in the semi-light of approaching dawn. At such a season of transition it is, accordingly, especially valuable to attempt to take stock so that thereby we may coöperate with destiny in achieving a more satisfactory society.

As he came up gasping and began to search his mental pockets, the train boy thrust a pictorial cover under his nose, announcing "Mutt and Jeff—all the latest Mutt and Jeff pictures in a book." The reviewer took a good look at the familiar figures with a comfortable feeling as of firm ground after quicksand. Here at least was something from that utterly alien past whose curve registered nothing of the late seismic disturbance. As they were before Sarajevo, so are they after Versailles. He opened the red cover and ventured in again arm in arm with Mutt and Jeff to steady him over the quaking surface of the morass.

By conscious efforts towards clarifying and organizing our thought and feelings can the high, but hazy, ill-defined and ill-adjusted moral conceptions, which admittedly feature our life, be composed into the symbol of a fit creative purpose for to-morrow? . . . Can we as Americans justify our occupation of a continent by unfolding and pursuing a beneficent, an upbuilding ideal, outbidding disruptive motives and matching the inciting challenge and resources of our day?

From the corner of his eye the reviewer saw Mutt with a bent forefinger pressed against the dome of his forehead, above which hung a radio-active question-mark registering "I don't get you."

If the task thus crudely hinted at can be successfully prosecuted, if a more worthy, adequate, and dynamic objective for our social life—

"Say," interrupts Mutt, "Wot t'ell's a dynamic objective?"

"I know," says Jeff, "It's droppin G. I.'s on an ammunition dump."

"How am I gonna coöperate with destiny?" pursues Mutt.

"Let's ask the Perfesser," suggests Jeff.

There follows a "symposium," a Greek banquet of codfish and baked beans, a white-pine Parthenon with a steeple overlooking the culture of onions and tobacco.

Same old Mutt and Jeff. They keep their hair on (what there is of it). And the fact that their familiar attitudes express so readily these inexpressibly new phases of life "casts an oblique light" on the newness and on us. In Mutt's well-known pose we see ourselves, a static pose to express the dynamic, an attitude of tense forward straining in expectation of anything but the familiar, when suddenly the familiar hits us from behind, and over we go on our noses. At the promise of something new we shut our eyes and open our minds wide. Common-sense flies out; does anything better fly in? The professor does his part to supply us with something to make us wise—if only we could shut our minds on it and hold it when we get it.

In turn the professors come forward. There is one each for politics, law, labor, science, education, society, business, music, religion, philosophy, literature, and things in general (Human Progress). For the most part they speak well and reason soundly. But the reviewer has to snuggle close to Mutt and Jeff to keep from dizziness, as ideals wheel across the zenith like the spokes of the Aurora Borealis, and flash from hilltop to hilltop. The three find themselves in a rather flimsy wagon at the switching tail of a free-lance comet. Far below, the world they have left "spins like a fretful midge." They would be glad to hitch their wagon to a star, just one star, friendly and fixed. Jeff has much ado to keep his hair on, and the glow of Mutt's radiolite question-mark outdoes the pale moon. The reviewer is ready to go into the hands of a moral and spiritual receiver. In the matter of ideals, he thought he had assets enough for his modest business, but this board of examiners exhibits his liabilities in a light that spells bankruptcy, and he begins to wonder what percentage his assets would represent amongst this army of creditors. Jeff dodges a switch of the comet's tail and shouts in the reviewer's ear, "Say, I ain't strong for this coöperating with destiny—me for old-fashioned competition!"

The I. I. I.

Bulletin de L'Institut Intermédiaire International. Publication Trimestrielle. Haarlem (Pays-Bas): H. D. Tjeenk Willink & Fils; La Haye: Martinus Nijhoff.

THESE are not the initials of a new political party for the cult of self as an offset to a rife and flabby communism. They stand for the name of an institute whose aims are purely altruistic. The "Institut Intermédiaire International," though the study of world politics is an indispensable part of its activity, does not hold a brief for any political programme in particular. It is intended as an international clearing-house of information on all matters of international interest, connected with politics, economics, and statistics. It wishes to act as an intermediary between people who, ignorant of each other's language and living in different parts of the globe, have no other means of getting into contact together. Some one in China wishing to be informed concerning a certain law obtaining in Spain, an Englishman desirous of some economic data about Russia, a South African journalist anxious to gather material for an article on the Swedish Constitution, an American professor intending to lecture on the history of the international conventions and treaties regulating the navigation on the Danube and the Rhine, will all, without any charge being made, find information they are in search of at the "Institut Intermédiaire" in The Hague. The initiative was taken by some prominent Hollanders, and the present organization is controlled and financed by exclusively Dutch intellect and capital. Jonkheer J. Loudon, late Minister of Foreign Affairs, and at present Minister Plenipotentiary in Paris, is the honorary president of the Institute, and on its executive board sit such eminent authorities on International Law as Dr. B. C. J. Loder and Jonkheer Dr. W. J. M. van Eysinga.

In addition to its work of information, the Institute publishes a series of monographs on questions of international interest, and a quarterly bulletin which has just entered on its second year.

The first four numbers contain a wealth of information, which makes one look forward to their sequels of the current year. In a long contribution, running through all the four numbers, an admirable survey is given of the genesis of the peace in the form of summaries of diplomatic documents, official notes, important editorials and magazine articles. Recent documents relating to Zionism are published by Mr. Fischer, the question of the dissolution of the Austro-Hungarian monetary system is discussed by Dr. de Roo de la Faille. Highly interesting is a summary of the regulations and efforts for the resumption of economic relations between the countries made during the first half of the year 1919. Lawyers will find useful information in an extensive collection of jurisprudence of the Prize Courts in the various belligerent countries, and in a number of articles by Dutch, Swiss, and Norwegian financial experts on the fiscal legislation in their respective countries relating to the question of double imposition.

Each issue of the bulletin contains a selection of the most important questions which have been addressed to the Institute during the past three months.

One of these was to enquire whether legal regulations exist in France concerning the possession, the purchase, and the sale of rural or other immovable possessions by foreigners domiciliated in that country. The answer, supplied by the Institute's French correspondent, M. James Paul Govare, Avocat à la Cour d'Appel, Paris, denied the existence of any such provisions with a special view to foreigners, but referred to certain restrictions contained in the peace treaty which tend to derogate from this legal equality between native and foreign residents. Another question was for a list of articles directed against the League of Nations, and the enquirer received from the Institute about fifty cuttings from daily papers and numbers of the New Republic, the New Europe, the Arbitrator, and the Nation. "What is the legal status," runs another question, "of a person of German birth, residing and domiciled in Belgium since 1878, who has lost his German nationality according to articles 16 and following of the German law of June 1, 1870, a loss confirmed by an "Entlassungsurkunde" of 1899, passed by the Government of the Grand Duchy of Baden?" In a lengthy reply the enquirer had it explained to him that he could not claim Belgian citizenship on the ground of his long residence in that country. He had to be satisfied with being "heimatlos."

The importance of an institute of this nature is self-evident. A more correct knowledge of the laws of foreign countries is a safeguard against international misunderstandings and thus contributes, indirectly, to the "rapprochement" between the nations. That Holland has taken the initiative in such an enterprise of world-wide importance is a guarantee that the ideals which Hugo Grotius preached to an uncomprehending age are still revered by his compatriots in these more internationally minded days.

Roses and Games

PINK ROSES. By Gilbert Cannan. New York: George H. Doran Company.

THE pink roses are artificial roses on the hat of one of those professionally pretty ladies who have recently drifted into the foreground of British fiction. They dawn, in our first chapter, upon the vision of the languidly dissatisfied young gentleman, Trevor Mathew. They become and remain for him a symbol, as, in another way, a certain real pink rosebud is to become later on. Trevor Mathew, just out of Oxford, has been ready enough to become a hero with his two chums, Hardman and Peto, in the first days of the war. A "systolic murmur" turns up to disqualify him. Hardman is killed pretty promptly, and Peto sent back a hopeless cripple. This is distressing for Trevor, and helps open his eyes to what is really going on in the world. It is borne in upon him that the war is an abominable and unendurable sacrifice of Hardmans and Petos and the sacred youth they represent. He is supposed to be "in articles," but how can a chap study law with all that sort of thing going on over there? What's the good of work, what's the good of anything? "Nothing went on except the war, and that went on and on. Nothing that happened in it had any significance." The old world had been destroyed and nobody knew how to dream even of a new one. "Men died for liberty, but liberty disappeared because life as it had been planned and dreamed had died." Most unpleasant for Trevor, all this, and he is about to take it quite hard, when the damsel with pink roses in her hat winks at him one evening from a neighboring bench in Hyde Park. She withdraws demurely to a café, whither our young friend Trevor enchantedly follows her. She and her pink roses vaguely symbolize for him youth and pleasure and release from responsibility. His good and nice looks attract the lady, who is at a loose end. They, as it were, take each other on. Like Mr. Bennett's pretty lady, this Cora makes a sentimental point of "being good to" the war-worn male as an institution. For a time, according to Mr. Cannan, she is the best thing that could have happened to the distraught Trevor. Later, as she develops a consuming passion for him, the relation becomes less comfortable from his point of view. She even dreams of achieving marriage and respectability with him. However, he steers clear of this without much trouble, and they presently tire of each other sufficiently to drift apart without anything resembling anguish on either side. They have both, we gather, gained by the relation. Cora has added new charms to her professional equipment, and Trevor has been safely tided over a perilous time of crisis. Now he is qualified for a true union with the mate who has also (for his sake eventually) been passing through her little apprenticeship at love.

The reader of this note may perceive that, stripped of Mr. Cannan's decorative gloss or, if you will, imaginative interpretation, this is pretty much the same old story—the youth just out of Oxford who in the course of a few months in London not only runs the gamut of sex, but becomes the mouthpiece of whatever "philosophy of life" his author may chance to be swearing by at the moment. Trevor Mathew is quite a talkative little prophet from first to last, however negligible a little man. We must confess that apart from his megaphonic function, he is much the same at the end of our acquaintance as at the beginning, a flabby, selfish, and rather fatuous dabbler at life. As for the "philosophy" he represents, it is difficult to put one's finger on. The main thing is to disbelieve in anything other people incline to agree about, especially other people struggling under the disadvantages of maturity and experience. I am young; a lot of us are young; and the world is in a horrible mess, and youth is all right, so it must be the fault of the old fellows. This war is the old man's war fought by the young. But it won't happen again because age has at last over-reached itself. It has destroyed the ancient illusions and inhibitions—smashed the checkerboard on which its own game was played. Now is the world to be remoulded to youth's desire. Alas, our young Trevor does not much care what he says or thinks, so long as it is clever and exciting. For days after the news of the Russian revolution his life is "one long chant of pure idealism"; but this does not prevent him from slipping complacently, at this very time, into his snug berth as an hereditary pillar of the law "up North." The law, he decides comfortably, "does somehow prevent the rogues and the dear bourgeois innocents who want their ten per cent. from having things their own way. That and our folly make us what we are. We can get along without revolutions." Still, we see that without sacrificing any personal advantage from society as at present constituted, he loves the idea that something altogether new, and probably inconvenient, is about to happen to a great many other people, the old, the stodgy, the respectable, and all in authority. He and the still younger oracle, Leslie, settle it between them. Says Leslie:

"They think we're awfully young, but we do know—all the things that people like my father have pretended not to know. We've got to know, because something's hurting us all the time and we've got to find a way out. You know what I mean. Evolution, and all that. . . . Well, it's as if things were rushing away from you at about a million miles an hour, and all the things you'd been told were important turned out to be nothing at all, and as if when you tried to play the game according to the rules it turned crazy because the game was a new game, and the rules were old rules."

"Why, that's the war," cried Trevor, beginning to grasp what the boy was driving at.

"That's it. We aren't playing the old game any more. Nothing that my father did can ever be done by me because I'm a different being, something quite new. So are you. So is Ruth. I can tell them, the new people, as soon as I see them, and I can't make out why the old game goes on."

"You see," said Trevor, "we are not allowed to say that it is a new game because the old people want us to say that it is better. But we don't say anything of the kind. We only say that it's new. Whether it is better or not remains to be proved. . . . But the people who are the first to play the new game will have a lovely time."

The italics are mine: a not unmeaning bit of commentary in themselves, perhaps, on Trevor, his author, and their new game.

H. W. BOYNTON

Pointing the Way to a League of Nations

JUDICIAL SETTLEMENT OF CONTROVERSIES BETWEEN STATES OF THE AMERICAN UNION. Cases decided in the Supreme Court of the United States. Edited and collected by James Brown Scott, A.M., J.U.D., LL.D. 2 Vols. Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. New York: Oxford University Press.

THESE ponderous quartos cover even a broader field than is indicated by the title, which in turn does not disclose the real purpose of the editor. No interstate controversy is involved in most of the earlier cases reprinted. The first case, indeed, does not present a decision of a Federal Court, but of the State Court of Pennsylvania. It does deal, however, with the legal status of the United Colonies, after their separation from Great Britain, and before the adoption of the Constitution, and it declares a doctrine, which has been accepted by Federal Courts, that the Colonies became a body corporate from the moment of their association as the United States (Respublica v. Sweers, 1 Dallas 41, A. D. 1779).

The second case (Ware v. Hylton, 3 Dallas, 199, A. D. 1796), which is from a Federal Court, decides that upon separation from the Mother Country each Colony became a sovereign and independent State, with the "right to govern itself by its own authority and its own laws, without any control from any other power upon earth." Then follow cases showing the nature of "The Union of the States under the Constitution" and the relations of the Federal Government to the Territories of the Union.

Thus far we have no trace of inter-state controversies, but we get a hint of the editor's prime purpose, which is to show how sovereign and independent States have voluntarily associated themselves under a polity which binds them to submit their controversies to judicial determination rather than to the arbitrament of war. This purpose is further disclosed when the editor inscribes the collection of the "Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, as containing the contribution of that court to the Judicial Settlement of International Disputes."

An important part of that contribution is found in a group of cases which establish the distinction between justiciable questions and those which are merely political. Many boundary disputes have arisen between the States. From one point of view the question of State or National boundary is a political one. Accordingly, the Supreme Court has refused to inquire into the accuracy of the decision of the political department of government that certain territory belongs to a specified nation (Williams v. Suffolk Ins. Co., 13 Pet. 415). From another point of view, the question of boundary may be one of property and involve the determination of facts by a court. In such cases the question of sovereignty is subordinate to that of property (Virginia v. West Va., 11 Wallace 39). Which of two opposing governments in a State is the legitimate one is for the political and not the judicial department of government (Luther v. Borden, 7 Howard 1). Whether the form of government in a State is republican is a political question, with which the courts will have nothing to do (Pacific Telephone Co. v. Oregon, 223 U. S. 118). Proclamation of blockade by the President is conclusive evidence of a state of war, and courts will not entertain an inquiry as to whether a state of war in fact existed (The Prize Cases, 2 Black 635).

This distinction between inter-state controversies which are determinable by the application of established legal rules and those which involve only or mainly considerations of policy has been made clear by a long line of Supreme Court decisions. This distinction, the editor believes, will be found helpful in determining whether a particular international dispute falls within the justiciable or non-justiciable class.

The greater part of the collection consists of cases in which serious controversies between States have been adjusted. For example, the boundary between Nebraska and Iowa is in part a varying line, because of the shifting course of the Missouri River, which separates the States. Under the decision of the Supreme Court, each State appoints a Commission by which from time to time a compact is made as to the temporary boundary. In case either State failed to comply with the decision the Court would appoint an official to locate such boundary. Thus is removed all possibility of hostile action by either State.

The most notable inter-state dispute, the most prolonged as well as the most ably contested, arose from the efforts of Virginia to recover from West Virginia a proportion of the public debt of the former. Upon the organization of West Virginia it agreed to assume a stipulated part of the debt of Virginia as it stood on January 1, 1861. It did not perform its agreement, and Virginia sought to enforce its claim by suit. All sorts of defenses were interposed by the debtor State, some of them purely technical, some of them dilatory, some of them going to the merits of the claim. The case was presented to the Supreme Court many times and the opinions appear in nearly a dozen different volumes of the reports. Technicalities were swept aside by the Court, dilatory pleas were unheeded. Attention was repeatedly called to the fact that the litigation was not between individuals but between political sovereignties and therefore possessed a quasi-international character. Decision was to be based not upon technicalities, but upon the actual merits of the controversy. Nor was it to be doubted that these States would perform their obligations, once these had been announced by the Court. In fact, this protracted litigation was brought to a close without the employment of legal process to enforce final judgment. The appeal of the Supreme Court to West Virginia's sense of honor sufficed. That State has passed an "Act providing for payment of West Virginia's part of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to January 1, 1861, as ascertained by the judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States and adjusted by the two States" (Chapter 10, Extraordinary Session 1919).

No one can read the record of these and of similar decisions without wishing to study the editor's conclusion that "as a result of argument, debate and decision, practice has been settled and procedure adopted in the light of experience, which is as applicable to States of the Society of Nations as to States of the American Union." Most readers, probably, will agree with the editor in the further statement that the Supreme Court, in its judgment of disputes between States, has shown itself "a prototype of that tribunal which they would like to see created by the Society of Nations, 'accessible to all in the midst of the independent Powers.'"

We cannot take leave of these volumes without calling attention to the fact that they contain a variety of interesting material not suggested by their title. The Articles of Colonial Confederation, The Constitution of the United States, part of the Declaration of Independence are reprinted, as are a number of cases from the Privy Council and English Equity reports. These decisions have served as precedents not only in boundary controversies, but one of them is certainly the fountain head of the doctrine of judicial control over the constitutionality of legislative acts. This is followed by the reproduction of various Colonial cases of a similar character which are often referred to but are not accessible to most readers.

Attic Red-Figured Vases

A Handbook of Attic Red-Figured Vases. Signed by or Attributed to the Various Masters of the Sixth and Fifth Centuries, B. C. Two Volumes. By Joseph Clark Hoppin. Cambridge: Harvard University Press.

THESE two fine volumes represent an immense labor and a great confidence. They rest upon the conviction that all Attic red-figured vases can be classified by their artists. This catalogue makes that ambition a fact, incorporating, besides the investigations of Beazley and Furtwängler, a host of minor researches.

The plan of the catalogue is alphabetical. In the first instance artists' signatures are considered, next potters' signatures, finally stylistic groups not confirmed by signatures. The latter naturally predominate. Thus the catalogue begins with "The Achilles Painter" and ends with the "Painter of the Yale Oinochoë." In the single list you will find Andokides, Brygos, Phintias, The Bowdoin Kylix Painter, etc., each in its alphabetical place. Under each artist the arrangement is alphabetical by places.

Though Dr. Hoppin is accomplished in this game of attributions, he wisely brings no new ascriptions of his own into the catalogue. When one vase is ascribed to several masters, as often befalls, he serves as arbiter, referring to the piece, however, under every master to whom it has been assigned. Thus the brief entries carry with them a generous amount of bibliography. Besides the general index, which is chiefly of artists and subjects, there is a museum index in which Boston looks impressive even among the European capitals, an index of inscriptions, one of graffiti, and one of publications. Everything is most convenient, and despite the inevitable ambiguity of such provisional names as The Niobid Painter, the student should from one list or another be able to locate in the catalogue any given vase. Here we may protest against the multiplication of fanciful names. Where the stylistic group centres upon a vase in a great museum the name of the museum should be the catchword. Thus, Louvre Niobid Painter is much better than Niobid Painter. In this matter the author had to take matters as he found them.

The plan of illustration is to reproduce in small working cuts all signed vases and no others. It would have considerably added to the value of the catalogue to reproduce the most representative example of each unsigned stylistic group, but it would have also added to bulk and expense. As it is, the student will do well to take Dr. Hoppin's advice to use the best reproductions and then go slow on attributions.

In the nature of the case, no catalogue of world-wide scope can be complete. Doubtless many additions will promptly be made to the upwards of four thousand vases listed by Dr. Hoppin. We happen to know of a score in the university and private collections of Princeton, New Jersey, and a couple in the Century Club, New York, and we have less certain report of a few at Williams College. Such minor omissions should merely encourage Dr. Hoppin's colleagues to report all scattered pieces which have escaped his notice. His catalogue will be indispensable to the special student of Greek vase painting, and occasionally useful to all students of graphic design. It is a well-conceived and conscientiously executed piece of minute scholarship, one of the most important contributions to classical archæology which has been made in America.

One may envy the painting classes that heard such talks as are gathered in Charles H. Woodbury's "Painting and the Personal Equation" (Houghton Mifflin Co.). His counsels abound in mother wit, and are blessedly free from the jargon of the studio. He advocates a modified naturalism. The greater color relations of a picture should be observed in nature, for the rest the artist is free. No forms of conventional and decorative design are considered. We are really talking about open-air sketching and its pictorial derivatives. Within this limitation, the book is full of sound thinking energetically expressed. "Originality does not mean that you are superior to law, but rather that you are keener than others to discriminate between law and custom. A picture must be based on the great considerations of color values; acquaint yourselves with these for they are the law, and beyond them all else is custom to be followed or broken as it seems to you best." On the ever-urgent issue of technic we have the following golden words: "The actual manipulation of the brush is a skilful matter, and yet it requires more intelligence than manual dexterity. Art is psychology, not science, and there ever must be one unknown factor, the personal equation. You must know what you see, why you see, and what is worth seeing." Here may naturally follow Mr. Woodbury's excellent variation on Mérimée's famous definition of art. "Art is subtle exaggeration, not carried to the grotesque. It is dangerous ground, of course, but let us take it as one of the perils of the profession." A final quotation may suggest the quality of a book which should be read in its entirety. "In the final analysis, art is the search for order and it has the significance of a basic human instinct. Art, science, philosophy, psychology, all are seeking the laws that assign us our place in the universe and help us to fill it understandingly. It is not the thirst for knowledge that drives us, but rather the instinct to escape from chaos. We do not know where we are going, but we do know what we are leaving behind us. Wherever the tendency arises to deny order, whether it be in the arts or the art of living, there comes degeneracy."

The Run of the Shelves

THE "Silver Age" (Scott and Seltzer) is the agreeable title of a rather nondescript volume of stories and sketches by Mr. Temple Scott. More specifically, it is the title of the not unpleasing opening sketch, dealing with a man's passage into that period of life when young people, even his own children, value him chiefly as a convenience or an antiquity. Mr. Scott's observation is rather good. His sentiment, on the other hand, is watery, and a certain sponginess is the inevitable and unprofitable result of its copious diffusion through such dilatory narratives as "Reb Yankel" and the "Lady and the Singing-bird." In "New York at Twilight," in which he declares that the true and great New York comes out in the dusky interval between the avidities of its daytime and the relaxations of its nights, he shows an advance in substance which is pretty nearly counterpoised by a retreat in style. He is capable, at the longest intervals, of cumulative epigram. For instance, he has this to say of the commercial side of art in New York City: "The artist toadied the dealer, the dealer toadied the critic, the critic toadied the editor, the editor toadied the advertiser."

It would be pleasant to speak only praise of Mr. Gamaliel Bradford's "Portraits of American Women" (Houghton Mifflin); for it is a nice thing to turn out these volumes of what the author has called "psychographs"—or something of the sort—and wears the appearance of disseminating culture. But we can't help feeling that Mr. Bradford has the fear of the editor of the popularized Atlantic Monthly in his eyes, and writes down a little to the flattering editorial opinion that magazine readers need to be titillated. Mr. Bradford's portrait of Emily Dickinson, for instance, ought to be interesting, and is in fact mildly so; but there is a kind of jump in his reflections on human life which bothers us. Much more important is the essay on Sarah Alden Ripley, for here the author has had access to private papers and gives us information about a character unique in its way. A private scholar of whom Professor Child could say: "The most learned woman I have ever known, the most diversely learned perhaps of her time, and not inferior in this respect, I venture to say, to any woman of any age"—such a woman, scholar at once and very human, ought to be better known, and we are grateful to Mr. Bradford for telling her life. We should have been more grateful if he had quoted more freely from her letters. Other essays deal with Abigail Adams, Mary Lyon, Harriet Beecher Stowe, Margaret Fuller Ossoli, Louisa May Alcott, and Frances Elizabeth Willard.

The poet-laureate, Dr. Robert Bridges, dumb through the war, has at last spoken, but through prose, and not through poetry. The year before the War broke out he was busy founding a society to combat what he regards as the dangerous influences at work in degrading the language, and widening the gulf between ourselves and the sonorous speech of Shakespeare and Milton. It is called the Society for Pure English; not, however, to convey the idea that words of foreign origin are impurities in English, but rather assuming that they are not. Professor Henry Bradley, editor of the great Oxford Dictionary, and Sir Walter Raleigh, were with him in the project from the beginning; and over a hundred rank as original members, including the Right Honorable Arthur H. Balfour and Mrs. Humphry

Ward. The first of its publications has just come from the Clarendon Press, in the shape of a Tract on English Homophones by Dr. Bridges. An Englishman from one of the southern counties, himself, he makes it a particular grievance that the careless treatment of the consonant r is leading to the blurring of the distinction between such words as shore and sure, oar, ore and awe. A Phonetic Dictionary of the English Language, the joint work of an Englishman and a Prussian, has been published in London to register this habit of speech. This work of Michaelis and Jones, now in its second edition, gives the poet-laureate no little concern. With the prestige of coming from the British capital, and of being compiled by the lecturer on Phonetics at University College, London, it may work, he fears, no little harm.

To most minds the word desert means the opposite of all that is pleasing. Sand and snakes and thirst and cactus—what else is there to write about? Some years ago George Wharton James wrote two big volumes on the "Wonders of the Colorado Desert." Many other authors have discoursed eloquently on its lures. The latest of them is J. Smeaton Chase, the author already of "Yosemite Trails" and "California Coast Trails," and now of "California Desert Trails" (Houghton Mifflin). He goes so far as to say that the desert's hold upon those who have fallen under its spell is deeper and more enduring than is the charm of forest or sea or mountain. He also ventures an explanation of this fact, if fact it is. In olden times man was engaged in a perpetual struggle with the inexorable forces of nature. While this struggle lasted, the vast and the wild raised no thrills but those of dislike and fear. But now, after centuries of ease and home comforts, the desolate, gaunt, and dreadful in nature attract us by the law of contrast; "the risk is, indeed, that they may run to overvaluation." Perhaps, the author thinks, even the pranks of those funny fellows, the "futurists," "cubists," and "vorticists," in poetry, music, and the other arts, might be explained by this clue: "Civilization has got on their nerves, and they simply have to scream."

Mr. Chase's book is not "a scream." There are, indeed, exciting episodes aplenty in its pages, and he often dwells on the ugly, repellent side of the desert —the torturing sun, the constant risk of a horrible death by thirst, the frequently befouled water holes on which the traveler's life depends, the monotony, the sand storms, the rattlers, the mosquitoes, and a number of other things undesirable; but for the most part he writes about the features that help to explain the puzzling allurement of the desert to those who know it well —the sea of sand, with dunes perpetually reshaped by the terrific blasts of the wind; the oases of date palms; the terrestrial "moonscapes"; the mysterious mountains with their hidden mineral treasures that have lured so many men to death; the bracing night air; the annual spring episode with its wonderful blossoms of divers species of cactus; and, above all, the marvelous color. In the field of color effects, the author boldly claims, the desert is supreme; his descriptions affect one the same way as Nansen's of the aurora borealis.

With the human inhabitants of the desert Mr. Chase was, on the whole, impressed favorably. Hospitality was freely offered and he liked the home life of the Mexicans on both sides of the border, for the Colorado Desert, concerning which he writes, lies in California. When this desert was labelled, in 1853, there was as yet no State of Colorado. Winter and Spring are the time to visit this desert; the necessary equipment is described by the author—and don't forget a mosquito net. A ferryman, on being asked how he endured these tormentors, answered: "Why, there's no more blood in me, you see. They got the last out of me about 1910; so they've quit coming around."

In "The Heritage of India" a succession of volumes is projected dealing with the Sanscrit and Pali literatures; with the different vernacular literatures both in histories and illustrative volumes of selections; with the philosophical systems; with the fine arts and music; and with biographies. Altogether, between thirty and forty volumes are now in sight, all written to foster in the Indian student class a feeling for their ancient heritage and to put before them in a healthy way its treasures of knowledge, wisdom, and beauty. The books are to be cheap and non-technical; but they must also be scholarly and sympathetic. The second in the series has just appeared, a short study by James M. MacPhail, of the life and times of Asoka as king, missionary, and scribe, with the early history of Buddhism and with Asoka's place in history (Oxford University Press). It is an admirable little volume, full, interesting, and careful. A second volume has also just appeared in "The Religious Life of India Series," and fifteen more are in preparation. It is a study of the Ahmadiya movement, by the late H. A. Walter and issued by the same publishers. This, by the nature of the case, had to be a much more elaborate book and is one of more immediate modern interest. The Ahmadiya sect has been widely rejected by Moslems as in essential heresy with Islam; yet it may be said to represent Islam officially in England by its mission to Christians at Woking and by its English monthly, the Review of Religions. On one side the sect is intensely and conservatively Moslem, as opposed to the reformed Islam centred at Aligarh in India; but on another it has combined with Islam much Christian and Hindu doctrine. The founder, Ghulam Ahmad, claimed to be not only the Moslem Mahdi, come in a peaceful form, but also Jesus in his second coming and an avatar of Krishna; and his followers, since his death, now regard him as having fulfilled the prophecies in all religions of a great spiritual leader to come. They would, therefore, unite all religions by fulfilling in one figure all their eschatological hopes. On another side the founder is a figure of great psychological interest, a mediumistic prophet of the most primitive pathological type, a Mohammed without the genius and simplicity of the author of Islam, yet living under modern conditions and in contact with critical attitudes which he tried to use and only half understood. When he brings forth wonderful things from the Encyclopædia Biblica he helps us to understand Mohammed's crazy syncretisms from the theology of the Greek Church and the mythology of Zoroastrianism. Mr. Walter's book can, therefore, be heartily commended to students of religious psychology and history, as well as to specialists in Islam.

The latest issue of the "Cahiers Britanniques et Américains," the series of brochures which M. Georges-Bazile publishes in Paris (13 Quai de Conti), has just arrived in this country and is devoted to a translation of some of President Wilson's literary essays. The pamphlet opens with an Introduction by Mr. Theodore Stanton, in which it is pointed out for the first time, we believe, that the President descends from the Rev. Robert Woodrow, the distinguished Scottish Presbyterian clergyman and historian of the seventeenth century, one of whose sons emigrated to this country, bringing with him a queer old manuscript volume belonging to his father, which is now deposited in one of the libraries of the University of New Jersey, at New Brunswick. Its mates, a score in number, are to be found in the Advocates' Library at Glasgow, where Robert Woodrow spent most of his life.

"Roget's Thesaurus," as the "Thesaurus of English Words and Phrases" by the physician Peter Mark Roget is commonly called, has been issued in two compact little volumes in Everyman's Library (Dutton). Arranged on philosophical rather than alphabetical principles, the work has long proved useful to writers, not only in suggesting a word, but also, sometimes, an idea.

Contemporary Painting in Washington

WHATEVER may be true of other phases of our national life, American painting, to judge from the current presentation of it at the Corcoran Gallery, has not yet become fully aware of our participation in the late war. While the mere titles of a half dozen or more canvases designedly echo the event, only three or four possess any genuine pictorial connection with it. Both George Luks' "Czecho-Slovak Chieftain" and Henry Reuterdahl's "The Destroyer Patrol" may be considered only additional reasons for lamenting that calamity. But John C. Johansen's "The Daily Conference," fresh from Paris, is interesting. George Bellows' already widely known "The Murder of Edith Cavell," while theatrically powerful, is not a truly great work of art. This brief summary fairly indicates the minor rôle played by the avowedly "war" pictures in the Corcoran's extraordinary exhibition.

On the whole, the unimportance of such work in its present surroundings is not a matter for regret. It is a profound satisfaction again to see a representative collection of paintings the vitality of which arises not from the heart-breaking strain of war or the spasms of artificial "movements" but from artistic health and sanity. Whether the very evident aliveness of our present-day painting, together with certain marked changes on the part of individual painters, are indirectly due to the war, to its natural tendency to rouse men out of routine—this is a question that might be very prettily argued on both sides. But, however it has come about, American painting, as set forth in Washington this month, is full of life and significance. It gives adequate ground for pride in the visible accomplishment of our painters and affords a basis for speculation as to the future.

True, the older men are passing. Weir's death after his two paintings had been placed on the walls of the Corcoran lends emphasis to this sobering thought. And to stand in the presence of such work as that by which both Weir and Thayer are represented is to wonder if their equals can be found among the younger men even when the younger shall have become the elder. For the former's "The Sisters" and the latter's "Boy and Angel" have in them certain qualities of spirit higher than all possible technical accomplishment; and it is these subtle higher values that one misses when studying the mass of proficient paintings now being produced. But such qualities come by endowment and not by acquisition. It would be as unreasonable to expect them to prevail throughout a whole generation of painters as it would be to ask nothing but masterpieces in a contemporary show. And even were these two works of the first rank absent, the Corcoran's exhibition would remain remarkable for its high level of accomplishment.

Sargent's "Portrait of John D. Rockefeller" and Melchers' "MacPherson and MacDonald" are both familiar to other sections of the American public; but the latter's "At Home" is the newest example of his extraordinary capacity for surmounting technical difficulties. Indeed, there is no lack of capable, and in some instances distinguished, figure-painting in this exhibit, ranging in style from Paxton's characteristic "Girl Sewing" to the calculated modernity of Norwood MacGilvary's "The Self."

However, as to be expected of any representative collection of native work, it is in landscape that our school's ability is especially noteworthy. For it is in this field that its talent for brilliant transcription has freest play. Frank Swift Chase, in his "Edge of a Forest," achieves individuality without eccentricity. Charles C. Curran's "After the Storm" is decidedly more decorative than his painting which won a prize at the last Academy. Jonas Lie's two masterly water scenes call for admiration. It is a pleasure to note a more spirited sense of color in Robert Spencer's capable work. Charles H. Davis' "The Sunny Hillside," to which was awarded the second prize, is a decided departure from his accustomed manner. But at once the most eminent and the most marked instance of change is afforded by the three canvases of Edward W. Redfield; and the "bravura" of these spring songs is delightful. The most striking single piece of landscape here shown, a painting that would be remarkable in any exhibition, is Gardner Symons' "Where Waters Flow and Long Shadows Lie"; it will add strength to even the Corcoran's strong permanent collection of American work. Faithfulness to surface facts can not be claimed for Charles Rosen's "Old Willow," designed as it is to attract attention at the expense of its neighbors; and to the conservatively minded it will seem a good omen that the majority of our landscape painters do not rely on such forced mannerisms in attaining decorative and emotional quality.

In conclusion, this article can only add its note to the chorus of praise for the exhibition as a whole. It combines a high excellence sometimes attained in smaller shows with a comprehensiveness attained in no other regularly recurring assemblage of native painting. The radical element of our school plays its due part in the ensemble, but no more than its due part. The predominating conservatism of the school has its recognition in the proportional representation here accorded to it. The thing worthy of note in this connection, however, is that this predominating conservatism does not involve unthinking repetition of ancient formulas. Of course, this may in a measure be true of a painter here and there; such individuals, like the poor, we have always with us. But this contemporary exhibition as a whole is æsthetically sane and unquestionably vigorous. That this should be true of our painting in the particular stress of circumstances now prevailing is the most encouraging thing one could be privileged to chronicle.

The eminent degree of success with which the policy of the Corcoran Gallery has met warrants the hope that "The William A. Clark Prizes" may be made permanent. A real tradition of quality and comprehensiveness has been firmly established by this latest of the series begun in 1907; and with the prestige of such a tradition to live up to, the permanence of these awards could not fail to have a satisfactory effect on American painting. Were former Senator Clark to perpetuate the prizes now so prominently associated with his name, he would ensure not only the worthiest possible form of remembrance for himself, but also for the Corcoran Gallery such an influential rôle in our art as is not held by any other existing institution.

VIRGIL BARKER

Music

Henry Krehbiel and Ernest Newman Discuss Music

MORE CHAPTERS OF OPERA. By Henry Krehbiel. New York: Henry Holt and Company.
A MUSICAL MOTLEY. By Ernest Newman. New York: John Lane Company.

IN the latest of his chronicles of New York opera Mr. Krehbiel deals specifically with the period extending from 1908 to 1918. We may disagree with Mr. Krehbiel's views on opera. But as a chronicler, we admit he has no rival. Not many men alive would have the patience he has shown in noting down year after year all that takes place in all the New York opera seasons. And yet, if no one had his diligence and patience, where should we go for our musical reminders—where should we find out when this opera was first sung, or where that singer first enthralled the New York public? To the recorder, as a recorder, of these "Chapters" we owe all our gratitude. To the critic who has analyzed and made his comments we owe only truth.

On many points, if time and space allowed, it would be a pleasure to fight Mr. Krehbiel strenuously. For, as a

(Continued on page 64)

The Wires

Both Professor Crocker and Dr. Wheeler operated the telegraph key prior to the invention of the telephone in 1876. In this year these two electrical engineers manufactured a telephone a model of which is still in existence.

Both Professor Crocker and Dr. Wheeler manufactured batteries for telephone and telegraph.

S. S. Wheeler
President

Crocker-Wheeler Co.

Ampere, N. J.

New York	Pittsburgh
Boston	Newark
Syracuse	New Haven
Chicago	Philadelphia
Cleveland	Baltimore
Binghamton	San Francisco

TIFFANY & CO.

JEWELRY SILVERWARE WATCHES CLOCKS STATIONERY

SUPREME QUALITY

PURCHASES MAY BE MADE BY MAIL

FIFTH AVENUE & 37TH STREET
NEW YORK

Just Published

THEODORE ROOSEVELT'S AUTOBIOGRAPHY

This is a new edition of the immortal autobiography of the great man—perhaps the best source of all to turn to for an understanding of his remarkable qualities and his amazing career. Illustrated. $5.00

A BOOK OF R. L. S.

WORKS, TRAVELS, FRIENDS, AND COMMENTATORS

By George E. Brown

A most interesting and valuable gathering of information about Stevenson, as the author describes it in his sub-title. The whole is alphabetically arranged, so that it forms a real Stevensonian encyclopædia. Illustrated. $2.50

MEMORIES OF GEORGE MEREDITH, O. M.

By Lady Butcher

An entertaining and informal book of intimate anecdote and remembered talks, witty, whimsical, and serious, with a writer whose personality was always as interesting as his work. Lady Butcher was a friend of Meredith and his family from her childhood and for more than forty years. Readers of his "Letters" know her well both under her married name and as Alice Brandreth. $1.60

SOME DIVERSIONS OF A MAN OF LETTERS

By Edmund Gosse

"Some Diversions of a Man of Letters" is a collection of essays in various fields of literature that lie somewhat outside the author's usual path and represent, in fact, diversions from the themes on which he has principally addressed the public. Among the contents are: "The Songs of Shakespeare," "The Message of the Wartons," "The Charm of Sterne," "The Challenge of the Brontës," "Disraeli's Novels," "The Lyrical Poetry of Thomas Hardy," "Some Soldier Poets," "The Future of English Poetry," "The Agony of the Victorian Age." $2.50

CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS

PUBLISHERS - FIFTH AVENUE AT 48TH STREET, NEW YORK

Established 1851 Nassau and Pine Streets

The Hanover National Bank

OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK

WILLIAM WOODWARD ....President
E. HAYWARD FERRY ....Vice-President
SAMUEL WOOLVERTON ....Vice-President
JOSEPH BYRNE ....Vice-President
CHARLES H. HAMPTON ....Vice-President
HENRY P. TURNBULL ....Vice-President
WILLIAM E. CABLE, Jr. ....Cashier
J. NIEMANN ....Assistant Cashier
WILLIAM DONALD ....Assistant Cashier
GEORGE E. LEWIS ....Assistant Cashier

FOREIGN DEPARTMENT
WILLIAM H. SUYDAM.......Vice-President and Manager
ROBERT NEILLEY ....Ass't Manager
FREDERIC A. BUCK ....Ass't Manager

Capital, $3,000,000 Surplus and Profits, $18,000,000

(Continued from page 62)

critic, he is sometimes narrow; swayed by harsh puritan moralities and codes; too apt to damn things that are new. His inability to sympathize with the best achievements of the French Modern School is almost exasperating. His fulminations against certain gifted artists who offend him ethically—not æsthetically—stir one to anger, and now and then to pity. But at his narrowest (as, for example, in his onslaughts on Mary Garden) he does not justify a doubt as to his honesty. And that seems but to aggravate his want of charity, his failure to allow for the faiths and convictions of others.

The decade of which Mr. Krehbiel tells us in his new "Chapters" saw many very important shifts and changes in the New York opera world; the last phases of the war between Mr. Hammerstein, at the Manhattan, and Mr. Gatti-Casazza, at the Metropolitan; the withdrawal from the stage of such charming singers as Marcella Sembrich and Emma Eames; the regretted deaths of Lillian Nordica and Putnam Griswold; the rise and exit of that great artist and conductor, Toscanini; the elimination from the opera field of poor Mr. Hammerstein; the slow and grudging, but still steady concessions of the Metropolitan management to the demand that opera should be made more understandable to its devotees, by being sung to them in clear, good English; and the invasion of New York by the late Maëstro Campanini with the Chicago opera company.

Regarding the vexed question of opera in English, Mr. Krehbiel wobbles. He has at various times held various views upon this all vital subject. Long years ago, he seemed to favor English. Then, by aloofness and by more than coldness, he seemed to discourage it. And now he has, apparently, come back to his old faith. For is not his own English version of Wagner's "Parsifal" soon to be sung here at the Metropolitan?

We owe thanks to Mr. Krehbiel for his statistics. They throw a flood of rather startling and distressing light on the allotment of rewards in opera. In the second year of Mr. Heinrich Conried's consulship, according to our recorder, the sums expended on the Metropolitan "artists" (i. e., singers) and staff totalled $544,153.11. In the same season the amount paid to composers and others (presumably publishers and copyists) for "music and royalties" was $3,499.67. Since then the cost of opera has increased greatly. But the composers are still treated almost shamefully, while their interpreters have princely fortunes heaped on them.

Mr. Ernest Newman, the English critic, in a most interesting volume of reprinted essays, writes brightly and incisively of singers, critics, composers, amateurs, and mock-critics. His method may perhaps be best described as the antithesis of Mr. Krehbiel's. He knows much more of music than most men do. But he is far too sane to pose as one omniscient. I am not sure that he would keep from smiling if he got hold of one of those new "Chapters" in which our Henry E. upholds the dignity and glory of his calling. The pose pontifical would never suit the true-born Englishman. To make his points he affects the cap and bells.

The articles included in "A Musical Motley" are of the most diverse character. They range from grave to gay, from wise to trivial. In taste, thank Heaven, their author is eclectic; quite broad enough to enjoy all schools and styles.

He is not too dignified to shrink from quips and anecdotes. He is not too hampered by unnecessary reverence to speak freely of the highest gods of art. To him the Slavs, Tschaikowsky and Rachmaninov and Chopin, are "Weary Willies," with a tempering dash of Werther.

Nor is he more respectful to his own guild. He pokes fun at musical criticism, though, incidentally, he mocks at those who scorn it. "The profession of musical critic," he explains in one of three "Open Letters" to a young, ardent critic, "is the easiest in the world. It is perhaps the only profession that can be practised by the man in the streets with as much assurance as by the man who has given his life to it. . . . The butcher, the baker, and the candlestick maker are all more competent to speak authoritatively on music than the critic. . . . However, if you don't take it too seriously, you may get a lot of fun out of it." After which he lays down the rules for "safety first" in criticism.

He darts nimbly and alertly from André Wormser and his fascinating pantomime scores to Debussy, Brahms, Moussorgsky, d'Indy, and Wagner. He declines to rank the classics as supermen and even ventures to suggest that the most famous master of them all may have made errors. He goes so far in this iconoclastic strain in his "Putting the Classics in their Place," as to declare that even old music by the great composers might be improved upon by modern re-constructors.

The Dryasdusts of music may be horrified—they must be pained—if they dig into Mr. Newman's essay on "The Elastic Language"—otherwise harmony. What may pass muster in the schools as laws of harmony, he says, is really nothing but the teaching of harmonic analysis. To Mr. Newman there are no rules and no grammar for that art or science. "It is because harmony is not only a language but the most elastic of languages that it can not be taught." And, "just as a poet could weave the subtlest rhythmical patterns without ever having even heard of the terms dactyl and spondee, so a born musician can write abstruse harmony without being able to name a number of the chords that he uses instinctively." All this is most upsetting to the Dryasdusts.

One article on the "Nonsense Music" of Satie and other modernists of a fantastic turn has special value to explorers of such offshoots from the beaten track of music. But almost everything in this delightful "Medley" will bear reading, both by musicians and by laymen who love music.

C. H. M.

Drama

"A Night's Lodging" at the Plymouth—"The Master Builder" at the People's House

THE subject of the Gorki play which Mr. Arthur Hopkins now offers to the public in special matinees at the Plymouth is a place—a slum—or rather that region of the human spirit which finds in the place in question its adequate and vivid symbol. Its hero is everybody—that dusky personage who seems to occupy the halfway point between the substance of somebody and the vacuum of nobody. Particular fates count for naught or little in this sombre atmosphere in which catastrophes seem incidental and little speeches almost cataclysmic. A consumptive woman dies, but it matters little to us. What really leaves its mark upon our souls is the capmaker's undisturbed comment: "Well, we've done with that coughing at last." When the actor hangs himself, the point is not that a man has ended his own life, but that the gambler says: "He's spoilt our song, the fool." In point of sheer horror and grimness, the place in which such deeds are possible is as nothing in comparison with the place in which such words are possible. Gorki's play is a symptomatic play—in other words, a play in which the subject is a condition, and the acts and words alike are measured by their value as interpreters of that condition.

Gorki's play, read in English, is not a great drama. A great slum-play should show us the terror, or the pity, or the intensity of life. Gorki's play is rather sordid than terrible or touching or vital, and, even more than it is sordid, it is harsh. Here is a group of persons in whom misfortune and degradation have evolved a self-protective hardness, a shell or carapace, which is at once impervious and rasping. It is human nature petrified. The evangelist Luka, who is vaguely fraternal and indistinctly consoling, rather weakens the robustness of the piece, but the fashion in which he drifts in and drifts out suggests pointedly enough that the conscience is the only transient in the lodging house.

The play is undramatic in the closet; it has no unfolding action. On the stage it remains undramatic, but it becomes, to a quite unforeseen and astonishing degree, theatrical. As read, it leaves behind it an impression of congestion and squalor. This effect is greatly softened in representation; on the stage there was space and darkness; the space liberated and the darkness cloaked. The originality of the setting, which on the printed page had been largely neutralized by its meanness, now revealed itself to the imagination in the power of its novelty and the vividness of its release. I had a sense of departure from the world. The speeches uttered had often the strange effect of aerolites projected into the void of space, and while this impression was far from continuous, the intervals were partly filled by the exhilaration of watching in the murk for the outleap of these meteorites. There were drawbacks undoubtedly. The story of Pepel and the two sisters was too big and powerful for the frame, and, while it did not finally get out, in its struggle to get out the frame was very nearly cracked. Again, the fourth act on the stage is superfluous and intolerable. There is a story and a study in the play. By the end of Act III the story is ended and the study is complete. Extension beyond those limits is disastrous.

The acting of a fragmentary play is of course fragmentary, but the suggestiveness and poignancy of many of these fragments was an honor to the cast. I was astonished at the evident sympathy of American actors for these Russian parts, at the meat, the salt, which they unmistakably found in the lines. The merit was general rather than particular; nearly every actor had his lustrous moment; if I paused on any one part, it should be on Mr. Dinehart's rendering of the thief Pepel. There was one serious error. Paroxysms are out of place in this Gorki play, which is pitched in a key of stoicism that borders the courageous on one side and includes the brutal on the other. Yet paroxysms of the worst kind—describable by a line from Mr. Masefield's latest poem, "a swearing screech, like tearing sacking," were scattered broadcast through the play. Frenzy and Russia appear to have been inseparable ideas in the mind of the supervisor of the performance. The emphasis I am constrained to give to this objection only heightens the pleasure with which I felicitate Mr. Hopkins on the intelligent fulfillment of a gallant design.

On Christmas night I saw at the Workmen's Theatre in the People's House a presentation of Ibsen's "Master Builder" by the English actors, Mr. Leigh Lovel and Miss Octavia Kenmore. The performance was called a dramatic recital, but differed from a regular performance only in the use of an unvarying and doubtfully appropriate "set" for the three acts. Mr. Lovel's Solness was ashen and, nevertheless, by an odd anomaly, was made capricious and splenetic almost to the verge of hysteria. There was a brief period in the last half of the first act when Miss Kenmore's Hilda Wangel filled expectation to the brim, with a beauty and measure in certain passages hardly rivaled in my memories of New York. But when the second act began I saw that what Miss Kenmore had grasped and rendered so delightfully was not the real Hilda, the whole Hilda, but only a single mood or phase—what might be called the rapt Hilda. Her Hilda as a whole took its cue from the alpenstock. What we saw was a hardy, sturdy, upright little Swiss girl, finely indignant with Solness for his immoral treatment of Ragnar, and shocked as any other school-taught and church-bred girl would have been at the disaster to which her urgencies drove the half-unwilling Solness. As the last curtain descends, Hilda is on the earth in an anguish of sorrow and remorse, and the attitude is prostration for Ibsen's Hilda in a double sense.

O. W. FIRKINS

Books and the News

Socialism

HERE again is a subject about which the books alone fill shelf after shelf in any large library. The profound student views with contempt an endeavor to name a few, or brief, books for the general reader. But the busy man will not scorn the suggestion of a few titles, nor even the intimation that there are one or two books which may give the beginner a general survey of the field. As with Prohibition, and other proposals for changes in the existing laws, the advocates of the change have had the most active pens, and the different varieties of Socialists have outwritten their opponents in quantity, at least.

The conscientious Socialist, or the reader who aspires to a citation for conspicuous gallantry, will, it may be, boldly attempt the three volumes of the great Bible of the Socialists: Karl Marx's "Capital; A Critique of Political Economy" (Kerr, 1908). Less ambitious souls will content themselves with reading one of his defenders, Louis B. Boudin's "The Theoretical System of Karl Marx" (Kerr, 1918) and one of his opponents, Albert E. F. Schäffle's "The Quintessence of Socialism" (Scribner, 1892). With these books should be named Thomas Kirkup's "History of Socialism" (Macmillan, 1913), an unbiased work, emphasizing English Socialism.

Have you time or inclination for but one book, and that a short one, of less than one hundred and fity pages? My suggestion is Ira B. Cross's "Essentials of Socialism" (Macmillian, 1912), which is an attempt to tell what Socialism is, and fairly to state the arguments for and against it. There is a good bibliography in it.

Now, for the advocates of Socialism:

(Continued on page 68)

"WINTER'S FOR BOOKS"

The books advertised in this issue have been specially selected by a group of book publishers as likely to meet the needs and tastes of readers at this time.

Offered during the newly created Midwinter Book Season, many of these books are brand new; all are believed to be worthy of discriminating attention.

Colophons of American Publishers

The small ornamental device that is found on the title-page or elsewhere in almost every book printed to-day is the survival of a quaint old custom that dates back to the time before printing was discovered. These devices, generally called colophons, have come to be known merely as the trademark of various publishing houses, and have outlived any former purpose. Many of them, however, have individually a history quite as interesting as that of old coats of arms, or old bookplates.

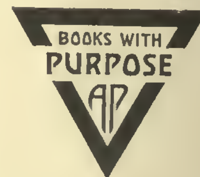
The term colophon has been in use for several centuries, but with the years its meaning has gradually changed until the original significance has been lost. One of the "seven ancient towns" which "claimed Homer dead," yet had spurned him when through their streets "he begg'd his bread," was the Ionian city Colophon, famed for the rich aristocracy that ruled it and for the dashing cavalry that won its battles. It was said that the final charge of the Colophon troop of cavalry always proved "the finishing stroke" in rendering victory decisive. Whether or not this is the correct etymology of the term, the word "colophon" was later applied to "the finishing stroke" given to old manuscripts and printed books. In the early days this term was applied to the paragraphs appended to the manuscript or book by the scribe or printer. Title-pages were then unknown, and books often appeared without clue to the date or place of issue, the printer, or even the author, unless this information was added by some enterprising printer with an eye to making history and to securing future business. Frequently he asked heavenly blessing on his work and invoked the prayers of his readers.

At the end of one old manuscript written in 1338 and, of course, in Latin) the copyist added a very full note, winding up with a verse which may be freely translated as follows:

"Let this book prove the writer free of evil;
May Jesus bless and save him from the devil."

These notes sometimes contained praise of the workmanship of the book, or of the art of printing, of the town where the book was issued, or the great man for whom it was written. Later the printer often added his own coat of arms or that of his patron. In this way colophons first took on an ornamental aspect, and ceased to be for information only. As the title-page became customary, the practice of appending a final paragraph or colophon gradually lost its usefulness and a purely ornamental device was added as "the finishing stroke." In modern times the colophon of a well-known publisher is no doubt as effective a stroke as we need to make his book worth reading and worth keeping.

The colophon of the Abingdon Press as shown here, was adapted from a fireplace design in the exhibit of the Press at the Panama-Pacific Exposition in San Francisco. It suggests a frosty night without a roaring fire within, a comfortable bench, and a good book—as cheery an argument for midwinter reading as we have seen.



The Association Press has been using since October, 1916, the Triangle colophon designed by William J. Colby and drawn by John Butler. The Association Press is the Publication Department of the International Committee of Young Men's Christian Associations. The Triangle is the adopted insignia of the threefold idea of the Y. M. C. A.—Spirit—Mind—Body. The phrase below the Triangle, "The Mark of a Book Written to Meet a Need," was added in 1919. "It helps," says Mr. Colby, "to define the meaning of 'Books with Purpose,' as we aim to publish only books for which there is a distinct human need." The initials stand for Association Press.

Since 1911 books issued by the Atlantic Monthly Press have borne a colophon drawn by Bruce Rogers from a classic design. It shows a Neptune figure, with the familiar trident and dolphin, and is said to represent "Father Atlantic—the American Neptune."

(To be continued)

Attractive offerings are made during the Midwinter Book Season.

Abraham Lincoln
As A Man of Letters
By Luther Emerson Robinson, A. M.
Professor of English, Monmouth College

IN the wealth of Lincoln literature there is nothing else like Professor Robinson's book. It has a human quality. . . . The author approaches his subject with a ripe equipment and writes with a loving understanding. . . . The generous appendix embraces all of Lincoln's most famous addresses, letters and state papers.

So far as we know, this is the first book to study Lincoln in the capacity of a man of letters. The study is interesting and the analysis closely reasoned and convincing.—The Outlook.

Professor Robinson's study is an excellent presentation of the chief material upon which Lincoln's claim to a place in literature is based.—The Continent.

Professor Robinson shows us with a very keen and delicate touch how the great experiences of Lincoln's life reacted on his written words until finally, we have from him at least two of the masterpieces of literature. The new Lincoln book should find a large field for itself.—U. S. Artillery Journal.

A Book for Every American's Library

PRICE, $1.50 NET

Publishers THE REILLY & LEE CO. Chicago

DM DM

Wintry Blasts Outdoors—a Cozy Hearthside Within—and a New Detective Story to Read

For this congenial occupation we recommend

THE DISAPPEARANCE OF KIMBALL WEBB

BY

ROWLAND WEBB

It is a mystery story that will hold your interest and we think you will find it hard to solve the problem it presents in its first chapter. At booksellers $1.75

DODD, MEAD & COMPANY

Publishers for Eighty Years

Fourth Avenue and 30th Street, New York

DM DM

TIMELY BOOKS

Labor and the Common Welfare

Compiled and edited by Hayes Robbins from the writings and addresses of

SAMUEL GOMPERS

A much-needed, clear, concise statement of the position and aims of Labor by a recognized leader and authorized representative. - - - - Now ready, $3.00

To be followed shortly by a companion volume:—

Labor and the Employer In Press

The two volumes together cover very fully the "Labor Movements and Labor Problems in America," and should be studied with care by every workman, employer, teacher, preacher, or writer,—in brief, by every loyal American.

Birds in Town and Village

By W. H. HUDSON, author of "Far Away and Long Ago," "The Purple Land," etc. - - - - - $4.00

Studies of bird life which take the reader through Devon lanes and Cornish villages, old London gardens, etc., in the most delightful companionship imaginable. Illustrated with plates in colors. In press.

A Little Garden the Year Round

By GARDNER TEALL - - - - - $2.50

Wherein much joy was found, experience gained, and profit, spiritual as well as mundane, derived without loss of prestige in a practical neighborhood.

E. P. DUTTON & COMPANY

681 Fifth Ave. (Opposite St. Thomas's Church) New York

RUDYARD KIPLING'S VERSE: Inclusive Edition, 1885-1918

ALL of Kipling's verse—the songs that for decades have been the marching tunes and exhortations of all the English speaking peoples; the songs that are, according to Brander Matthews, "the greatest poetry of our generation." Among them is "Great-Heart," that magnificent tribute to Theodore Roosevelt, bringing his work down to the year 1919. This volume contains all of Kipling's published verse and a full index to titles and first lines. 800 pages. Bound in cloth, full leather, and a de luxe autographed edition.

Cloth, net, $5.00. At all bookstores. Published by DOUBLEDAY, PAGE & CO., Garden City, N. Y., and 25 Richmond St., W., Toronto.

Attractive offerings are made during the Midwinter Book Season.

(Continued from page 65)
William E. Walling's "The Larger Aspects of Socialism" (Macmillan, 1913), "The Socialism of Today" (Holt, 1916), by Walling, Phelps Stokes, and others (a source book with documents), Jessie W. Hughan's "American Socialism of the Present Day" (Lane, 1911), and H. G. Wells's "New Worlds for Old" (1908). John Spargo's "Socialism" (Macmillan, 1918) was written before he resigned from the Socialist party, and represents his pre-war views. Another by Mr. Spargo and similar in circumstances of publication is "Social Democracy Explained" (Harper, 1918), while his "Americanism and Social Democracy" (Harper, 1918) consists of essays on the situation since the outbreak of the war.

An able presentation of the case against Socialism is Oscar Douglas Skelton's "Socialism: A Critical Analysis" (Houghton, 1911). The view of the Church of Rome is given in Father Vaughan's "Socialism from the Christian Standpoint" (Macmillan, 1912).

EDMUND LESTER PEARSON

Books Received

ESSAYS AND CRITICISM

Gass, S. B. A Lover of the Chair. Marshall Jones. $2.50 net.

Morley, Christopher. Mince Pie. Doran.

BIOGRAPHY AND HISTORY

Braithwaite, W. S. The Story of the Great War. Stokes. $3 net.

Cotterill, H. B. Italy from Dante to Tasso. Stokes. $5 net.

Loti, Pierre. Madame Prune. Stokes. $3 net.

Paton, Lucy Allen. Elizabeth Cary Agassiz. Houghton, Mifflin. $3 net.

FICTION

Austin, Mary. Outland. Boni & Liveright.

Bacheller, Irving. A Man for the Ages. Bobbs Merrill. $1.75 net.

Harland, Marion. The Carringtons of High Hill. Scribner. $1.60 net.

James, Henry. A Landscape Painter. New York: Scott & Seltzer. $1.75 net.

Keller, Gottfried. Seldwyla Folks. Brentano's.

Merrick, Leonard. The Worldlings. Introduction by Neil Munro. Dutton. $2.00 net.

Zamacois, Eduardo. "Their Son," "The Necklace." Translated by G. A. England. Boni & Liveright. $1.25.

GOVERNMENT AND ECONOMICS

Hadley, A. T. The Moral Basis of Democracy. Yale. $1.75 net.

Morris, R. T. The Way Out of War. Doubleday, Page. $1 net.

Spargo, John. The Psychology of Bolshevism. Harper. $1.35 net.

LITERATURE

Goldberg, Isaac. Studies in Spanish-American Literature. Introduction by J. D. M. Ford. Brentano's.

Magnus, Laurie. European Literature in the Centuries of Romance. Dutton. $7 net.

MISCELLANEOUS

Herford, Oliver. The Giddy Globe. Doran.

MUSIC

Hobbe, Gustav. The Complete Opera Book. Putnam.

Krehbiel, H. E. More Chapters of Opera. Holt. $3.50 net.

Newman, Ernest. A Musical Motley. Lane. $1.50 net.

POETRY AND DRAMA

Brady, E. J. The House of the Winds. Dodd, Mead.

Cabot, Elise Pumpelly. Arizona, and Other Poems. Dutton. $2 net.

Mann, D. L. An Acreage of Lyric. Boston: Cornhill Pub. Co. $1.25.

More, Brookes. The Lover's Rosary. Boston: Cornhill Pub. Co. $1.25.

Smith, Mrs. L. W. The Lamp of Heaven. Boston. Four Seas Co.

RELIGION AND PHILOSOPHY

Jackson, H. E. The Community Church. Houghton Mifflin.

Singer, Ignatius. The Rival Philosophies of Jesus and of Paul. Open Court Publishing Company.

SCIENCE

Fabre, J. H. The Glow-Worm. Dodd, Mead. $1.75 net.

TRAVEL AND DESCRIPTION

Dunsany, Lord. Tales of Three Hemispheres. Boston: Luce.

Laughlin, Clara E. The Martyred Towns of France. Putnam.

Malins, Geoffrey. How I Filmed the War. Stokes.

Shipley, A. E. The Voyage of a Vice-Chancellor. Putnam.

Scarborough, Dorothy. From a Southern Porch. Putnam.

Wilson, H. P. John Brown, Soldier of Fortune: A Critique. Boston: Cornhill Pub. Co.

THE FLOW of VALUE

By Logan Grant McPherson

Author of "How the World Makes Its Living," etc.

IN the light of their evolution the author develops the significance of value, capital, prices, wages, profit and interest, showing that production, buying and selling give rise to a relativity of prices, a relativity of wages, and a relativity of profit. He makes plain the relation between production and consumption, the relation between the employer and the employee, and clarifies the long-standing dispute as to the quantity theory of money. This book sets forth the principles in accordance with which economic activity must be directed to serve human welfare and promote human progress.

Price $2.50

At All Bookstores

Published by THE CENTURY CO. New York City

INCREASING SATISFACTION

January 5, 1920.

"I have read THE REVIEW carefully since the appearance of the first number, and I am increasingly delighted with its methods and opinions. It is bound to be a success, since there is such an eager field for an elevated conservative weekly. Truly, it fills a very necessary place, because were it not for your publication, the radical weeklies would run rampant. I am indeed thankful, as are many others, that we now have a powerful weekly to combat their propaganda."

A Journalist writes the above statement from a southern state. Intellectual satisfaction of this sort is beyond price. A few copies of THE REVIEW are worth the cost of a year's subscription. To be in mental rapport with your associates who read THE REVIEW, you should subscribe on the attached coupon immediately.

THE REVIEW

THE ORGAN OF SANE AMERICAN PROGRESS

THE REVIEW, 140 Nassau St., New York:
Please send me THE REVIEW for one year.

Name ....

Address ....

$5 a year

THE REVIEW

Vol. 2, No. 37 New York, Saturday, January 24, 1920 FIFTEEN CENTS

Contents

Brief Comment 69

Editorial Articles:

The World's Economic Restoration 71

The New Policy Toward Russia 72

Admiral Sims's Memorandum 74

The Father of Victory 75

President Butler on the Classics 76

Moscow's Campaign of Poison. By Examiner 77

The Government of India Act. By A. J. Barnouw 80

Correspondence 82

Book Reviews:

The Tragedy of von Tirpitz 84

Sensitivism 85

Hard-Boiled Poetry 85

The Art of the Etcher 87

The Run of the Shelves 87

Our American Shoe Men 89

Drama:

French Plays—Carlo Liten and "Les Bleus de l'Amour." By O. W. Firkins 90

Music:

The Chicago Opera Season—"Zaza" at the Metropolitan. By Charles Henry Meltzer 92

Reginald de Koven 92

Books and the News: The Theatre. By Edmund Lester Pearson 94

WHAT answer the Navy Department will make to Admiral Sims's charges, it is entirely too early to forecast. But it is of the first importance that the public should understand from the start the exact character of the simplest of those charges, and the one that has attracted the greatest amount of attention. Admiral Sims does not say, as many of the newspaper defenses of the Navy Department represent, that the Department was half-hearted in its conduct of operations throughout the war. So far as this aspect of the matter is concerned, the stress is all on delay—on the precious time that was lost in the early period of the war. Admiral Sims's express statement on the point is as follows:

> 13. For some reason, which has never been explained, the Navy Department, during the first six months of the war, failed to put into actual practice a whole-hearted policy of coöperation with the Allies—a policy required for the winning of the war with the least possible delay. (The italics are ours.)

It is no answer to this charge, nor to the detailed statements to similar effect, that we did ultimately do splendid service in coöperation with the British Navy. Still less does Secretary Daniels's own statement, in rebuttal of Admiral Sims, that the primary duty of the American Navy was to safeguard the transports that carried our boys overseas have any bearing upon this issue. We did not begin to transport troops in any considerable numbers until long after the period during which the half-heartedness of which Admiral Sims so bitterly complains was exhibited. The Navy Department should have, and will have, a fair hearing for its side of the case. But it must meet specific allegations with specific facts. We all know that the war was won, and that the American Navy played a great part in winning it. But the facts of 1917 must stand on their own bottom, and can not be shut out from view by merely pointing to the victory of 1918.

"IF the Senate ratifies the treaty, subject to the proposed reservations," says the New Republic, "he [President Wilson] will not have accomplished any of the constructive political objects which he sought to accomplish when he proposed the entrance of this country into the war." Whatever objects Mr. Wilson may, in his own mind, have "sought to accomplish," he did not "propose" them to the Congress or to the people of the United States. The clear implication of the New Republic's statement is that unless these "constructive political objects" were to be the sure result of the war, we were not justified in standing with the other free peoples of the world in their resistance to the German militarist autocracy, even after the outrages committed by it upon our own rights had passed the limits of endurance. That this is the real mental attitude of the semi-Bolshevist intellectual coterie in this country, there is abundant reason to believe; but they are very careful to avoid any frank expression of it.

SPEAKER Sweet has not mended his case by the announcement that he is going to rest it on specific facts which are said to have been discovered in relation to the personal conduct of the five Socialist Assemblymen. When he summoned them to the bar of the House and asked for their immediate suspension, he put the proposal on no such grounds. If he had done so, everybody would at once have seen the impropriety of passing sentence of suspension before the facts were investigated. If he has a good case, he has horribly muddled it; and whether he has a good case or not, he has done the Socialist cause a service which only the prompt and sincere repudiation of his position by leading citizens, by public organizations, and by the press, has prevented from being of the most signal advantage to it.

NOT a campaign of education, but what is much better, a natural process of education, is what the American people are in these days going through upon the subject of free speech. During a number of years past—for the period dates far back of the war—the issue has been clouded by irrelevancies. Many good people were stirred up to indignation over supposed violations of the right of free speech which were really nothing more than the assertion of common sense and decency as against obstreperous antics. On the other hand, many were so incensed by the Bouck White type of thing that they thoughtlessly went to extremes in the advocacy of repression. The case of the Rev. Percy Grant is one of the things that should help to clarify general thought on the question. To interfere with his freedom to say what he thinks about the deportations, or about socialism, would be an outrage, and we believe that nearly all men of sense recognize this, or will soon recognize it. Upon those who do not, it is extremely desirable to impress a realization of the stupidity of any such suppression from the standpoint of policy. It is not only that such persecution breeds a hundred advovates to one that it suppresses; the worst of it is that once it becomes understood that radical clergymen will be gagged, the value of what conservative clergymen may say will be reduced to very near zero.

IT was not surprising that Mayor Hylan should start the sale of "bonds" to finance the propaganda of the "Irish Republic" by officially admitting De Valera to the freedom of the city. It was only natural that Assemblyman Edward J. Flynn should introduce a resolution at Albany indorsing the sale of these "bonds." But that the Assembly should actually pass that resolution, as it promptly proceeded to do, will be a shock to citizens who have thought of that body as, on the whole, possessing in a fair degree the sense of official responsibility.

IN a letter sent to Lord Curzon, the two representatives of the Sinn Feiners at Paris denounced the League of Nations as "a monument of English hypocrisy, entombing the liberties of millions of men in Ireland, Egypt, Dutch South Africa, Persia, India, and the Far East." However that may be, these British tombs can not be so bad as the catacombs of ancient Rome. There is no subterranean wail in the voice of General Jannie Smuts, and whenever he raises it in his South African grave it sounds much more like a message from Sir Robert Cecil than an echo of the sentiments of De Valera. The other millions entombed to which the letter refers are the same that are promised excavation by the heralds of Bolshevism. Sinn Fein is one of the many forces, now astir all over the world, that work indirectly for the spread of that plague by its agitation against the chief hygienic organization, the British Empire.

THE Zionist organization of America is planning a campaign to raise $10,000,000 for immediate work in Palestine. Land for the new immigrants will have to be purchased, and be made habitable by the development on a large scale of natural resources. Work already in progress in Palestine must be maintained and developed, such as the Hebrew educational system, public welfare work, extermination of malaria, and improvement of housing conditions. Funds are also needed for the work which is being done for Palestine in the United States. The organization does not limit its appeal to Jews only, and it is justified in trusting to a generous response from outside by the fact that among the members of the National Advisory Committee of the Palestine Restoration Fund are some of the leading Christians of the land.

STRANGE news it is which the Vienna correspondent of the Frankfurter Zeitung has reported to his paper. If we are to believe him, an offensive and defensive alliance has been concluded between Austria and Czecho-Slovakia. There is at this moment only one enemy that jeopardizes the very existence of the Austrian people, and the only way effectively to fight that enemy is by an economic union with Czecho-Slovakia. The visit of Mr. Benes, the Czech Foreign Minister, to Paris, just a month ago, coinciding with Dr. Renner's presence at the French capital, and the latter's subsequent departure for Prague, were generally believed to prognosticate an understanding between the two republics, under which Czecho-Slovakia would come to the economic rescue of starving Austria. But we fail to see why a military alliance should be contemplated by a country that is in danger of soon having not a soldier left physically fit for service, nor a child alive for whose sake it needs to be saved.

GOVERNMENT by the people is progressing. The New York Tribune offers an opportunity to the plainest citizen to help write the Republican platform, and holds out as a further inducement the offer of varying quantities of perfectly good 48-cent dollars to be awarded to those who submit the best planks. The project is wholly commendable. Even if the platform resulting from this sort of communal composition is not the one that is finally adopted, it cannot fail to have its influence. But its chief value appears in the probable effect on the amateur plank-makers themselves. They must sharpen their wits as well as their pens against a time, soon to come, when no citizen unfurnished with his plank can venture out without risk of ostracism.

WITH a Presidential election in the offing, one of the things we ought to be thinking about is public economy. And the thing that would enable us to think clearly about it is a budget system, for it would give us, for the first time, an accurate picture of what the Government was trying to do with our money.

When you take out of productive industry some $5,000,000,000 a year in taxes, everybody is hit. The big man and the little man have to help pay the bill. Now, so far as any portion of this $5,000,000,000 represents wasted effort, duplication or overlapping of endeavor, or unwise ventures on the part of the Government, a budget system will at least uncover the facts.

What we want is a business system in Washington. Unless all present signs fail, the Select Committee on the Budget of the Senate will pass a bill which will go to conference. The result of that conference will probably be a compromise bill which will set up a fairly good budget system. It will not provide for a complete system, for that will come only after our people are sufficiently aroused to demand the necessary reforms in the rules of Conrgess. When high-minded, public-spirited men like Taft, Butler, and scores of others, go to Washington to add the weight of their judgment and experience in favor of establishing a sound budget system, the least the individual citizen can do is to tell his representatives in Congress to push through now real budgetary reforms.

THERE are books enough. How to get them distributed is the problem—how to get them into hands that grope blindly for them and in vain, hands that have never yet sensed the comfortable heft of a book. The war taught us that we were not so literate a people as we thought we were. But the war also brought literature to many who had been deprived of it. America was equal to the occasion, and the soldier and the sailor were liberally furnished with books. America's four million in arms read greedily; read for entertainment, finding relief from dull routine and relaxation after strenuous endeavor; read, too, for instruction in the highly technical matter in which they were suddenly called upon to excel. Most of them are once more plain citizens. But they do not propose to do without the pleasure and utility of books.

OF the many forms of energy that were organized for war purposes none has a fairer field in time of peace, a clearer call to continue its work, than the American Library Association. If it was the generosity of the American people that provided the funds, it was the A. L. A. that got the books into the hands of the boys. This group of some few thousand organized librarians has, now that the war is over, vast stores of books on hand; and, more than that, it has some very definite notions of what to do with them, and an organization to carry out their plans. The wiser use of our growing flood of books and journals, and the wider spread of good books and journals, is the gist of the programme it has set before itself.

It proposes to keep the navy and the merchant marine supplied with books. In the Coast Guard and Lighthouse service there are some 9,000 men to whom books spell all the difference between life and mere dull existence. There are service men still in hospitals, or taking the first halting steps in civil life, to whom books are bread and more than bread. There is the blinded veteran with his delicate exploring finger, who if he can get the right sort of books can recover some great part of the light that has been lost to him. So much is largely a continuation of the A. L. A.'s war work. There are to be met, besides, the conditions which sent so many illiterates before the Draft Boards. There are rural and mountain communities, logging camps and mining camps, oil towns, industrial plants, which through their country libraries and other agencies can be furnished with the books they so desperately need. The enlarged programme of the A. L. A. deserves the same hearty support that it received in war-time.

IT is to be hoped that the Federal Prohibition commissars will go about the stern business of administering the law without adding to its horrors by expatiating on the ethical aspects of the matter. Said one of them the other night, addressing a huge assemblage of clergymen: "The passions, the appetites, and the desires of men made it necessary for the promulgation of the Ten Commandments." No doubt if our Prohibition friends had been present when that desirable piece of legislation was promulgated they would have seen to it that it was accompanied by an adequate enforcement act. As it is, for a good deal more than half of the Ten Commandments there is now no external compulsion whatever. "Yet," as the commissar says, "they still stand and are obeyed by the great mass of the American people." Temperance, which is the only ethical aspect of prohibition, has also been held a cardinal virtue, and its obverse, gluttony, a deadly sin. For most people the one has not been perhaps the most difficult of the virtues nor the other the most tempting of vices. But with our new idea of "making it easy to be good" we may end by making it so darned easy to be good that nobody will take any interest in it.

The World's Economic Restoration

IN line with efforts that have been made, from time to time, for many months past, but more impressive than any that has preceded it, is the statement and appeal issued last week by eminent public men and financiers of the United States, Great Britain, and the neutral nations of Europe. It recommends, so far as this country is concerned, > that the Chamber of Commerce of the United States designate representatives of commerce and finance to meet forthwith (the matter being of the greatest urgency) with those of other countries chiefly concerned, which should include the United Kingdom and the British dominions, France, Belgium, Italy, Japan, Germany, Austria, the neutral countries of Europe, the United States and the chief exporting countries of South America, for the purpose of examining the situation briefly set forth below and to recommend upon the basis of authentic information what action in the various countries is advisable among the peoples interested in reviving and maintaining international commerce.

The statement which accompanies this recommendation does more than merely "set forth the situation." It points out the defects of policy which must be removed, as a condition precedent to the possibility of any remedy; and, while not going into details, it lays down the principles which should guide remedial effort when that condition has been fulfilled.

In the very first line the memorandum justly places the disorganization of the monetary medium. The memorandum opens with these words:

> The war has left to conqueror and conquered alike the problem of finding means effectively to arrest and counteract the continuous growth in the volume of outstanding money and of Government obligations and its concomitant, the constant increase of prices.

Unless this process is stopped, "the depreciation of money, it is to be feared, will continue, wiping out the savings of the past and leading to a gradual but persistent spreading of bankruptcy and anarchy in Europe." Before a country can be brought within the scope of any large scheme for the supply of credit, it must "bring its current expenditure within the compass of its receipts from taxation and other regular income." So far as Germany and Austria are concerned, it will be the duty of their conquerors to see to it that this condition shall not be made impossible of fulfillment by the burden of the indemnity. They must be required to do all that the most drastic practicable taxation can effect; but to press them to the point of insolvency, or of a disastrous lowering of the standard of living, would be ruinous to conquerors as well as conquered.

With these necessary conditions supposed to be fulfilled, the memorandum sets forth the general character of the international coöperation through which the supply of the necessary credits may be obtained. It must come chiefly from "those countries where the trade balance and the exchanges are favorable"; it must be furnished only "so far as it is absolutely necessary to restore productive processes," and thus not obviate the necessity of those efforts and sacrifices on the part of the people of the borrowing country which are essential to the restoration of equilibrium; so far as possible, the assistance should leave "national and international trade free from the restrictive control of governments"; the loans offered to the public should be on such terms as to "attract the real savings of the individual, otherwise inflation [in the lending country] would be increased"; and the borrowing country must give such preferred standing, and such guarantees, to the loans as will provide the best available security.

In all this, there is nothing novel; but the circumstance that it accords with the views previously expressed by so many leading financiers and publicists does not detract from its value. The importance of the proposal arises, indeed, from the fact that, backed by the weight of its signers, and coming at a time when all the world is ready to recognize the urgency of the need, it is to be hoped that the appeal will result in accomplishing at last that concerted action which individual exhortations to the same effect have failed to bring about. By far the largest share in the great work of financial and industrial restoration of Europe must fall upon the United States, and the one thing needful is that a plan shall be matured which will draw out for the purpose the enormous, the incomparable, resources of our country. That this should be done by voluntary investment, and not by governmental benevolence, is essential to sound progress; and in order to draw out that investment, it is necessary that a plan for establishing credits upon a solid basis, and directing the credits to the right ends, shall be formulated.

While it is with the restoration of normal conditions in Europe that the memorandum is concerned, it would be well for us to take to ourselves one very important part of its message. "The continuous growth of outstanding money and of Government obligations, and its concomitant, the constant increase of prices," is a phenomenon which has been just as manifest in this country as in Europe. It is a thousand pities that, six months ago, when the Government first turned its attention to the general question of high prices—or "high cost of living"—it directed public interest to matters which, in this respect, are of quite negligible magnitude, instead of clearly recognizing the dominant part which expansion of the monetary medium—both by bank credits and by the actual issue of circulating notes—has played in the raising of the price-level. If "profiteering," and hoarding by speculators, have been anything more than mere natural accompaniments of a rise of prices which would have taken place just the same in their absence, they have at most been factors of utterly insignificant importance. Slack production has, of course, contributed a large share, but even that has been a minor cause in comparison with the expansion of the monetary medium.

One reason for the failure to appreciate the truth of this matter has been the extremely unusual relation between the state of the currency in our own country and the value of gold. In ordinary times, any expansion in the volume of the monetary medium in our country, beyond the increase in the volume of its productive activity, would tend to drive gold out of the country, and this would check or prevent the rise of prices that the expansion would otherwise produce. There might be a considerable temporary disturbance, but the level of prices would not be permanently raised, except to the extent that the entire level of prices in the gold-standard world was raised, which would be no great matter. But in these times we are ourselves the only one of the great commercial nations of the world that maintains the gold standard; no common level of gold prices is maintained between the United States and England or France, because prices in England and France are not gold prices. It is upon our own domestic policy—not exclusively, but almost exclusively—that the purchasing power of the dollar depends. If we flood the country with dollars, we raise the level of prices, and there is in our relations with foreign countries little to counteract the effect. The policy of restriction of credits upon which the Federal Reserve Board recently entered is usually thought of as merely a means of checking speculation; but to the public its effect upon the general level of commodity-prices is of incomparably greater importance. If this were generally recognized, more vigorous prosecution of that policy—a policy of contraction, to be sure, which is always fraught with trouble and has unavoidable drawbacks—would be demanded by public opinion.

The New Policy Toward Russia

A CERTAIN brilliant and resourceful, if not entirely practical, professor at one of our Eastern universities was about to close his house for the summer. Warned by his wife to safeguard against mice some cases of personal effects stored in the attic, he took somewhat original measures which he described to his friends naïvely and with great satisfaction "I purchased several pounds of cheese, cut it into small pieces, and spread it over the floor. Of course no intelligent and self-respecting mouse will attack the cases in preference to this dainty food." Similar considerations seem to have actuated Mr. Lloyd George in the formulation of the new Russian policy that has just been announced by the Supreme Council at Paris. It remains to be seen whether as a result the Bolsheviki will be dissuaded from continuing their campaign against Persia, Afghanistan, and India, the menace of which is uppermost in British minds to-day.

The announcement is typically Lloyd-Georgian, and is primarily intended to meet domestic political conditions in England. No one knows better than the Welshman the incongruity of proposing to deal through the Russian Coöperatives and at the same time to maintain the attitude of uncompromising hostility to the Bolshevik power. But by proclaiming both these policies at the same time, he hopes to mollify the radical labor element with a promise of lifting the blockade, and reassure the more stable elements that realize the militant danger of Bolshevism in arms.

The lifting of the blockade was, however, well-nigh unavoidable. As we pointed out two weeks ago, the blockade of Soviet Russia had a reasonable basis only as auxiliary to a general support of the loyal and patriotic forces in Russia in their struggle to overthrow the Bolshevik tyranny. Such aid was never given in season or in adequate measure, and the national movements collapsed. Now, to be sure, the Bolsheviki are at war with the civilized governments of the world. Some of the methods by which they carry on this warfare are clearly set forth in an article in our present issue. Besides this, the Bolsheviki have in the field a large army which presents a definite military threat to Europe. A continuance of the blockade would be morally justifiable; the question is whether it is calculated to attain the desired end.

The blockade never starved the women and children of Russia. Starvation in the cities of Russia was due to the incompetence, graft, and crazy economic experiments of the Bolsheviki themselves, as Mr. Hoover, with his customary clearness and economic insight, has shown. Why this is so is evident. The peasants in the country have food, but not for the cities. The Bolsheviki, having told the peasants to seize all the land, proceeded to socialize it and proposed to take for the state all food-stocks that exceeded thirty pounds per month per capita. Then they tried to buy the grain with worthless paper money. They had no manufactured goods to exchange for it, since they had destroyed industrial production. So they turned to forced requisitions, which Red Guards carried out with ruthless brutality. But even when they procured food in these raids, it could not be brought to the cities in adequate quantities, for the transportation systems had broken down and they were incompetent to put them in order. Turn over the management of the railroads entering New York to a committee of soap-box orators and I. W. W., and see what would happen to our food supply.

The lifting of the blockade will not save the people of Russia from starving, but, as Mr. Hoover wisely observes, it will expose to all the world the failure of the Bolshevik theory and practice. "The greatest blow they can receive," he says, "is to have such an exposure of the complete foolishness of their industrial system to their people. Moreover, a lifting of the blockade will allow the real truth of the horror of Bolshevik rule to come out of Russia." The blockade has furnished most potent propaganda material to the Bolsheviki and their sympathizers, for they have been wont to allege that but for this their communistic experiments would have succeeded.

In its announcement of the lifting of the blockade, the Supreme Council displays neither cleverness nor wisdom. Among the Bolsheviki it can not but cause contemptuous amusement. It proposes to give import facilities to the Russian Coöperative organizations while maintaining its previous policies toward the Soviet Government! Do the Allied statesmen take the Bolshevik leaders for children when they propose thus openly a measure avowedly directed toward undermining them at home? Do they think for a moment that Lenin and Trotsky would permit this trading to take place independently of their control or fail to turn it to their own political advantage? If so, they utterly misunderstand the internal conditions in Russia and underestimate the shrewdness of the Commissars—who, incidentally, have outplayed them at almost every point.

The Coöperative referred to in the announcement is of course the Central Union of Consumers' Coöperatives, whose existence under the Soviet régime was full of vicissitudes. These Coöperatives flourished exceedingly during the war, when prices of their stocks mounted skyward and private means of distribution fell down. Because of its large and widespread membership, the Bolsheviki did not dare lay hands on the Coöperative system at first, but after they had consolidated their power they undertook to legislate it out of existence by nationalizing all domestic trade. As usual their crazy experiment failed, and they had to fall back upon the Coöperatives. This time, however, they seized the Moscow Narodny Bank, the bank of the Coöperatives, and made it a branch of their State Bank, and proceeded to issue decrees concerning membership and management of the Coöperatives. The country units have managed to retain some slight vestige of their former independence, but the Coöperatives of the cities lost all freedom of action. The Coöperatives of each province are largely under the control of the provincial Commissars.

To trade with the Coöperatives today, as proposed in the announcement of the Supreme Council, is to deal with the Soviet Government. In any case, goods can only be transported by the Bolsheviki on their railroads, and in practice it will be the Soviet that will buy goods and then trade them to the peasants in return for food for the cities. It is the Soviet alone that can deliver gold or raw materials for export. Possibly the fact that these goods will have been stolen or confiscated from private owners may seem like an unimportant technicality to the covetous foreigner. The gold reserve of Rumania, amounting to $125,000,000, was removed to Moscow for safekeeping when the Germans occupied Bucharest, and besides this the Bolsheviki have in their possession comparatively little, consisting of their plunder from banks and individuals. If this gold is accepted by foreign merchants, a serious international question will be raised, to say nothing of the fact that it means recognition of the Bolshevik Government.

It may well happen that in spite of the temporary political and material service that the lifting of the blockade may render to the Soviet Government, its deeper effect will be to strengthen the forces in Russia that are making for its overthrow from within. Certainly the opening up of Russia to the outside world must in a large measure put an end to the horrible methods of terror by which that Government has maintained its savage rule, and once this terror is relaxed, there will be an overwhelming demand for deliverance from its authors.

Finally it must be borne in mind that the military menace of the Red armies is still with us. A peace with the Bolsheviki is for them but a breathing space in which to carry on their propaganda the more intensively. For them to stand still or compromise is to be lost. To counter their propaganda, we are as children, with our deportations and anti-radical legislation; they can give us big odds and win with ease. Only the hard facts of experience will open the eyes of their dupes. Just now the gravest danger is that a military struggle against them may be translated into a war against Russia, uniting all the Russian national elements and forces against the world.

If such a climax should crown the past two years of blunders in policy, then will Allied diplomacy indeed be bankrupt. To avert such a catastrophe a positive, unequivocal policy must be stated. It must be made clear to the Russian people that while the Allied and Associated nations are uncompromising enemies of Bolshevism, they will welcome every opportunity to aid Russia materially; that they contemplate no policy that means its dismemberment; and that they look forward to hearty coöperation with the Russian nation when it shall have thrown off the incubus of the Bolshevist despotism.

Admiral Sims's Memorandum

A "MEMO" is the simplest and most informal type of military letter. It is usually informational and needs no answer. Admiral Sims's "Memo" on "Certain Naval Lessons of the Great War" occupies five columns of print, every word of which is of import to every American. It is the duty of Congress to force the most explicit answers to the questions raised in this most important document. Although Admiral Sims reveals the fact that he was constantly hampered in his work as high naval commander abroad, inadequately supported, disregarded, unfairly distrusted, there is no trace of personal resentment in his indictment of our naval administration. He writes with dignity, detachment, and authority. Expressions of opinion are as few as they are weighty. The emphasis is on facts.

Late in March, 1917, with war not yet declared but certain, Admiral Sims was sent to England incognito with a single aide. In lieu of the customary written orders, he received instructions which are described by him as follows:

> Brief orders were delivered to me verbally in Washington. No formal instructions or statement of the Navy Department's plans or policy were received at that time, though I received the following explicit admonition:
> "Don't let the British pull the wool over your eyes. It is none of our business pulling their chestnuts out of the fire. We would as soon fight the British as the Germans."

On arriving in England, Admiral Sims found that the submarines were in a way to starve out England inside the year. Accordingly he recommended an immediate concentration of all available fighting forces in the real theatre of the naval war. The Navy Department promised four destroyers. Admiral Sims appealed to Ambassador Page, and the number was raised to sixteen. In April, 1917, the British Admiralty requested that the American fighting fleet should guard the English Channel. Transmitted to Washington by Admiral Sims, the request never received the courtesy of a reply. Meanwhile our battle fleet, though ready for action, was performing no military service of any sort. In July, 1917, Admiral Sims recommended that four coal-burning battleships should be assigned to the British great fleet. This modest request was honored only in November, after Admiral Benson had verified in England the information he had possessed for many months through Admiral Sims. Soon after his arrival Admiral Sims requested that all available tugs be sent over. They were wanted to salvage ships which the submarines had crippled without sinking. None were sent, though at the time dozens of Navy tugs were tied up idly at the wharves of Norfolk, Philadelphia, Brooklyn, Newport, and Boston.

From this state of things two inferences are to be drawn. First, that the Department grudged a whole-hearted and effective aid in the war, adhering still to the hope of "peace without victory;" next, that there was no strategic plan at Washington, but merely a welter of smaller purposes. For three years of world-wide warfare, and with constant dangerous friction with Germany, President Wilson and his war lords held to the theory that our national policy was to set a good example to the world by neglecting our obvious military interests. The result was that in the hurry of belated preparation, two lives were lost where one would have sufficed, two men were wounded where one would have sufficed, and more than two dollars were spent where one would have sufficed. With the ultimate value to humanity of a policy not without its own idealism history must some day reckon. Its immediate and practical result may be simply expressed in the form of a commercial statement:

> WILSON, BAKER & DANIELS, LTD.
> In Ac. with the American People.
> Credit:—By any moral good accomplished by neglecting a reasonable military preparedness in 1915-16.
> Debit:—To 35,000 Americans killed unnecessarily.
> To 160,000 Americans wounded unnecessarily.
> To $10,000,000,000 spent unnecessarily.

However this account be balanced, the Navy merely suffered with the rest. Its case was not special. Admiral Sims in noting the vacillation and absence of naval counsels at Washington is not indulging in retrospective recriminations, nor are we. He is pointing a solemn lesson for future use.

So far Admiral Sims's letter merely gives a new emphasis to familiar facts. There is another and more startling side to his revelations which no loyal American can consider without a sense of shame. It appears that having appointed him to high command, the powers-that-be regretted their action. Not daring to take the straightforward course of relieving him, they attempted to make his position impossible and force him out. In so doing they imperilled the efficiency of our naval effort abroad. Sustained by a high sense of duty, he achieved the impossible—stuck to his post, and, under heavy disadvantages, did his work. This is our allegation, not his, but the facts are plainly to be read between the lines. Let us consider the bare facts.

In April, 1917, Admiral Sims was ordered abroad with a staff of one aide. Repeated requests for a suitable administrative staff were refused on the ground that no officers were available. Meanwhile competent and willing officers were on fifty idle ships. In July, now Commander in Chief for the European campaign, and his aide exhausted, he was allotted three officers. Such a staff the young lieutenants commanding at sub-bases like Block Island, New Bedford, and Nantucket were allowed for their flotillas of half a dozen patrol boats. In vain Admiral Sims requested the staff customarily allowed to the commander of a squadron of destroyers. Facing administrative disaster, he finally adopted the desperate but only expedient of recruiting his staff by depleting his line. Eventually he thus combed out of his ships two hundred officers with a thousand enlisted men and civilians. Meanwhile his destroyers and scout patrol boats sailed their arduous stations short-handed. To make matters more difficult, he was denied the usual right of enlisting competent Americans abroad and of awarding temporary promotion to his own officers. As an additional humiliation, he was not permitted to select his personal aides. Among the British and in his own command his authority was by so much diminished.

From these deplorable but necessary exposures the accomplishment of the professional Navy emerges in a brighter light. In spite of certain incompetence and probable malice at Washington, it splendidly did its task. That so perilous and discreditable a chapter should not be repeated is Admiral Sims's chief concern. In fixing the responsibility where it belongs, between Secretary Daniels and Admiral Benson, Admiral Sims has deserved well of the Navy and the Republic. Now let the complete correspondence between Admiral Sims and his superiors be published, and let Congress fearlessly probe the whole matter to the bottom.

The Father of Victory

We sincerely regret that M. Clemenceau's exit from the political stage had its impressiveness marred by a final discomfiture to which he exposed himself by drawing a wrong conclusion from his popularity. The unexampled success which crowned his tenure of office had silenced, for the time being, his many political opponents among Roman Catholics and Radicals. The people's unanimous recognition of his great service to the country was no guarantee of as complete a consensus on his eligibility for the Presidency. Different capacities from those which made him an eminent leader in the onset towards victory are needed for the representative figure at the highest post of honor. Neither his temperament nor the power which his popularity secures him would have let him be satisfied with the mere glory of that dignity. Fear of his influence, greater than tradition has sanctioned, on the Government's conduct of affairs dictated to the majority of Senators and Deputies their adverse vote. The painful dilemma was not of their choosing. We should do them an injustice by believing their motive to have been personal enmity. They had to decide between honoring the man and serving the country, as in their eyes the two were irreconcilable. And M. Clemenceau will have been the first to admit that, such being their opinion, they chose the better of the two.

For in his long, eventful life the one motive which actuated his every word and act was France and the glory of France.. In a political atmosphere replete with self-seeking intrigue, he moved invulnerable, thanks to a proverbial integrity. "What is this talk," he said one day, "about my having overthrown so many Governments? It was always the same Government — with only different names." The paradox gives a characteristic description of the man. The Cabinets he ousted from power were all one to him in that they ruled to the detriment of France. Personal consideraions had no weight with him. Old friends lost his friendship if France was no longer served by them in the way he considered best for her. It was on M. Clemenceau's recommendation that M. Freycinet, in 1886, fixed his choice on General Boulanger for Minister of War in his Cabinet. But it was Clemenceau, again, who two years later, when the General aspired to a dictatorship, was foremost among those who opposed him, and after the sensational scene in the Chamber, in which Boulanger had called Premier Floquet "a damned liar and an impudent pedant," Clemenceau, as Floquet's witness, took his challenge to the insulter. In the same way he challenged, on behalf of France, the strong and the unscrupulous who loved her less than themselves. A disturber of peace, people called him. "Why can you not let the country rest?" he was asked by an interruption in the Chamber. "Because there is no rest for free nations," he retorted. "Rest is good for monarchies. The nation is a living organism, and life knows no rest."

His own life has been a vivid illustration of that maxim. And it seemed as if, with the increase of his years, his energy grew in intensity. The youthful élan which inspired his indomitable nature rekindled the fire of enthusiasm in whose steeling flames the country has always recovered strength to overcome its vicissitudes. By grace of that spirit in him he had become the savior of his country. It owes him a debt of gratitude too great to be adequately expressed by its conferring on him even the highest dignity that a Frenchman can win. Ambition, "that last infirmity of noble mind," is in this man of impetuous energy a symptom only of his restlessness, which, in his own words, is life itself. Until his dying hour, to live, with him, will be to aspire. But the nation knows better than he that the highest he could aspire to is already his. History will add many more names to the list of Presidents of the French Republic, but one Frenchman only will be remembered in her record as the Father of Victory.

President Butler on the Classics

THE paragraphs of President Butler's Annual Report which deal with classical studies in Columbia University are interesting rather for certain suggestions which they convey than for their statement of facts. We are all aware, of course, that the proportion of students taking Latin and Greek under a purely elective régime is comparatively small. Our chief concern lies not with the fact, but with the underlying reason. Dr. Parkin, in discussing the Rhodes Scholarships, has pointed out that the surprisingly high ratio of failures on the part of American students to pass the Oxford University entrance tests holds good for the more modern subjects as well as for the classical languages. "May it not be true," Dr. Butler asks, "that the American student resents the demand for the close and long-continued application necessary to an accurate knowledge of any difficult subject?"

In the matter of the classics, it is a fair question how far the responsibility for numerical loss rests primarily with the student. In a country town in the Middle West, a few years ago, the study of Latin was saved, against an iconoclastic superintendent, by the insistent demand of boys and girls determined to study it. A few years ago a State Normal College west of the Alleghenies had a strong department of Greek, wholly on the elective basis, and the Greek play which it presented each year was one of the most distinguished events of the college calendar. The department died, not from loss of interest, but by peremptory edict of a new President who, during the summer vacation, before he had ever met the college in session, countermanded the order for Greek text-books and announced that the study would be dropped, as "unpractical." On the other hand, from within a few miles of Columbia University comes the report that a class in Greek has been organized in a New Jersey high school, at the urgent request of students desiring to enroll. Opposition to classical study in the public schools comes far more from educational theorists than from pupils, or parents, in search of the "practical."

Fought by "modernists" on every hand, and a requirement for graduation almost nowhere, Latin still has a very strong hold in the high schools in all parts of the country. If a fair proportion of students who have carried it successfully through the usual four preparatory years were to continue it in college, there would be no talk of the decadence of Latin. In view of this fact, it may be questioned whether any great share of the loss that occurs just at the point of entrance to college is due, as President Butler suggests, to an aversion of the American student to "the close and long-continued application necessary to an accurate knowledge of any difficult subject." Something must be granted to this influence, no doubt, nor can an unrestricted elective system ever free itself from the charge of encouraging such an aversion. But there are other influences at work which tend to deprive classical studies of an even chance in the mind of a freshman making up his schedule. Thus the faculty representatives of the newer subjects, as Dr. Butler says, often insist on programmes which make it difficult for the student to take an extended course in classical studies.

President Butler makes it evident that his own desire is for the building up and continued maintenance of strong departments of Greek and Latin in Columbia. Towards that end he suggests an increased striving on the part of teachers for a readier power of sight translation; the bringing of the student more closely into touch with ancient ideas and ideals; political, moral, and social relationships; and the development of courses having to do with Greek and Roman customs, and Greek and Roman art, architecture, etc. Friends of broad educational ideals will hope that this declaration of interest will be followed by a duly liberal financial policy in providing the material equipment required to carry out, with the fullest degree of success, the improvements in method suggested in this report.

Dr. Butler quotes and accepts Gilbert Murray's statement that the study of the present alone isolates, while the study of far distant times, if they be really great, sets the student free. In every specialist walk of life, there are men to-day of the highest competence and reputation who do not hesitate to assert that their calling is suffering from the failure of its devotees to broaden their mental vision, and their range of human interest, by studies of this kind. "I am going to be a scientist, and therefore will not elect any studies in the classical departments," is a very general attitude of mind among incoming freshmen to-day. "My life as a scientist will necessarily tend to narrow my range of interests unduly, and therefore I will guard against the danger in advance by including a fair amount of the study of the great civilizations of the past in my course," would represent a far more promising state of mind.

THE REVIEW
A weekly journal of political and general discussion
Published by
THE NATIONAL WEEKLY CORPORATION
140 Nassau Street, New York
FABIAN FRANKLIN, President
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER, Treasurer

RODMAN GILDER, Business Manager

Subscription price, five dollars a year in advance. Fifteen cents a copy. Foreign postage, one dollar extra; Canadian postage, fifty cents extra. Foreign subscriptions may be sent to Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons, Ltd., 24, Bedford St., Strand, London, W. C. 2, England.
Copyright, 1920, in the United States of America
Editors
FABIAN FRANKLIN
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER

Moscow's Campaign of Poison

A FEW months ago the Executive Committee of the Bolshevik Government in Moscow sent to its agents everywhere abroad a confidential circular of which the following is a translation:

GENERAL INSTRUCTIONS

The revolutionary work of the Communist Party.

The work of Bolshevist organizations in foreign countries is regulated as follows:

1. In the domain of international relations.

(a) Assist all chauvinistic measures and foster all international discords.

(b) Stir up agitation that may serve to bring on industrial conflict.

(c) Try to assassinate the representatives of foreign countries.

(Thanks to these methods interior discords and coups d'état will occur, such agitation working to the advantage of the Social Democratic party.)

2. In the domain of internal politics.

(a) Compromise by every possible means the influential men of the country; attack people in office; stir up anti-governmental agitation.

(b) Instigate general and particular strikes; injure machinery and boilers in factories; spread propaganda literature.

(Thanks to these methods destruction of governments and the seizure of power will be facilitated.)

3. In the economic sphere.

(a) Induce and sustain railroad strikes; destroy bridges and tracks; do everything possible to disorganize transport.

(b) Interfere with and prevent if possible the transport of food supplies into the cities; provoke financial troubles; flood the markets with counterfeit banknotes; appoint everywhere special committees for this work.

(In this way total economic disorganization will bring its inevitable catastrophe and the resulting revolution against the government will have the sympathy of the masses.)

4. In the military sphere.

(a) Carry on intensive propaganda among the troops. Cause misunderstandings between officers and soldiers. Incite the soldiers to assassination of the higher officers.

(b) Blow up arsenals, bridges, tracks, powder-magazines. Prevent the delivery of supplies of raw material to factories and mills.

(Thus the complete destruction of the army will be accomplished and the soldiers will adopt the programme of the social democratic workers.)

A later circular issued as Campaign Order No. 4, again for secret distribution in foreign countries, defines the methods to be pursued among the agricultural classes. "It is necessary to find out everything possible about the living conditions of the farmers; it is urgently necessary to know all those who are in debt or find difficult the payment of their rent. It is important to assist them, discreetly and prudently, and at the same time to explain to them that only revolution will put them on their feet. In this work, as in all others, it is necessary to work principally on the feelings of the women, and beyond this conversations should be carried on principally with young people, who are more susceptible to revolutionary influences."

These are merely samples of the secret orders that flow out from the poison spring in Moscow. It takes no very careful study of them to see that they represent no "great constructive force," as is claimed by our American parlor bolshevists. It is clear that their authors care nothing for the interests of the proletariat, as is urged by certain sentimental American paper-radicals and by the still undeported representative of Lenin in New York. Ideas such as these orders contain are brutal and brutalizing; they are false and propagate falsehood; they point to suffering and misery as an end to be sought. They are purely destructive in intent and give not even a hint of a constructive future. Tear down; destroy; create economic chaos; cause famine and cold; kill your fellow men—and to what end? To bring about revolution! But surely modern man has sufficient mental and moral stature to realize that revolution is not an end to be desired; that it is endurable only as a last resort to secure a great gain to civilization which is not otherwise obtainable. The danger of these circulars is that they are not intended to fall into the hands of those who have attained well-balanced mental and moral growth. They are not intended to educate the masses or to be read by the intellectual, but to instruct the dark and secret agents of destruction, all of them queerly abnormal people who have their prototypes in Russia—Lenin, a great force, an idealist who can not understand that ideals can be realized only through imperfect human agents and that realization before humanity is perfect must destroy their original purity, a man with a vision that reality has dimmed and necessity brutalized; Chicherin, a man of the upper classes, who has twice been confined in an insane asylum, who is incapable of thinking straight; Trotsky, intellectually powerful along the narrow path of his enthusiasm, morally a monster; Zinoviev, a man of little mental and no moral capacity, but with an enthusiasm that borders on madness and that makes his commonplace words flame; and the others, inevitably most numerous, who may better be nameless, who are of varying capacity and are Bolsheviks for sordid hope of plunder or of power. Into the hands of men similar to these the instructions are carried by highly paid agents, and the instructions are passed on to the rank and file, not as they came, but in the form of specific orders to cause a strike here, to destroy there a factory, or to assassinate a man of influence and integrity. There are few crimes so dastardly that an excuse for them can not be found in some generally-worded instruction, but the character of the specific deed is usually a reflection of the personality of the agent who issues the final order.

These circulars, as has been noted above, are not in any sense propaganda. They are orders, issued to chosen individuals and not intended to be seen by others; but such orders can not be carried out in a country where the ground has not been prepared by propaganda. Even in Russia itself, where the vast proportion of the population shivers under the rule of an autocratic and bloodthirsty minority, the Bolshevist régime could not retain power if it admitted the truth. If it lies at home, why should it be truthful abroad? On November 8, Zinoviev said in a speech in Petrograd, "The White Army was followed by an American mission which pretended to feed our children in Gatchina, but the first thing it did was to rob the orphan asylum. When Gatchina was captured a Jewish pogrom took place and the population received only a few herrings." This is a good example of Bolshevist defensive propaganda within the borders of Russia. The truth was that there was no pogrom in Gatchina and that the American Relief Administration undertook immediately, and continued until the retreat of the White Army, the daily feeding of three thousand starved children. In Russia the truth can be and is suppressed. Along the borders of Russia it can be and is partially suppressed, but this suppression becomes more difficult as operations must be carried on further from the centre. Hence, the further propaganda is carried from Moscow the more subtle it must become to be effective. Half truths and cleverly manipulated whole truths must be substituted for lies, propaganda must be attuned to the instincts, sentiments and desires of those to whom it is addressed, with the purpose of preparing as large a field as possible in which the seed of the definite orders may flourish and bear its red fruit. Propaganda in different countries, therefore, varies widely in method and arguments employed; whereas the instructions vary almost not at all.

Twice, so far, this subtly prepared propaganda has made possible the carrying out of the orders. In Hungary, which is essentially a conservative country, Bolshevist propaganda was confined almost entirely to Budapest, because only in that city was there a nucleus of industrial workers —always more accessible to any form of propaganda because concentrated —and because the capital was the heart of the country. Supplies were short and therefore the opening of an avenue to "the limitless food stocks of Russia" was harped on continuously. The Karolyi Government made just enough half-hearted reforms in land tenure and in the education of workingmen to a knowledge of their due and of their potential power, to arouse the instincts of acquisition without recompense—in plain English, "plunder"—but it was too weak to carry its reforms through to their logical conclusion. A peasant one day appeared at the ticket window of a local station and said to the ticket agent, the only visible government official, "I have come for my share." "Your share of what?" the agent demanded. "My share of the money," the peasant answered. "Is not Hungary now a republic and in a republic do not all share alike?" The communists said to this man and others like him, "If you put us in power this belief of yours will come true. We will divide among you the property of the rich." But, in spite of ignorance and hunger, the Bolsheviks could never have gained the power in Hungary had they not appealed to the strongest passion of all, the instinct of nationalism, which is really the negation of all Bolshevist principles. When bordering states encroached more and more on the boundaries defined by the terms of the armistice, and when it was clear that Karolyi could not get the expected support from the Allies, the Bolsheviks seized the Government as champions of nationalism. Bela Kun was tolerated because he promised to drive out the invaders. When he failed in this and began to preach communist doctrines, the people drove him out. This Hungarian episode is an interesting example of Bolshevist propaganda, because it succeeded by an appeal to local passions through promises that were wholly false and based on principles wholly contrary to the dogmas of communism. It proves that the means are never considered so long as they seem to make possible the carrying out of the orders.

In Bavaria, as in Hungary, Bolshevist propaganda made possible the temporary establishment of a communist Government. In Munich, as in Budapest, war-weariness and hunger prepared the ground. In Bavaria propaganda pointed to the insincerity and the failures of the German Social-Democratic Government. It played on the fact that, although the war was over, living conditions were growing worse instead of better, and insinuated that the Entente intended treacherously to destroy Germany through starvation, since it had been unable to obtain a real military decision. It again appealed to narrowly nationalistic feelings, already irritated by the obviously centralizing tendencies of Weimar, by pointing out the danger of a bitter military domination of Bavaria by Prussia, by saying that communism would mean the complete severance of Bavaria from the German realm and consequent freedom from the State's share of the German war debt. Outside of the cities no one was convinced by these arguments, and Bavaria, being more generally intelligent than Hungary and far more accessible to information from outside, tolerated its Bolshevist Government for only a few days.

In Switzerland radical propaganda has two distinct phases: that actually directed against the Federation and that sent into Switzerland or manufactured in Switzerland for purposes of foreign distribution. Except in Basel and Zurich, industrial centres, the extreme Socialist following is small and, with the restoration of something approaching normal economic conditions, it will still further decrease, unless communism should gain temporary sway in surrounding countries. The increase of the number of seats gained by the Socialists in the recent elections is not an indication of party growth but is the natural result of a change in the election laws. The Socialist party itself defeated by an overwhelming popular vote the proposal to join the Third, or Moscow, International. Among the Swiss themselves propaganda cleverly accentuates every misunderstanding between federal and cantonal authority; it aims at creating jealousies between the French, German, and Italian speaking populations of the various cantons; it suggests to the townspeople that the farmers and dairymen are withholding food, and to the countryfolk that the towns are trying to force the sale of foodstuffs at prices ruinous to the producers. All this has had little effect, however, and when orders were issued to turn the Basel strikes into an insurrection, failure was immediate and complete. Switzerland has, on the other hand, been less successful in its endeavor to prevent the country from becoming a centre for the distribution of propaganda. In spite of drastic laws and thorough inspection at the frontiers, quantities of literature are brought in, and quantities, printed in Switzerland, are sent out into France and Italy. It is also only fair to Switzerland to admit that much literature with the imprint of Basel or Berne was actually printed in Germany. (This was recently proved in the case of a pamphlet intended to create disturbances in Alsace.)

A keener edge is put on propaganda in France by references to Germany intended to incite nationalistic feelings or to irritate by comparisons. For example, this from another order that was probably actually prepared in Germany: "It is essential to make clear to our comrades, especially to those who have had only a little instruction, that the victory of the Entente, that is, the victory of imperialism and capitalism, places the Latin worker in a position inferior to the German." It is fair to say, however, that although this sort of thing may appeal to some few people in France—and the recent elections seem to emphasize the narrowness of the appeal—the country as a whole is too well aware of the continuing German danger, too conscious that it is the negation of those principles for which France has suffered so bitterly, to be seriously affected now. Only if France should lose the cordial support of England and America, might it be willing to experiment with another revolution.

Bolshevist propaganda in Germany is exceedingly difficult to estimate. How much of this propaganda, how many of the secret orders come from Russia, and what proportion originates in the German communist party? It seems clear that the German Reds are less formally under orders from Moscow than are the Reds of the smaller adjoining countries, also that their association is more intimate. It is the expressed opinion of Moscow that Germany, in securing a Socialist Government, has progressed further than other countries, and that the benefits resulting from this modified Socialism will make the people demand more and more. Lenin knows, also, that the Germans consider themselves the "original Socialists" and that obvious interference from outside would offend their pride of proprietorship of the idea. He can, therefore, only point out that it is the Independent Socialists who hold fast to the doctrines of Marx in their pristine purity. This party was and is the hope of the Bolsheviks. Under the leadership of Hugo Haase, it proved impossible to lure the Independents as a party to the extreme left. After Haase was killed, the extremists gained control, and during its recent convention the Independent Socialist party went over bag and baggage to the communists. This action establishes in Germany a strong, recognized Bolshevist bloc, a party-grouping pledged to the Third International and having the closest affiliation with Moscow, a group believing in direct action and in the dictatorship of the proletariat on the Russian model.

The probable effect on Germany need not be discussed here except to note that the political situation becomes more explosive and that at the same time the more conservative, reconstructive parties have exchanged for a hidden and secretive foe, one who must in the future fight in the open. There is probably no formal or binding understanding between the Berlin and the Moscow Governments. When the German Government wishes to communicate with the Soviet it does so through a group of former German prisoners converted to Bolshevism and now living in Moscow. These men are a convenient medium because they have no recognized diplomatic standing and can be repudiated if need arises; but they are sufficiently official to satisfy the Soviet. Through them Lenin corresponds with the German Government, but how far that Government consciously plays into his hands and how far it is his dupe is an open question. Germany is obviously trying to steer a middle course that will leave it the friend of Russia, whatever the outcome of the Russian internal struggle. When a government is as weak as is the present German Government, a middle course is generally not actually this but rather an erratic veering from one side to the other of the stream. So the German ship of state sails in meaningless zigzags because there is no competent helmsman. Its captains —for they are many and all inefficient —publicly refused to comply with the Entente request for a blockade of Soviet Russia. At the same time they supported the formation of an Army in Courland to attack Soviet Russia and then permitted that army—stated, of course, to be insubordinate —to attack the Letts at a moment when the attack necessitated the withdrawal of Esthonian forces from the anti-Bolshevist front of Yudenitch, just when the situation was critical for the Soviet. German officers in the Ukraine assisted Petlura to attack the rear of Denikin just as Denikin was driving the Bolsheviks back on Moscow. There are two really strong groups in Germany, the reactionaries and the communists. On international policy they are at opposite poles, but so far as Russia is concerned it is often expedient for them to unite. The communists want to aid the Soviet on principle; the reactionaries are willing to aid the Soviet whenever there seems a chance that forces of law, order, and democracy, favorable to the Entente, may definitely secure peace and stability for the country. Between these two forces the German Government is helpless and bewildered. In propaganda, also, the two extremes coöperate. The communists freely receive, manufacture, and distribute their propaganda in Germany, where the reactionaries feel themselves strong enough to combat it; and the reactionaries assist the communists in their distribution of propaganda and secret orders abroad, because it is in the interest of all Germans to cause industrial unrest in foreign countries.

In the United States, as well as in Europe, this propaganda is active.

Even the orders of the Soviet reach our radical chiefs and are interpreted as seems expedient at the moment. Last summer a circular was issued giving a detailed programme of disorders in this country. A steel strike was to take place in October; this was to be followed by a coal strike in November and a sudden railroad strike in December. The circular stated frankly that this series of strikes would cause such suffering and consequent disorders that by February the country would be ripe for insurrection against a "capitalist government" unable to prevent such deplorable conditions. The circular was not dictated by Moscow, because the Russians are willing to leave details to their lieutenants, but it might well have been, because it contained nothing whatever beyond the purely destructive philosophy of the Soviet. In the way of Bolshevist propaganda the United States suffers from an influx of Russian ideas sedulously propagated by German agents. Our pro-Bolsheviks disclaim the accusation of pro-Germanism, but how many of them can be found who did not hinder recruiting, who did not condone—or deny, as being more convenient—the German atrocities in Belgium? Vorwaerts, the mouthpiece of the German Government, recently stated that it was important for Germany to destroy competition by creating industrial unrest abroad, "especially in England and the United States." Lenin said a few days ago that the communist system could not at this time be permanently established in a largely agricultural country like Russia, but that its real future lay in the more educated, highly industrial nations of the west. The Soviet admits that it wants peace primarily so as to be able to send its propagandists freely to all parts of the world.

We in America are too prone to sigh with relief when a few Reds are arrested, and perhaps deported, and to think that this is sufficient. A few individuals are of little enough importance in the face of a determined propaganda, carried on with Russian fanaticism and German thoroughness; a propaganda that is insidious, cleverly compounded of truth and lies, fashioned to make its special appeal wherever there is sentimentality or distress. To save itself and to save civilization the American Government must steer a firm course between reaction and capitulation. It must not be a zigzag middle course like that of the German Government, but straight, with the pilot eternally vigilant, with its route carefully charted, with its aim so clearly defined that all the people may approve and support it in every crisis.

The Bolsheviks have one great argument. It is this: "The war has cost the world over two hundred billion dollars. Perhaps five per cent. of this amount has been paid for. The rest of the war was fought on credit. It will take the world, especially the poor people of the world, a hundred years to pay off this enormous debt. This means sorrow, suffering, incessant labor. Bolshevism will wipe all debts from the slate. The world can begin afresh a new, finer life of justice." What wonder that this appeals, that there are Bolshevist agents in all lands who can elaborate these themes! And only the man who thinks on a groundwork of robust intelligence understands that the plan, if carried out, would lead the world back to the times of the cave-dwellers, that with the crash of credit would come also the crash of civilization with all that it has given us of good as well as of bad—the end of education, of art, of literature, of everything that makes life attractive to rich or poor.

I went into a bookshop the other day to get a magazine. It was one of those little highbrow bookshops that have recently sprung up in our cities, the kind that has nothing for the tired business man, that deals only in books with a moral—generally a very bad moral. I asked for the Review. The polished proprietor regretted that he did not keep it. He offered me the New Republic but I told him that I was tired of Bolshevist propaganda. He looked a little disappointed and offered me the World Tomorrow, a journal, as he pointed out, that is working for a Christian world. I took it because I had never heard of it. The first article I read was a defense of Bolshevism—in a journal working for a Christian world!—a defense of a system which prohibits the Bible because the Bible dares to speak of God as a being superior to man. This was a trivial thing but deeply suggestive. We Americans must defend ourselves not only against the blatant propaganda of the yellow press but against the far more insidious propaganda of the highbrow bookshop. Russian fanaticism, German thoroughness, working together, the one actuated by idealism gone stark mad, the other by selfish materialism!

EXAMINER

The Government of India Act

Now that a semblance of peace has superseded the European state of war, the attention of the world is turning towards that part of the globe the control of which was the deeper-lying cause of the conflict. Germany's support of Austria in the Balkans was dictated by the wish to secure for herself a firmly guarded corridor to Constantinople and Asia Minor through which Berlin was to launch its trains for the far-off goal: Bagdad. Once in control of that Balkan route and with Turkey reduced to a vassal state, she saw the way open, via Bagdad, into Persia and India, for German enterprise and political expansion. And while thus stretching one tentacle across Turkey and Persia towards Great Britain's Asiatic possessions, she hoped to lay another on the Netherland East Indies by forcing the kingdom of Holland to become merged in the super-state of Middle-Europe. Friedrich Naumann, in estimating the future area of that economic state, arrived at an extent of about 9.3 million square kilometres, "if we claim all European and Asiatic Turkey and venture to count in, to a, it is true, somewhat arbitrary extent, the overseas possessions of neighboring states which have not yet joined us." Thus, in the last resort, the world war was a struggle between Germany and England for the economic control of India.

The danger, though averted by England's victory, has during its long imminence aggrandized another since long astir within. The intellectual élite of the native population did not withhold its support from the Government, but it reckoned on a fair return for its loyalty in extension of its share in the government of the country. The danger was not in the necessity of complying with that request, but in the unrest which insistence upon it aroused among the totally ignorant and politically immature masses, which echoed with less patience and no comprehension of the difficulties involved in the demands of their political leaders.

The Government of India Act is intended to meet these wishes for home rule. It is not extorted from the Government, as the tendency towards granting the native element political responsibility was manifest before 1914. In the Netherland East Indies, whose native population could not base its claim of self-rule on any deserving rôle played in the war, the Dutch Government has anticipated the British by the introduction of a transitional form of administration. The war has only in so far influenced the legislative procedure as it has accelerated its course.

It would require much space to give a detailed comparison of the different ways in which the British and the Netherland Governments intend to inaugurate a democratic form of colonial administration. The Dutch plan is, obviously, modelled on the parliamentary system at home; the British one has no counterpart in domestic institutions and seems an original attempt to initiate self-rule by setting up a dual form of administration, nicknamed Dyarchy by its opponents.

The Hollanders have created a People's Council (Volksraad), the majority of which is appointed by the Government, the native minority being elected by an extremely limited electorate, the members of the provincial and local councils, who themselves are mostly appointed by the Government. This "Volksraad" is one day to become the legislative power of Indonesia, but in its probation period it is entrusted with only an advisory function. It is consulted on the budget and appropriation bills, on the negotiation of loans, the imposing of military duties, and on all questions on which the Governor-General deems it desirable to hear the Council. The former, in drawing up the provisional budget, is obliged to abide by the Council's advice; it is only the Minister of Colonies and the Parliament at home which, in the last resort, may disregard it.

This primitive frame-work for the construction of a central autonomous government of the future is a copy, on a larger scale, of the provincial and local councils inaugurated in 1903 with a view to turning the provinces and the larger local communities into semi-autonomous organisms. In these, as in the Volksraad, there are appointed and elected members whose function is limited to the control of the budget and appropriations. It is in these local councils, first of all, that the native will be educated to the knowledge of political administration and a sense of his personal responsibility for the conduct of affairs which is involved in his new right to control them.

The Government of India Act, which has recently passed through the two Houses of Parliament, is a much more radical scheme in so far as it gives the native element, at the outset, an active part in the administration. It splits the Government in each province into two sections: on the one hand, the Governor with his official colleagues in executive council, on the other, the Governor with Ministers drawn from the legislative assembly. To the former will be reserved the administration of the heavier duties of the state, such as the maintenance of law and order, and those functions which require a great deal of technical knowledge from the functionaries, such as the administration of universities, industries, harbors, land revenue, forests, irrigation. To the other section will be transferred the remaining duties, such as the control of local bodies, primary education, sanitation, agriculture, excise, roads, and bridges. The Governor will be the link between the two sections of his Government, and has the difficult task devolved on him of seeing to it that the two, while each remains fully responsible within its own sphere, shall collaborate with a common purpose and an harmonious policy. After a ten years' trial, a parliamentary committee will go out to India and advise on the success of the experiment. If its report is favorable, further subjects will be transferred to Ministers. And so the process will go on until full responsible government is established, the official half of the administration disappears, and the transitional system of dualism is superseded by a unified popular administration. The Act further provides for a two-chamber system of legislature at Delhi, and abolishes the maximum of eight, and most of the statutory qualifications, for the Viceroy's executive council, with a view to a larger appointment of Indian members.

The success of these reforms depends largely on the attitude of the native intellectual leaders. On their side, there must be an earnest will and endeavor to coöperate with the European officials in the task of educating their own people to a clear sense of what this incipient measure of autonomy involves. Criticism of the new course, both in Holland and in England, is chiefly based on a disbelief in the necessary support from that side. The masses are ignorant and wholly incapable of realizing that reforms of this nature can not be brought about with the miraculous swiftness of an Arabian Night metamorphosis. Ambitious leaders can acquire an easy popularity by refusing to remind their followers of the necessity of a probation period. In both the Netherland and British Colonies there are extremists who clamor for a speedy and complete surrender of the Government to the Indians.

"Insulinde," a strong organization of radical nationalists in Java, has much in common with the left wing of the British Indian Home Rule

League, which condemned the Chelmsford-Montagu reform scheme before it could even have taken cognizance of its bearings. In the Indian National Congress held in Delhi in December, 1918, where the Extremists were all-powerful, great impatience was displayed at speeches in English, and the tone of the discussions was one of defiance. The moderates, who realize that an immediate assumption of full responsibility of government would lead to chaos, have their own organization in the National Liberal League, a political counterpart of the Javanese "Boedi Oetomo" (Noble Aspiration). But neither group has such a strong hold on the masses as have the extremists of the Home Rule League and Insulinde. Both are always more likely to veer round towards radicalism under pressure from below than the radicals are to be brought to moderation. The British Indian leaders made a move in the direction of the extremists' views when, in reply to Lord Chelmsford's statement that "we have carried the advance right up to the line beyond which our principles forbid us to go," they declared the proposed reforms to be "an irreducible minimum."

The Mohammedan population of British India, organized in the All India Moslem League, had a twofold reason for opposing the scheme. In the first place, they were afraid of Hindu domination after the reforms had been introduced, and, secondly, the "Young" Mohammedan elements saw in opposing them a welcome means of wreaking vengeance on Great Britain for the humiliation of Turkey and the Sultanate. Loyalty to the Caliph thus made them allies of the Hindu Home Rule Leaguers, the very party whose domination they feared. In the Malay Archipelago, with its preponderantly Mohammedan population, the "Sarekat Islam" (Islamic Union) is not withheld by any fear of Hinduism from giving its support, though by no means unqualified support, to the Netherland Government's reform programme. The British Colonial Government, therefore, is faced with a more difficult task, the problem how to educate the people to autonomy being crossed by the no less difficult question how to do this without sharpening religious jealousies. The distinctions of caste are an additional cause of trouble to the Government at Delhi. The Non-Brahmin Community of Southern India feared, as a consequence of the proposed reforms, a reimposition, with all its ancient weight, of the yoke of the Brahmins, whose ambitions are voiced by the Home Rule League.

These are the conflicting forces—race hatred, religious intolerance, caste antagonism—which have to be reconciled by one system of legislative reform. It is only natural that many English at home and in India, realizing that no law, however perfect, could ever successfully cope with that task, are anxiously inquiring whether the continuance of the old bureaucratic system would not have been preferable to this democratic departure, which, if it fails to answer the natives' expectations, will cause more discontent and unrest than the approved administration is responsible for. The riots of Amritsar and Ahmedabad, the culmination of a long campaign of discontent and race hatred, are ominous symptoms of what will happen if disappointed illusions should look towards Soviet Russia for their realization.

However, it would have been wrong policy, unworthy of the British Empire, either to give in to the wildest demands of native demagogues in order to take the wind out of the Bolshevist sails, or to refuse to the Moderates the inch they justly claim from a fear lest the extremists should take an ell. To admit a fear of having one's justice abused is only a confession of weakness. It requires less strength and courage to deny a just demand than, having granted it, to stem any attempt to take undue advantage of the concession. It was not fear, but rather self-reliance, which, in the course of the debate on the second reading, made Mr. Montagu, the father of the Act, tell the House of Commons that "You dare not and ought not to do less than we propose in this Bill."

A. J. Barnouw

Correspondence

What Shall We Do to Be Saved?

To the Editors of The Review:

The present political outlook is certainly not encouraging. Both of the great parties are so deficient in real leadership as to make them appear almost hopeless. All of the bungling of the party in power is met by equal, if not worse, bungling by the opposition.

Even citizens who were ardent supporters of the Democratic party are greatly dissatisfied with its conduct of affairs. It has shown great faults and shortcomings in handling larger matters, and at every point where the administration of affairs touches the individual it has been bungling and stupid beyond belief, and constantly irritating. The policy almost appears to be to make it as hard as possible for the individual to live with his Government.

If one may judge from the talk of the average man, regardless of political affiliations, the country is eagerly and impatiently awaiting the opportunity for a change. But where can we look for improvement? Certainly not to the Republican party, unless some miraculous change shall take place in its leadership, and there is at present no evidence in sight of any tendency in that direction.

Thoughtful citizens are in a great dilemma. What shall we do to be saved?

I have been able to see but one hope, and that is to nominate Herbert Hoover on an Independent ticket. Mr. Hoover, it seems to me, could unite the conscience and intelligence of the country, and could draw enough votes from both parties to be sure of an election; and, if elected, would be free to draw upon the best and most capable elements of both parties for the support of his Administration. Mr. Hoover seems to be the one man in sight who would be likely to give our present problems the sane consideration which they need; he is the one man in the public eye whose every word and act has been thoroughly sane; who commands the respect and admiration of the entire world, and who has to his credit what is perhaps the greatest piece of administrative work in history.

I was an ardent supporter of Mr. Wilson in his first campaign, and should have voted for Hughes at the last election, had his conduct during the campaign permitted it. As it was, I refrained from voting, for the first time in my life in a Presidential election.

M. L.

Philadelphia, January 16

No Pilot at the Wheel

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

For several months our country has had a chief executive in name only; is it not time that we provided ourselves with one in fact? Since the President was struck down in the early fall he has seen almost no one but his wife, his doctor, and his private secretary. We do not know the nature of his affliction. We do not know what reports of the state of the nation are made to him. But we do know beyond all doubt that the country is entering upon a critical period of its history which even threatens the stability of its form of government; the ship of state meanwhile is drifting through these perilous waters with no one at the wheel. Dr. Grayson tells us the President is progressing steadily. We all hope that he is; but let us not delude ourselves into thinking that he is likely ever to recover completely from his stroke. Rest and freedom from strain of all kinds may in time bring back the semblance of normal health, but nothing can restore the vigor of mind and body needed to meet the coming struggle. Let us consider frankly: can the Government continue much longer without a chief? I, for one, doubt it. The Constitution provides for such an emergency. Let us avail ourselves of this provision.

FRANCIS ROGERS

New York, January 6

Queries Concerning the "Social Unit"

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

The article "The Social Unit at Cincinnati," and your remarks thereon, are certainly thought-provoking. I find one or two matters of rather fundamental importance on which Mrs. Tiffany gives no information. Is the Social Unit a representative government, or do the voters have direct control? That is, do the seven members of each "Council" have a fixed term of office, or are they, like the Soviet delegates, bound by threat of "recall" to carry out the behests of their constituents? And have those who "sit on the Central Citizens' Council" a fixed term of office, giving them a reasonable freedom to use their own (presumably) expert knowledge, or are they bound by threat of "recall" to carry out the policies of the "Councils" that elected them? And the same question may be raised in regard to the "Occupational Councils." If the latter alternative is the true one, the Social Unit is not representative government, and is against the whole spirit of our political order. We do not mean to govern directly by the people; we—in theory at least—select specially qualified men to govern us, and agree to abide by their judgment, making them, of course, responsible in the end to the people. Ours is a compromise-system between rule by the expert and pure democracy, or rule by the people; and its virtue lies in this compromise character. But if the Social Unit gives no independent power to its elected Councils, then it would seem to be uncompromising, unqualified democracy, and essentially like the Soviets —omitting the class-war and murderous methods. And if that is the case, it would be potentially a thing of evil; for it would kill the very spirit of leadership and independent thought which it professes to foster. We hear much of community spirit, community organization, and the like, in these days, and we must beware lest these things become a fad and fashion, blindly accepted because of their humanitarian or democratic color. Let us have, as you put it, "a careful study of possible tendencies and purposes." And accordingly I (and doubtless many others) would be glad to be informed on the above points.

WILMON H. SHELDON

Hanover, N. H., January 9

Intervention in Mexico

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

One of the most puissant—and venerable—arguments against American intervention in Mexico is that the rest of the Latin-American nations will say: "I told you so. See! The Monroe Doctrine is a sham; the Americans are hypocrites."

And yet, when we intervened in Cuba, they said the same thing. When we withdrew from Cuba, they were dumbfounded. They could not understand American altruism, or, better, enlightened self-interest. There must be some hidden motive for such an extraordinary phenomenon.

Our second intervention (to restore order) explained the whole situation. Of course it was a grab game, cunningly camouflaged by a temporary retirement. "I told you so," again.

Our final retirement from Cuba probably has never been understood by the Latin-American mind. That a powerful nation should voluntarily and in accordance with its word of honor relinquish conquest was to them, and many other nations, it must be confessed, inconceivable. Yet it is an historical fact. The United States did retire from Cuba after assisting her to self government, did intervene to restore order, and after order was restored, did retire and leave the Cubans to govern themselves so long as they should refrain from revolutions. We insisted that ballots rather than bullets should decide who was to be the next President in Cuba. Voilà tout!

Expressed in the crudest terms the attitude of the United States towards Cuba has been about this: "You have our best wishes. Go ahead and govern yourselves. We will guard you against outside interference. We look to you to be decent in internal affairs. If you start a roughhouse, we shall turn the hose on you. Adiós, amigos."

We intervened in Cuba because the political conditions of our next door neighbor were an intolerable nuisance. We abated the nuisance and then retired, retaining the right to abate a similar nuisance should occasion require. Those are the plain historical facts.

Since the days of Porfirio Díaz political conditions in Mexico have been a nuisance which we have tolerated for the sufficient reason that we have been otherwise occupied. International obligations have been openly and flagrantly disregarded, contracts broken with the most sinister disregard of alien rights, systematic persecution of American nationals fomented. As far back as 1907 and 1909 when I was living in Mexico I could see the German machinations against American trade, American concessions, and American citizens.

Shibboleths and formulas have a tremendous effect on the human mind. But, after all, a formula expresses, often imperfectly, public opinion or aspiration formed on existing conditions. But conditions in this world are constantly changing, and the formula of yesterday does not always fit the conditions of today. In strict accordance with our ancient and favorite political formulas, what right had we to impose the Platt Amendment on the Cubans? What right to interfere and restore and compel law and order in the affairs of San Domingo and Hayti? Clearly none at all.

And thus doubtless we shall sooner or later be compelled to ignore ancient formulas and to interfere in Mexico to restore order and respect for international obligations. The task of control of the country will be enormous, and reconstruction still more difficult. A fanatical crew akin to our ante-bellum pacifists will raise a howl and will invoke ancient gods. But in the end Mexico will be in the condition of Cuba, peaceful, prosperous, and self-governing. It will be worth the price. In the beginning the Latin-Americans will raise their eyebrows, will shrug their shoulders and say, "I told you so. The Yankees are hypocrites; the Monroe Doctrine is a camouflage for aggression." But when we go out of Mexico without confiscation of territory, the Latin-American perhaps will begin to understand that the United States really means what we say and that there is no hypocrisy about us. The lesson to the rest of the world will be of incalculable value in international affairs.

E. L. C. MORSE

Chicago, Ill., December 26, 1919

Book Reviews

The Tragedy of von Tirpitz

My Memoirs. By Grand Admiral von Tirpitz. In two volumes. New York: Dodd, Mead & Company.

The bright red dress of these volumes was not appropriately chosen. The color belongs not to the mood or the words of Admiral von Tirpitz, sitting in sorrow at Zabelsberg and penning the recollections of a disappointed life, as it looks through the clouds of the past five years. A better dress would have been the twilight gloom of an overcast sea, with a bedraggled German flag for a cover design, flapping on a mast-head peering out of the brine of Scapa Flow, over the grave of a German dreadnought.

In the first fifteen chapters, the author traces his own history from boyhood, through the Naval Cadets' Institute, to officer's rank in the navy, and on through increasingly responsible commands, with growing influence, until at the outbreak of the war, in 1914, he was not only Grand Admiral of the German navy, but more than any other single man the creator of that navy as it then stood. He had developed the torpedo arm, and he had been the most powerful factor in the victory of the "battle fleet" policy over that of a fleet of cruisers. Back in the 'eighties, he had been in close touch with his kinsman Caprivi, then at the head of the Admiralty, whose constant state of mind he sums up in the words, "Next year we shall have a war on two fronts." And they had planned together how von Tirpitz was to run a torpedo division into Cherbourg the moment war was declared, to be followed at once by the battle fleet and a bombardment. By training and temperament he was fully prepared to be a leader in actual war.

And at last "the war," always lying as a possibility just under the horizon, loomed up into view. From that moment on, von Tirpitz sees in the official conduct of his country little but a continued succession of deadly blunders. The war, he thinks, could and should have been avoided. Germany had all but reached, without war, the point where it would have required no war to establish and maintain her supremacy—in other words, though he is careful not to put it in just that form, the point where she could have dominated the world by making it prohibitively dangerous for any nation, or feasible combination of nations, to challenge her power. The superman was just about to have his superiority generally admitted. And just at that point, the superman began the four-year series of blunders and follies and general inefficiency which finally saw the German army hastening back to, and over, the Rhine, with the Allied forces at its heels, the Hohenzollern dynasty shattered, the Emperor an exile, and the fleet, the pride of the Grand Admiral's life, wallowing beneath the waves of Scapa Flow, sunk in bitterness and littleness of spirit, by its own commanders.

Though holding that Germany blundered into a war which by wise diplomacy she could have averted, he is still quite sure that the guilt of bringing on the war belongs elsewhere. "The complete absence of instinct with which the Chancellor proceeded" was not so grave an offense against international morality, in his view, as "the vagueness of England's attitude during the crisis," a vagueness persisted in by the British Cabinet, "though it was well aware of Bethmann's love of peace and his whole nature." Of course this means that if England had made it certain that she would be a participant, Germany would have avoided the conflict. But did anybody outside of Germany doubt, during those days of crisis, that if the storm was allowed to break England was sure to be there? The judgment of von Tirpitz against England is that "the causa remota of the world war lies, according to the judgment of all honest observers of European events—the Belgian Ambassador, for example—in the English policy of encirclement which originated in the 'nineties in trade jealousy, then hid behind pretexts (Transvaal, Navy), poisoned the press of the world, linked up all the anti-German forces in the world, and created a tense atmosphere in which the slightest mistake could cause a most terrible explosion." All this, if true, would prove a very high degree of efficiency in that nation which the superminds of Berlin had so often pictured as hopelessly effete.

But the war once irrevocably let loose, Admiral von Tirpitz is sure that the one and only correct policy required an immediate attack, in full force, upon the British fleet. Delay meant loss of prestige to the navy outside, loss of morale within, and steady gain in relative strength to the British. Furthermore, is not the history of naval warfare full of instances in which the lesser fleet, better managed, has conquered the greater? But from start to finish his advice was not taken, he could not get the confidence of authorities higher up, he had no freedom of action, not even the poor privilege of resigning his official station and taking his humiliation and chagrin out of the public gaze. "Here I sit and do nothing!" he wails again and again, all the more bitterly because of his unshakable confidence in his own ability to make things go better. "Has Ingenohl the genius of a conqueror? Pohl certainly hasn't. . . . Obviously the Kaiser is prejudiced against me. Apropos of which I feel, where these questions are concerned, that I have more in my little finger than Pohl in his whole anatomy."

The submarine warfare was fatally mismanaged, he thinks, at every point. It was a bad blunder to shock America with such an act as the sinking of the Lusitania at the start. American opinion should have been worked up gradually to the point where it could have stomached such strong food without revulsion. But, the blunder once made, there should have been no drawing back, or even apparent admission that any real wrong had been committed. The submarine campaign should have begun with something which it could really accomplish, such as the blockade of the Thames, which he officially advised. But "I was not consulted at all" he says, "the campaign being started over my head and against my will, and in a form which did not promise success." The ground yielded to Wilson in the Sussex note was the beginning of German capitulation: "from the time of this decision we went downhill." And when the submarine was again taken up with vigor, it was an equal blunder, for it was then too late.

The Admiral sees little but gloom a[s] he peers into Germany's future. He i[s] unable to "shake off the fear that Ger[many] has lost her last chance of risin[g] to the rank of a great power." At an[y] rate, she must first "come to her sense[s] and recognize her old traditions and th[e] forces which made her great." But h[e] can not believe that this can happe[n] under a republican government. "Ou[r] breakdown is not due to any defects i[n] our old state system, but to the inad[e]quacy of the persons who tried to ru[n] it." But those inadequate persons—an[d] they appear to have been all but th[e] Admiral himself, in his own judgment[—] were brought to their positions by th[e] normal working of that old state sy[s]tem; so there you are. Human natu[re] evolves a race of supermen, and organiz[es] them into a superstate, only to tear th[e] latter down through the blundering i[n]efficiency of the former.

These volumes are intensely interes[t]ing, mistaken to the point of absurdi[ty] sometimes in judging of outside matte[rs,] but richly profitable as a study of t[he] state of mind that plunged Germany in[to] a war which that same state of mi[nd] made it impossible that the world shou[ld] ever allow her to win. The tragedy [of] von Tirpitz, doomed to see his own li[fe] work, without fruition, sink in disho[nor] beneath the brine of Scapa Flow, [is] merely a replica in little of the m[ore] stupendous tragedy of modern Hohenz[ol]lernism. Fame and fortune await [the] dramatist who has the genius and co[ur]age to break away from present drama[tic] habit, and put either the lesser or [the] greater of these two tragedies into [the] form which Aeschylus or Sophocles wo[uld] have chosen.

Sensitivism

ECSTASY: A STUDY OF HAPPINESS. By Louis Couperus. Translated by Alexander Teixeira de Mattos. New York: Dodd, Mead and Company.
SEPTEMBER. By Frank Swinnerton. New York: George H. Doran Company.

"ECSTASY" considerably antedates the four "Books of the Small Souls," by Couperus, which have recently been rendered into English by Mr. de Mattos. It is the third of his novels, written in the early nineties when he was consciously one of a school of Dutch novelists who styled themselves "sensitivists." An English (or English-writing) critic of the time defined this "sensitivism" of theirs as "a development of impressionism grafted upon naturalism." Stepping delicately away from this slough of -isms, after a hasty acknowledgment of its depth, let us look at our small rescued object. It belongs to the period of languid-intense ingenuities, of over-ripe æstheticism to which the term "decadence" attached itself. Holland, like France and England, was bored with the usual thing, the ordered tempestuousness of the romantic mode as well as the ordered beauty of the classic mode. There remained the relatively unexploited beauties of dubiety, ugliness, and decay, flickeringly illumined, in default of any constant star, by phosphorescent gleams of emotional and temperamental yearning towards the unattainable. Couperus' people impress us first with their unescapable fellow-humanity. Dutch in name and tongue and habitat, they are in substance, in their real being, strangely familiar. Friends? neighbors? Cousin this or that? Why, ourselves! Ourselves ingeniously denuded and exposed to minor but persistent torments, suffering subtly but intensely; creatures held in life as in a cage, by ties of blood, social convention, personal habit. Selves by no means despicable, yet rarely able either to seize a bold happiness or to rise above plaintiveness and self-devouring melancholy to the higher tragic plane. "Small Souls"—such are the beings by whom, in Couperus' eyes, the modern world—that is, the end-of-the-century world—was peopled.

In "Ecstasy" he has not yet developed the later formula whereby his sensitivism, though it never leaves the scene, does yield the foreground to a realism less feverish and somewhat more robust. There is a brooding plaintiveness in all of Couperus' work. The only happiness he can apprehend is a happiness of illusion; and it is of this kind of happiness that the present novel is a study. It is a story of two persons. The woman is by chance a widow with two children, but still "unawakened;" a girl dreaming contentedly enough of she knows not what: "It was the dreaming of one on whose brain lay no obsession either of happiness or of grief, the dreaming of a mind filled with peaceful light; a wide, still, grey Nirvana, in which all the trouble of thinking flows away and the thoughts merely wander back over former impressions, taking them here and there, without selecting." She languidly cares for her children, reads a little, keeps a diary in which are luxuriously recorded her tiny emotional and æsthetic reactions. But day-dreaming is her chosen state: "I only feel myself alive when I am doing nothing," she confesses, with a tolerable degree of complacency. Now, of course, all a young woman in this mood needs is, as it were, the jolt of love. Our Cecile gets it at the hands of the masterful Quaerts. In their matching of egotism, active and passive, he wins, hands down. For him, over-experienced in carnal love, a spiritual passion chances to be in order; poor Cecile is to be both its object and its victim. She takes too literally his protestations of disinterested idealism, and throws away the real man in order to keep the empty phantom of his worship. All this in a strain of well-nigh excruciating sensibility, or should we say sensitivity?—a sensibility refined and intellectualized to the point of deliberate self-torture.

Henry James's method (bred of the same period) was akin to this, though so much cooler emotionally and keener intellectually; and so, in some of his work, at least, is the method, the more characteristic process, at least, of one of England's newest among "new novelists," Frank Swinnerton. It achieved its own kind of perfection in "Nocturne," which seemed to sustain its extraordinary pitch and vibrancy without effort. In "September," with its larger scale and necessarily more variable mood, the effect is less certain. Here are a well-bred English pair, fifteen years married, no longer lovers, and not yet content with wedded friendship. It is the perilous "mid-channel" phase so often interpreted in recent drama and fiction. Are youth and its happiness really past, or may not one more taste of it be somehow snatched, even now, from uncharitable time? The husband is a natural philanderer, and the discovery of his passion, at forty-nine, for a young girl, arouses contemptuous pity rather than any more poignant emotion in the wife. It is with her discovery that she herself is capable of a similar lapse, or reawakening, that we are chiefly concerned. At thirty-eight, with her beauty only beginning to fade, she is a natural object for chivalrous adoration on the part of an imaginative youth of twenty-six. What happens in the end to these four people is by no means astonishing or even novel, as fact and fiction go. The real action takes place in the heart and mind of the wife Marian. In her person, as it were, a person concealing beneath its notably calm and even cold surface a temperament of extreme sensitiveness, we suffer the quivering torments of a passion acknowledged and cherished, yet never revealing itself even to its object. And we seem to share her heroic yet inevitable sacrifice to youth and its rightful emoluments. Mr. Swinnerton's sensitivism, if the term may properly be applied to him, is on the side of the angels. Unlike many of his contemporaries, he does not throw decency overboard because hypocrites exist, or exalt impulse over principle. This is a study of character triumphing over temperament. His concluding sentences, with their frank didacticism, would be unimaginable from a Cannan or a Mackenzie:

> Marian was now very composed and resolute, and entirely mistress of herself, as she had always been and as she always would be. She had been able to feel sympathy and understanding because she had the power to give inexhaustibly; but her reward thenceforward was to lie in the love and trust of her fellows rather than in any satisfaction of her own passion for happy experience. If Marian could have prayed for a gift, she would have demanded joy in her life. Instead, nature had given her as compensation the strength and courage to endure her own pain and the ability to imagine and soften the distress of others. If it is not the first of gifts it is among those most rarely bestowed upon poor mortals, and is without price.

H. W. BOYNTON

Hard-Boiled Poetry

YANKS. A. E. F. Verse. Originally published in the Stars and Stripes, the official newspaper of the American Expeditionary Forces. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.

WAR brings out the distinction between "rare" poetry and poetry hard-boiled. Rare poetry is precious. Of hard-boiled poetry the quality is not strained nor the diction restrained, and it falls pitilessly on the just and on the unjust. It is the poetry of the hard-boiled guy, who accepts only that which expresses his own moods and experience in his own phrase. Since as a rule he does not swagger gracefully (he is apt to be muscle-bound), such sentiment as it has is usually without glamor or romance. It is the iron ration of literature, warranted to withstand any climate and all the exigencies of war and for the time being to sustain emotional life. It has no pride of birth nor consciousness of its heritage. Mr. Kipling achieves it; it eludes Mr. Serviss as an ideal; but for the most part it emanates from men who normally scoff at the very name of poetry, which they give to everything they dislike in literature and then kick it about the floor—in contradistinction to the opposite party who give the name poetry to whatsoever they love and discard all else. In time of peace, we have it in cowboy songs, railroad songs, sailor chanteys and all such, but, like eggs cooked in the crater of the volcano, it is at its best when it tastes like—war.

"Yanks" is a collection of the hard-boiled poetry of the war, and as such it is distinguished from other anthologies of war poetry. To the young veteran the first pleasure of the book will be that of the fireside return to the memory of hardship. "Forsan et haec olim meminisse juvabit" was a frequent mood in the A. E. F., usually expressing itself in the form of allusions to future sessions about the cracker barrel and the stove of the corner store, or in rocking-chairs on the veranda "when we join the Soldiers' Home—A-h-h-men-n!" In these verses the "soldier come from the war" greets old friends who were with him in the thick of it. He recalls where he met them last, not long ago, to be sure, but still distant enough in time and space to have become part and parcel of his sentimental past. He recalls the day when the Stars and Stripes came into camp. He always tried to reach the Y. M. C. A. hut in time to get one, and turned first to about page 7 for Wallgren's comics, then to page 4 for the "Army Poets"—then it would be "Say, fellows, listen to this:

> Rations? Oo-la-la! and how we love the man
> Who learned how to intern our chow in a cold and clammy can. . . .
> Mess kits flown the coop, cups gone up the spout;
> Use your thumbs for issue forks, and pass the bull about.

Here it is now on page 121—and here's the one Bill had pasted up in his bunk; and here's the one Mac always sprung when you tried to graft anything off him; and here's the one Blondy wrote and would never have sent in if we hadn't told him it had the others skun a mile—and look at it now! He finds many old favorites, but looks for others in vain. Where is that profound truth about a chance meeting with a poilu which ended

> He left at last with a gay "Bon chance!"
> And all the cigarettes I had?

There were some little gasps in free verse that one would not willingly let die:

> An' she (She's my girl)
> An' she said——

And a wail about

> Sick of the smell of billets,
> Sick of the chow.
> Want to leave France and put on long pants,
> Want to go now!

Of course the editors could not print all, but if they could have taken a plebiscite of the readers of "The Army Poets" column as a basis for their selection, they might have made the book even more interesting than it is to both reader and student.

The mood of "Yanks" is the mood of the A. E. F., serious of deed and light of speech. Sentiment where it occurs is first of all sincere, then broken across by a flash of realism or of humor. The bugler who can no longer blow taps since he played his buddy off ends his confession with a pun;

> I can't blow taps no more . . . but say!
> I tapped a German skull the other day,
> And that squares me!

It shows again in "Me—an' War Goin' on—"

> Me, that ain't a poet, growin' poetic . . .
> Me—a-murmurin' a prayer for Maggie,
> An' stoppin' to laugh at Slim,
> An' shoutin' "To the right of the road for the Swoi-zant-canze!"
> Them babies that raise such hell up the line,
> An' marchin',
> An' marchin' by night,
> An' sleepin' by day,
> An' France,
> An' red wine,
> An' me thinkin' o' home;
> Me—a-leadin' a column,—
> An' war goin' on!

which gives us also the rarer mood in which the conscious artist has stepped outside the man and each wonders at the other. Again we find the artist conscious but not self-conscious, his mood truly lyric, and the product anything but ballad-like:

> The wise years saw him go from them,
> Untaught by them, yet wise;
> He had but romped with the hoyden years,
> Unwitting how time flies;
> Whose laughter glooms to wistfulness
> At swift, undreamt good-byes.
>
> We with the war ahead,
> You who have held the line,
> Laughing, have broken bread,
> And taken wine.

If these are not hard-boiled, neither are they so rare as one might suppose, nor specially significant. A body of men like our army overseas has its lyric poets, and its scholars as well; he who writes of "The Old Overseas Cap" seems to know his Marlowe no less than his Homer: Helen went a. w. o. l. to Paris, and

> Shipping boards gave no trouble with quarrels or slips:
> The beauty of Helen had launched all the ships.

But most of this verse is like folk-lore in that it is lyrically anonymous, expressing none but communal feelings in the communal phrase. There is little of the "hero stuff," nothing of pomp and circumstance. For the most part it is routine turned into literature. The doughboy finds himself in

> A world of > Hizzing (sic) bullets,
> And mustard gas,
> And cold, sleepless nights,
> And no food for days,
> And huns who cried
> "Kamerad!"
> (When their ammunition was gone),
> And filthy clothes,
> And cooties,
> And cooties,
> And cooties.

There he expresses in racy idiom his reaction to the things that are real to him: reveille, pie, mud, the girl at home, camions, corn-willy, mother, the "8-40" train, R. T. O., kid sister, the bugler, the guns, the censor, the campaign hat, the little towns, the orphans of France.

For the most part, it was the folk who made the poetry of the army in France, and if students of balladry do not collect and study the product they miss their opportunity. The editors of the Stars and Stripes sifted it first for the newspaper, and now again for the book, and for the general reader it is better so. But the student of American popular poetry would find in the heap of chaff much to interest him. These pieces are homeless, nameless, parentless waifs and strays that drifted through camps and trenches. A few of them have found their way into print, many circulated in manuscript, others, especially the "high-kilted" ones, lived in memory and passed by word of mouth, and the collector gathered them as best he could from oral rendition. Songs of the various branches of the service are fairly well-known:

> The Ordnance, the Ordnance, we play with T. N. T.
> Dynamite is our delight, we take it with our tea;
> We play baseball with hand grenades, and cans full of H. E.
> We all drink nitro-glycerine when we go on a spree.

There are those which celebrate the various organizations, as that of "The Shocking 144th," which declares that when the news of its arrival in the trenches reached Berlin

> All the Reichstag tore their whiskers—
> "Mein Gott! the beans are spilled!"

More of the true ballad is in "The Roamer's Romance in France," unsophisticated, though with occasional journalistic turn of phrase, as, in speaking of the heroine,

> We need not describe her beauty, for her looks were rare to find,
> As her eyes reflected loveliness were smiling as they shined.
> Her appearance favored America's type, for not many years before
> She had resided there and journeyed here in the early days of war.

As an example of such sentiment as hard-boiled poetry allows itself, we have the lyric burst which ends

> Just kindly remember wherever you roam
> That Shakespeare was right, kid, there's no place like home.

or

> Why keep me feeling lonesome, why keep me feeling blue,
> When you know that the thing that will cheer me up is only a line from you?

Probably none exceeded in popularity that which described how

> With vigorous hop we go over the top
> In the terrible Battle of Paris . . .
> But say, on the square, I'd rather be there
> On the Somme, on the Marne, or at Arras;
> For with vin blanc a snootful it's hard to be neutral
> In the famous Battle of Paris.

From veterans of the battle this sentiment receives hearty endorsement;

Why six months here with conscience clear would surely rate the Legion;
Eight months or so the D. S. C. for fighting in this region.
Of medals known for war alone you've seen
the great selection;
If we survive the female drive we'll rate the whole collection.

All was grist that came to the mill, from the medical officer's prescription,

"Here's a cure for all your ills,
(Iodine and C. C. pills).
Just take this and you'll feel fine
(C. C. pills and iodine)."

down to the discharge papers:

As Willy-with-the-Wallops,
As Boy-that-Took-a-Chance,
You put a dozen scallops
In Kaiser Billy's pants . . .
And so we do not need you,
'Tis sad, but even so;
It cost a lot to feed you,
And we must let you go.
So, knowing this condition,
And with a silent sob,
We hand you our permission
To hustle for a job.

In such as these, there is little of high seriousness, but they ring true, and that is what they have in common with the best of the verses in "Yanks." It is fitting to close with lines from Pvt. Baukhage's "November Eleventh," the last poem in the volume,

We stood up and we didn't say a word;
It felt just like when you have dropped your pack
After a hike, and straightened up your back
And seem just twice as light as any bird. . . .

If you had listened then I guess you'd heard
A sort of sigh from everybody there,
But all we did was stand and stare and stare,
Just stare and stand and never say a word.

Though this stands above the level we may accept it as true to type, for undeniably it is hard-boiled, and beyond question it is poetry.

Robert P. Utter

The Art of the Etcher

Etchers and Etching. Chapters in the history of the art, together with technical explanations of modern artistic methods. By Joseph Pennell. (The Graphic Arts Series.) New York: The Macmillan Co.

"JO" PENNELL is nothing if not always interesting, instructive, stimulating—and combative. These qualities are in evidence whether he is engaged in a newspaper controversy or writing a book of technical and historical instruction such as the present one. Aggressiveness in the service of one's beliefs may be an exceedingly useful quality, and it often is with Mr. Pennell. But it may also engender a temperamental habit, with a suspicion of querulousness, which runs to the facile picking out of minor errors (as in the remark re W. C. Brownell on page 6) and to a disconcerting want of coherence, of balance. And the obvious is at times stated with the aplomb of a challenge.

Our author tells us that he has often been criticised for making statements strongly, but that if one writes "what one knows and believes, one cannot write too strongly." Quite true, and that's just why, when all is said, one would not have missed reading the historical portion of this book. But writing strongly is different from proving a point by a downright inconsistency. In one place, Dürer's "Cannon" and Rembrandt's "Three Trees" are contrasted in order to make a comparison between etching and engraving. Mr. Pennell hastens to admit that "some say The Cannon is etched, not engraved." But he continues: "To me it looks like an engraving. Feels like it." Then, on page 145, comes the serene statement: "The Cannon is said to be engraved, but I have the courage to doubt it—the line is so vital, so superb." Of course, the matter is really of no consequence, and the Dürer plate will be enjoyed one way or the other.

Elision of names from the list of etchers worthy of a place in the book has been practised to a point described in a statement overheard: "There is no god but Jim, and Joe is his prophet." However, the author's iconoclasm usually has some basis of reason, even if not fundamental. One cheerfully underscores objection to the over-rating of artists of the past whose chief distinction is their antiquity. But to-day, also, etching is to more than one an all too facile affair. Here, too, to use Whistler's phrase, art is "chucked under the chin" by the passing artist-gallant. That's the trouble with not a little etching to-day. Such passing flirtation will not disclose the finer nature of etching to the artist.

Mr. Pennell's preface is a true overture; it sounds the keynote of the opus that follows. One notes, with satisfaction, the admonition to the student to start "by looking at good art intelligently." That is the best sort of advice. Good hand-books are necessary for him who looks for guidance in the appreciation of etching. They help him "get there" (if they are the right kind), as the guide-book does the traveler. But the ultimately necessary thing is to see for oneself. Montaigne's dictum is applicable here, too: "A mere bookish learning is a poor, paltry learning." In a postscript to the preface, written at the end of the four years during which publication was held up by the war, Mr. Pennell states a fact which many do not yet realize—that new inspiration in art is not to be hoped for from the war.

It was to be expected that so very able a craftsman would lay due stress on the qualities of the medium, on the fundamental necessity, for the artist, of understanding its limits and possibilities. "A work of graphic art," said Bracquemond, "must bear on its face, undisguised, the character of the technique by which it was produced." That is a truth which well bears repetition, and Mr. Pennell's inevitable insistence on it naturally leads to the second and rather more important part of his book. In that he places the rich fruit of his knowledge and experience before the etcher, offering him a technical guide of real value. Processes and tools (grounding, re-grounding, needles, biting, printing, ink, paper), allied processes such as aquatint, sand-paper method, mezzotint, monotypes, are described in a practical and helpful manner, illuminated by the author's illustrations. There are diverting whacks, aside, at the "system" of trials and states, as also at cataloguers and curators and other little things that get in Mr. Pennell's way.

The proofreading has apparently been carefully done, and the book does not show the typographical errors which marked both editions of the very useful volume on "Lithography" in this same series.

As a piece of book-making the volume bears evidence of great care, and the reproduction of the prints (the photogravures are all carefully credited to F. A. Ringler & Co.) is exceedingly well done—an American achievement that need not fear European competition, and that fills one with a pardonable satisfaction.

The Run of the Shelves

MISS DOROTHY SCARBOROUGH is a porcher. "Porcher" is a new word. Why should not the English language put forth a new tendril, particularly when it is engaged in the vine-like function of twining ornamentally around porches? Miss Scarborough divides her time between New York and Virginia. If any one complains that New York is uncomfortable and Virginia unexciting, the answer is plain: Miss Scarborough's comfort in New York is to idolize Virginia, and her excitement in Virginia is to abominate New York. She has written a book. The instant disquiet which that solemnity called a book awakens in all right-minded people is allayed by the publishers (G. P. Putnam's Sons of that City of Destruction, New York) in a note which affirms that the book is a "book of whimsy," and that the author "loafs." Other comforts await us in the "Foreword." It makes one's mouth water to be told that the book has been "written with tongue acheek." It breaks every rule of "unity, coherence, and continuity," as all books that have virtue enough to be wicked should do. Rules are like those paper-filled hoops in the circus whose only end and aim is to show the dash and grace of the equestrienne as she plunges headlong through their ruptured tissue.

Miss Scarborough is the most amiable of women. She has angers now and then, but they are only the irresistible little rages of a golden-hearted person whose slumbers on the porch have been interrupted by love-parleys on the part of inconsiderate young people. She loves Virginia (its beauty "wrings" her heart); she loves landscape; she loves birds; she loves even reptiles, at which word the shy reviewer lifts his head in proud reciprocation of her smile; she loves negroes; she loves negro songs, and their pleasant, glistening lines strew her pages like streaks of maple syrup on the hot cakes, smoking from the griddle of which this toothsome book undoubtedly consists. Speaking of eating—but who can speak of eating but Miss Scarborough? She eats on the porch where, amid other viands, she "devours the dew-washed morning." "The joyous birds slip singing down (her) throat," like Girondists singing on the way to execution. She recommends that the inspiration of poets should be gastric, and her playfulness on the nourishment of corpses is simply irresistible. "The city person is dead when he eats, and a corpse never does properly assimilate his victuals." But this is not enough. As if to add the last touch of diabolic completeness to her equipment for the bewitchment and bedevilment of her kind, she eats slices of watermelon in her bath.

The examples already given suffice to prove that Miss Scarborough is the jolliest person left on this woe-begone planet. Her book is a "joyous, irresponsible jumble" of things she likes, and she has frisks and pirouettes that are inimitable. "Lucia is the kind of girl for whom everybody likes to do things—particularly trousered everybody." Such archness and such discretion! "If either of you saw my ankles," said the agreeable Miss Mowcher to James Steerforth and David Copperfield, as she jumped upon the table, "I'll go home and destroy myself." It is impossible to take leave of a volume that has all but made farewells impossible without reiterating that it is the rosiest, coziest, raciest, laziest, craziest, sunniest, funniest, gypsiest, tipsiest book that the bounty of destiny has ever permitted the author of this note to meet.

The difficulty with which books are published in our time is remarkable. Hardly less remarkable is the ease with which they are published. On our table is a book by Mr. Robert Cortes Holliday, entitled "Broome Street Straws," to which the publishers (George H. Doran Company) have been generous in the accessories of thick paper, wide margins, and large print. The author of these stories, sketches, and critiques, is far from a stupid or brainless person. Like many of us, he is bright when he is lucky; and, again like many of us, he is lucky sometimes and unlucky often. The point is that he is like the rest of us, and why he should be lifted to the rank of an accredited entertainer or instructor by the enshrinement in a book of his casual and fleeting journalism is a mystery which possibly only cashiers could solve. As journalism these sketches were flanked by work from other hands, and they are the sort of sketches to which the neighborhood of other work is valuable. The hazards of continuity are great. Why give us unmixed Holliday?

There is good sketch-work in the "Romance of Destiny," and respectable, if rather desultory, criticism in "Tarkingtonapolis." There are also gayeties which amuse without surprising us, and serious critical dicta, like those on Mr. Bellóc and O. Henry, which surprise without amusing us. Mr. Belloc writes the "best English now going in England"; O. Henry's failure was "amazing." The two assertions may keep each other in countenance.

Mr. Holliday calls Mr. Stephen Leacock a "rotten bad critic." We pass the discourtesy, more regrettable perhaps on Mr. Holliday's account than on Mr. Leacock's. We pass "rotten" merely as slang without objection, since that objection would be received by slang-users as inverted homage. But we should like to point out that "rotten" in the colloquial sense is slang decaying, slang worn out, and as such should be obnoxious to lovers of novelty in its own field. Slang is the repudiation of antiquity; it is often singularly blind to its own age. A man may wear a circus suit, if he likes, instead of the ordinary street costume, but a circus suit is the very last costume in which one can afford to be visibly threadbare and dingy.

"L'Amiral de Grasse" (Paris: Pierre Téqui) is interesting for two reasons. The first, because it was Admiral de Grasse who contributed largely to the success at Yorktown, and the second because it brings out the little-known fact that the Count's four daughters fled to America at the time of the Terror, married here, and, according to the list at the end of this volume, have left over two score descendants in the United States, among whom are members of such well-known families as the Livingstons and Schuylers. The following unpublished letter from the author, Canon Max Caron, of Versailles, gives evidence that the old dislike for Lafayette still exists in conservative circles in France.

> Here is how I happened to write this life of the great sailor. During a number of years chance, or Providence rather, caused me to spend my two-months' vacation in the Château de Tilly, which belonged to the Admiral, and where he spent his closing years. In the church of the village of Tilly was deposited, as was asked in his will, the Count's heart. So, naturally, I was led to examine into the career of this man, as everything in the château and the church spoke to me of him. And the result was that I arrived at this conclusion—that it is much more to Admiral de Grasse than to General Lafayette that the United States owe their liberty. And yet everybody celebrates the latter and nobody speaks of the former! The real truth lies here—the then Minister of Foreign Affairs, Vergennes, conceived the thought of an armed intervention on the part of France in aid of the insurgent Americans; Louis XVI furnished the means and Count de Grasse carried out the plan. If I have succeeded in proving this, as I think I have, I have done a good thing for my country and for America.

It may be the vogue of the rhymed advertisement—those little verses about somebody's soup and somebody else's cough lozenges which so delightfully sing themselves into one's memory—that has led Mr. Emile Berliner to put forth in the interest of hygienic improvement some illustrated "Health Jingles" under the title of "Muddy Jim":

> A naughty lad was Muddy Jim,
> He hated soap and water,
> Nice little girls wouldn't speak to him,
> Tho' he wished and thought they ought to.

Jim, it appears, was rather too—too Bolshevik in his personal habits. But to our thinking the treatment which the nice little girls meted out to Jim was precisely calculated to confirm him in his evil tendencies. Their behavior will in all probability goad him on to violence. Further on in the book, germs are held up to scorn and derision. Very dangerous. Who can say what harm germs may be capable of if they are treated in this contumelious fashion? Then comes a picture of a trim housemaid sweeping a room. Why put such absurd notions into a child's head? It leads to things like this:

> Mother, will you tell me why
> We are told to "swat the fly"?
> Yes, my dear, because it brings
> Dirt, disease, and filthy things.

How much better to tell the child that flies should be reasoned with, not "swatted"? Indeed, we are quite prepared to find near the end of the book a column of smart-looking soldiers following the American flag. This is the sort of result such misguided propaganda inevitably leads to. Or, last picture of all, accompanied by an apparently innocent verse in praise of sleep, behold the fairy, Capitalism, lulling a child-like society into forgetfulness of its wrongs. We are hopeful that so reactionary a volume will be suppressed before it has the effect of bringing in the revolution.

For those who like literature written in the "Spearmint" dialect the first part of Ring W. Lardner's "Own Your Own Home" (Bobbs Merrill) is funny. There is an unfailing source of humor, if one chooses to look at it that way, in the ribulations that beset the man who pays the bills and does the worrying incidental to the building of a house. And here the language helps. But the latter part of the story recounting the efforts of a detective to break into society are not very funny. All, however, of Fontaine Fox's little illustrations are.

Our American Shoe Men

(By a Staff Correspondent)

"WE produce like gods and distribute like brutes," says an English writer, with whom I do not agree, for I think that we do neither. Rather, I think, our organization for distribution, although less consciously developed than that of production, is on the whole quite as good through its being a survival of myriads of individual instances of the exercise of common sense in the adaptation of means to an end.

But we must all agree that the problem of distribution is well up-stage and hearing the spotlight. It is not surprising, therefore, that a gathering of retail merchants like that of the National Convention of Shoe Dealers at Boston last week drew to the big hall of Mechanics' Building a considerable number who were not of the calling.

One must become a little accustomed to the convention jazz of electric lights, of badges, and of the clatter of groupings and greetings before it is possible really to take notice, for this visible glare and audible clamor is not the convention.

They are not themselves so particularly well-shod, these shoe dealers—apparently all that is shoe-selling is not sold.

There is a programme, of course, heard throughout by earnest souls, and treated with the utmost respect by all: they take their programmes seriously, these conventions of American business men, but a little stiffly, somewhat as the newly rich take their evenings at a Beethoven concert. There are thoughtful papers thoughtfully discussed, but the programme is not it.

One might judge from all the booming of localities by patriotic sons that the next year's meeting place was the prime object of the convention. Or, again, one might think that the election of next year's officers was the principal interest. These certainly had their place in the sun, but were not it.

The palpable effort of manufacturers to create a nice, optimistic buying spirit among these kings of the fitting parlor, who hold our feet if not our fates in the hollow of their hands, was also sufficiently in evidence—but still was not it.

The something that was the spirit of this convention refuses to admit that any of these brass-band elements are more than adventitious. Slowly it takes form in our minds as a message —a message gathered from impalpable things, from the general atmosphere of integrity, from the careful explanations of the processes of shoe-making and shoe-machine making, of methods of jobbing and of retailing—a message to the American people that American business is sound at the core, and that it may be counted on to meet its problems with courage, honesty, and good sense.

Now, shoe manufacturing and selling happens to be one of the most highly organized of American industries. Nowhere have the triumphs of American inventive genius been greater, American superiority of method and process more manifest, and nowhere are the manifold phases of industry more finely correlated —shoe-machine making with shoe manufacturing, shoe manufacturing with jobbing, jobbing with retailing. And, very significantly, a subject prominently discussed at this convention was that of possible closer relations between the retailers of different industries; that is to say, more and better organization.

There has been, and is, a persistent group of agitators in American life who would convince us that all of this organization is bad, that it defies law, fosters an insatiate corporate greed, and exploits the public. The facts do not seem to bear out this contention.

War prices, and (what is worse) post-war prices that have given us our new swear-word, profiteering (we may soon be writing p——g, as we write d—n; for we are enunciating it with increasing sulphurosity), are the results of factors too numerous and too complicated to be glibly ascribed to this or that single cause. Admitting that the term inflation covers most of the underlying sin, there is still a goodly portion from Adam's fall in other forces, and in none more certainly than in the disorganization of business that has resulted from the sudden entry and sudden departure of governments as customers.

Regular profits are lucrative—more so in the long run than irregular ones—but they tend toward a perpetual paring down of excrescences. The regular organization of business automatically tends to increase service, reduce costs, limit margins of profit. It is in the state of disorganization that speculation flourishes, and with it that sister of uncertainty, our profane friend, profiteering. A return to normal organization carries with it a quick death to speculation, and a rapid return to normal service and prices.

And after all, what but organization do our overheated uplifters and socialists desire? Surely, that, and that only, but with this important difference: They desire a form of organization drawn up on paper (by themselves, of course), an artificial rule-of-three organization to replace one which has grown up through the generations of our free industrial life. That is as if we should cut down all our growing fir trees and replace them with those little made-in-Germany Christmas trees of waxed paper and wires—how regular their branches, and how very green their leaves! But I am sure that America will always prefer the free-growing type that has its roots in our own soil and is not German-made, nor grown in the hotbeds of European discontent, and whose branches are always moist with the sap of new growth and healthy vigor.

Of this higher type of organization the shoe industry of America is an effective example. A clerical gentleman once differentiated two denominations of Christians by saying that the one carried on its national concerns in the spirit of a village parish while the other carried on its village parishes in a national spirit. The shoe industry is of this latter type—largely, I suppose, because of the permeating influence of that great industrial organization by which its shoe-making machinery is manufactured, leased, kept in order and always abreast of the inventive skill of the age. Out of this continuing relation a spirit has developed that creates a living organism rather than a paper-made organization. Before we go to displacing this growth of years, with its silent but effective disciplines, let us be very sure that we understand and appreciate it. Possibly we may come to the conclusion that it is as much better than anything we could sit down and draw up on paper as the Constitution of England is better than More's Utopia.

But we are arrived at ladies' night, and the motor sight-seeing tours; the place for the next annual meeting is selected; the officers for the coming year are all chosen; the jaded hotel clerks and bell-boys are listless and lazy; only the bill-clerk is very busy and very smiling, and the home-going is near. The convention is over, but we have learned a lesson. We have sat in with five thousand as sensible, as brave, as honest-souled business men as the world ever bred and—blow hot, blow cold—we are not to be panic-stricken by the rantings of the business-baiting press. And shoes will come down in price? Well, these men no more than others can re-create in a day the wastes of war, or set at naught the effects of world-wide inflation; but this much in all soberness may be said—the organization of the shoe industry in America is such as to give reason to believe that it will be among the first to pass on to the public the benefits of bettering conditions.

Drama

French Plays—Carlo Liten and "Les Bleus de l'Amour"

NEW YORK has not yet awaked to the value of the five-week season of French and Belgian plays which M. Carlo Liten is producing in the original tongue at the Lenox Little Theatre at 52-54 East 78th Street. The repertory ranges from Verhaeren's "Cloître," which has bulk and significance, through Richepin's "Flibustier" which has bulk (in moderation) without significance, and Maeterlinck's "L'Intruse," which has significance without bulk, to Halévy's "L'Eté de la Saint Martin," which possesses neither bulk nor significance. All these plays, I hasten to add, have a place in literature; I restrict the term "significant" to works that illuminate the march of tendency. Personally, I should have thanked M. Liten if he had given us either six full-length and full-strength classic masterpieces or six modern plays of the originality and distinction of Verhaeren's "Cloître."

"Le Cloître" is a play which, in the process of gestation, seems to have undergone something akin to a change of species. The feeling which I expressed some time ago stays with me to this hour: that this play is a comedy which has been seized and carried off by a tragedy or melodrama. The comedy is the more valuable, even the more interesting, of the two; but the tragedy or melodrama has the physical force on its side, and the spectator is caught up and swept along in its train. It is as if a man were looking at some fine etchings when a conflagration, breaking out in the next street, lit up his windows with its feverish glare. He might sincerely prefer the etchings, but against his will his eyes would be held by the conflagration.

"Comedy" in this case must be taken in a rather special sense—the sense of a play, not humorous, but satirical, and tending only by accident to a catastrophic issue. Verhaeren has painted a worldly cloister; he has charged it with the contentions, jealousies, ambitions, masterships, proper, though not peculiar, to the world. The world is, after all, an emanation from our hearts, and the cloister, in shutting the world out, shuts the heart in. Verhaeren has done this thing in a high way. His severity is respectful; his exposure is considerate. These men have behind them a lofty past symbolized in a noble dwelling, and the dignity which has forsaken their aims still clings to their manners. Respect does not stop here. The ancient high spirit persists in a young brother called Mark, a recluse from the world within the cloister no less absolutely than from the world without. In Dom Mark's voice, insisting that civil crime shall answer to the civil law, the cloister judges and condemns its own sophistications. As Spenser, following Du Bellay, said, "Only Rome o'er Rome hath victory."

So much for the high comedy—the satire. An upheaval throws the play out of balance. One of its elements, which is, or should be, merely illustrative or instrumental, mutinies, as it were, and draws to itself the mastery and headship of the play. One of the monks in this cloister is a parricide, who has allowed an innocent man to be executed in his place. The interest of his remorse and confession, though cheap beside that of the satire, is insistent and overwhelming; Verhaeren himself is subject to its deflecting force. There is in his own eloquence a streaming quality, a quality suggestive of flame in wind, to which the appeal of convulsive terror and remorse is irresistible.

The other plays may be treated more briefly. Edmond Rostand is captivating in the one-act piece, "Les deux Pierrots," which means a gay and a sad Pierrot who agree only as to the desirability of Columbine. The smile and the tear have each its gleam, and Rostand could catch gleams anywhere. The one-act play "Le Caprice" shows Alfred de Musset at once in his most virtuous and his most frivolous mood. Was virtue a levity for Alfred de Musset? "Polyphème," in two acts, by Albert Samain, is one of those neo-classic pieces which give more pleasure to Frenchmen than to Anglo-Saxons. The climate of Versailles is more auspicious for these things; in Windsor Park or Central Park, the classic deities shiver.

The company is able. M. Liten's control of an exquisitely modulated voice is absolute. Tone is fitted to feeling, like word to meaning, like glove to hand. An objector in an acrid moment might grumble that the whole process resembled a trying-on of gloves; but even that process has its witchery when the hand is shapely and the glove delicate. The point of the criticism would lie in the implication that M. Liten is a student of emotions rather than of characters. So far as I could judge (the pursuit of the hurrying French tongue by the laggard American ear is a race between hare and tortoise) he was even better in the recitation of lyrics than in the impersonation of men. His Balthazar was an affair of vivid culminations and passive intervals. His Polyphème, strong in its look of ravage and desolation, was almost too mobile, in mind and voice, for a Cyclops. Mlle. Yvonne Garrick of the Comédie Française quite conquered me in two of her three rôles; she made laughter exquisite in Pierrot, and her Galatea was an embodied April. M. André Chotin's portrayal of Dom Mark had the singleness and purity of a star.

M. Romain Coolus is a playwright who, in "Une Femme passa," showed ability and even conscience. In "Les Bleus de l'Amour," a recent offering at the Théâtre Parisien, the conscience absents itself, and the ability is—unobtrusive, touched with unconcern. M. Coolus is not testing his rivets; he is not tightening his knots. Comic virtue is evident in certain passages, and the wit is redolent of Paris. It is an idle, shifting, strolling life which the three acts represent, and the temper of M. Coolus is for the moment in exact harmony with his theme.

This assertion may seem questionable in the light of the fact that the play centres in a French countess who, childless herself, may be briefly classified as an amateur of eugenics. The family must be continued; her niece must marry her nephew; the marriage must be productive. Sureties must be obtained beforehand for the fertility of a young man who is a rougher Hippolytus, de lighting in the chase and ignorant o women. When this young man decline to respond to various suggestions of hi aunt, the last of which is that he shal seduce her own maid, she contrives plan for sending him to Paris under th escort of an actress of doubtful reputa tion, whom, in the furtherance of thes amiable projects, she invites to her ow lunch-table.

The American observer of Frenc manners is prepared for much, but h is unable to view, with perfect equa nimity, this interest of highborn French women in what Mr. Chesterton onc pointedly called the "human stud. There was a time when French coun tesses were the exemplars of breeding i another sense. These are grave depa tures, and the only excuse for departur is—arrivals. One should go all the wa The countess refuses to make prelim nary tests of the fertility of her niec I submit that a woman who sacrific convention to science in the case of t male, but allows convention to superse science in the more uncertain and ther fore more important case of the fema is neither a genuine French countess n an honest stockbreeder. Taken seriousl the countess's plan becomes farcical; M. Coolus, on the other hand, propoun it as a mere joke, I am lucky or unluc in an ancestry and training which obli me to take that joke rather serious It is impossible for me to view it a whimsicality among other whimsica ties. I can not laugh at it between laugh at the rusticities of a provinc hunter and my laugh at the polite acer ties of a submissively protesting stewa This matter is for me a strong liqu a sort of wood alcohol, which, if serv

(Continued on page 92)

A Mighty Motor

Form W Rolling Mill Motors in sizes from 6½ to 200 H.P. is designed specifically for the gruelling conditions encountered in a steel mill. Its bull strength and high overload enable users to meet schedules of production impossible of accomplishment with motors of less rugged construction.

[signature]
President

Crocker-Wheeler Co.

Ampere, N. J.

New York
Boston
Syracuse
Chicago
Cleveland
Binghamton

Pittsburgh
Newark
New Haven
Philadelphia
Baltimore
San Francisco

Tiffany & Co.

Jewelry Silverware Watches Clocks Stationery

Pearls for Necklaces and Pearl Necklaces

Purchases may be made by Mail

Fifth Avenue & 37th Street
New York

A Group of World-Famed Plays Interesting to Every Lover of Drama

BENAVENTE is the latest great writer to be recognized as a world figure. "His importance is a fact that no competent observer can escape," says the Nation. "Spain's foremost living dramatist is more closely akin to Shaw, both as a thinker and a dramatic craftsman, than any other playwright," says the Dial. "It would, however, be grossly unfair even to infer that Jacinto Benavente is an imitator of Shaw."

BENAVENTE

Two series of his plays have been brought out with translations and introductions by John Garrett Underhill.

First Series
His Widow's Husband
La Malquerida (produced in New York as "The Possion Flower")
The Evil Doers of Good
The Bonds of Interest. $2.00

Second Series
No Smoking
Princess Bebe
Autumnal Roses
The Governor's Wife. $2.00

THESE plays by the authors of "Justice" and "Peter Pan" need no introduction to Americans. As long as there is an English-speaking theatre worthy of its traditions their work will stand among the most interesting and entertaining dramatic masterpieces.

JOHN GALSWORTHY

First Series: $2.00
The Silver Box, Joy, Strife
Second Series: $2.00
The Eldest Son, The Little Dream, Justice
Third Series: $2.00
The Fugitive, The Pigeon, The Mob

J. M. BARRIE

	Cloth	Leather
Echoes of the War	$1.75	$2.00
Half-Hours	$1.75	$2.00
Alice Sit-By-the-Fire	$1.00	$2.00
What Every Woman Knows	$1.00	$2.00
Quality Street	$1.00	$2.00
The Admirable Crichton	$1.00	$2.00

CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS
FIFTH AVE. AT 48th ST. NEW YORK

Attractive offerings are made during the Midwinter Book Season.

(Continued from page 90)

at all, can not be properly served on the same tray with the lemonade and the coca-cola.

The presence of other material and the light and tripping gait of the performance relieve these crudities in some degree. The acting was generally satisfactory. M. Gustave Degreziane as Gaspard was happy in a smile that avowed and disavowed a thousand errors; M. André Franky was a good woodsman; and M. Robert Casadesus brought dexterity and moderation to the portrayal of the crabbed steward, Bigorne.

O. W. FIRKINS

Music

The Chicago Opera Season—"Zaza" at the Metropolitan

THE death of the distinguished manager of the Chicago Opera Association, Maëstro Cleofonte Campanini, will not in any way prevent the execution of the plans he had made. Under the management of Mr. Herbert Johnson, an American, and with the artistic aid of Maëstro Marinazzi, formerly of the Scala, on Monday next the singers and musicians of the company will begin another season at the Lexington—a season which, at least in some respects, bids fair to be of quite unusual brilliancy.

For the first night we are to have a great revival of Bellini's "Norma." In days gone by this "Norma" was as popular as "Carmen," "Faust," and "Lohengrin" were later. Those who imagine that its former spell is gone may be astonished (as I was one night in Venice, a few years ago) to find that, rightly sung, with such an artist as Raisa in the title part, it can still thrill one. Few singers have the qualities required for the chief rôle in "Norma," which calls, not for the graces and embellishments of the coloratura style, but for sustained and lovely singing and great dignity.

Of the three novelties announced for the first crowded week at the Lexington, one is the "Madame Chrysanthème" of André Messager. The story which Pierre Loti told so cruelly forms the foundation of the libretto. It was invented long before the "Madama Butterfly" we love so well. And Messager was younger—at his best, indeed—when he composed his score. The part of the poor, touching little heroine, the forsaken Geisha girl, will be interpreted, in the right way, the Japanese way, by Tamaki Miura.

Hard on the heels of "Madame Chrysanthème" will come another long-awaited work—"L'Heure Espagnole," of which the translated title should be "Spanish Time," of Ravel, best known here by his popular concert works, and more especially by his "Shéhérazade" overture.

A sad significance attaches to the promise of the third novelty announced for the first week, the "Rip Van Winkle" of the late Reginald de Koven. This "Rip Van Winkle," like the operetta of Lecocq, is said to take liberties with the legend. That may not matter much, though, if the English words and American plot devised for the libretto by Percy MacKaye prove to be suited to the purposes of opera.

Besides all these new works we shall have "Pélléas et Mélisande," "Pagliacci," "L'Amore dei Tre Re" (with Mary Garden, for the first time here as the romantic heroine), "Un Ballo in Maschera," and "Madama Butterfly." The Metropolitan will have to guard its laurels if this programme is carried out.

Among the other works we may expect in the succeeding month of opera at the Lexington may or may not be Montemezzi's latest effort (with d'Annunzio's book) "La Nave," Camille d'Erlanger's "Aphrodite," Halévy's "La Juive," Meyerbeer's "L'Africaine," Massenet's "Hérodiade," "Le Jongleur," and "Thaïs," Carpentier's ever-welcome "Louise," Verdi's "Falstaff," Ambroise Thomas's "Hamlet," Gounod's "Faust" and "Roméo et Juliette," Bizet's "Carmen," Leroux's "Le Chemineau," Henri Février's "Monna Vanna" and two new ballets by American composers, the "Boudour" of the critic, Felix Borowski, and "The Birthday of the Infanta" (after Oscar Wilde) of John Alden Carpenter.

To interpret this startling and exacting repertory the Chicago company will bring us far-famed singers. Among them will be those two admirable baritones, Titta Ruffo, long a god of the Italians, and Carlo Galeffi, who is said to rival him; Edward Johnson, an American tenor who, under the stage name of Giovanni, has become popular at the Scala; that master of bel canto, Alessandro Bonci, whom some have ranked above the great Caruso; Mary Garden, in her own field still unequalled; Rosa Raisa, of the full and mighty tones; Galli-Curci, the best coloratura soprano living, and Alessandro Dolci, an engaging tenor.

The most recent addition to the repertory of the Metropolitan is the "Zaza" of Leoncavallo (who, with no small skill, adapted the libretto from the once well-known play produced by Mr. Belasco). This "Zaza," though it has no great importance, will appeal to those who love life and movement, wit and humor, on the stage, varied by pathos and occasional violent outbursts. The composer has, in a humble way, made use of music as a handmaid of drama and comedy on the "Falstaff" plan. In his first act (which, by long odds, is the best) he has the deftness which delights us in the "Segreto di Susanna" of Wolf-Ferrari. His second act is rather tame and colorless. The third and fourth acts both contain effective episodes. But nowhere does this work approach the level reached, at times, in "Pagliacci."

The appeal of "Zaza" will be made here by the play (for it is really a good play—of a bad kind, maybe—set cleverly to music). The plot is largely an unvarnished tale of harlotry. And in the centre of it stands the striking figure of the painted "heroine." She is an "artist" of the vulgar music halls, a creature of whims, of passionate freaks and impulses. As an exponent of this meretricious drab (she is that or nothing) Geraldine Farrar fairly took one's breath away. She was as contenting (or distressing) in her stormy moods as in her courtesan coquetries (which left little to the imagination). In the much talked-of scene for Zaza and the child of Dufresne, her lover, she awoke needless sympathy. Her attitudes and poses were audacious—now and then, indeed too audacious for the opera boards. And when the chance occurred, she sang mellifluously.

CHARLES HENRY MELTZER

Reginald de Koven

THE sudden passing of Reginald de Koven, a few days ago, came as a shock to those who liked him as a man and to a host whom he had pleased as a composer of light songs and operas. It was my privilege in other days to share with him, as dramatic critic of the World, the work of chronicling the doings of the stage. His field was music. In later years I helped him in his fight—a long, hard fight—for the employment of our English tongue in opera. Both in the theatre and in the press-room "Reggie" de Koven, as we called him, had warm friends.

Neither as critic nor as musician did he pretend to be a futurist, or even a modernist. To him the Schoenbergs, the Stravinskys, and the Regers of these restless times were puzzling problems. To him good music meant above all things—melody.

It is chiefly as a writer of tuneful songs that most will think of him.

His most successful work was "Robin Hood." The production of that charming comic opera, in 1890, did more than vastly more ambitious efforts to improve the public taste. By "Robin Hood," with its old English flavor, he may live here for some time to come; not by his "Canterbury Pilgrims," his one claim to fame as a composer of "grand" opera.

Toward the end of his career, "Reggie" de Koven was a persistent advocate of the creation in this country of that m

(Continued on page 94)

"Winter's for Books"

—The Review

"Winter evenings—the world shut out—with less of ceremony the gentle Shakespeare enters."

We think of Charles Lamb as a man immersed in books every month of the year. Yet winter was his real time for reading,—"the world shut out."

In warmer weather he makes this note: "Walked sixteen miles yesterday. I can't read much in summer time."

EDWARD T. DEVINE
Associate Editor of the Survey

Will lecture on the following subjects:

THE THREE R'S
Reaction: Revolution: Reconstruction

INDUSTRIAL AND SOCIAL UNREST
Remedies and Proposals

AMERICANIZATION
True and False

For dates and terms address Miss Brandt, Room 1204, 112 E. Nineteenth St., New York

THE REVIEW

IS A

National Weekly

It is read in every part of the United States. Its circulation is increasing rapidly.

THE REVIEW is on news-stands throughout the United States. If you or your friends ever experience difficulty in securing copies of THE REVIEW at any important news-stand in the United States, the fact should be brought to the attention of the Circulation Manager. All news-stands within twenty-four hours of New York should be supplied by Saturday each week; under no circumstances should such stands be supplied later than Monday. In cases where this is not done, exact information will be appreciated.

No matter where you live, you cannot afford to miss seeing THE REVIEW regularly.

The Organ of Sane American Progress

THE REVIEW, 140 Nassau St., New York:

Please send me THE REVIEW for one year.

Name ....

Address ....

$5 a year

Attractive offerings are made during the Midwinter Book Season.

(Continued from page 92)

needed institution, a National Conservatory. For this and other things we owe him thanks.

Though he was not, in any sense, a great musician, he had his place in the wide field of music. His death, soon after the production of his "Rip Van Winkle" by the Chicago Opera Company, has left the world a little poorer for his loss.

C. H. M.

Books and the News

The Theatre

IN the middle of the theatrical season it may be pleasant to see some suggestions for reading about the theatre—criticism, general information, and recollections of the always golden past. These books are mainly about the American stage.

To begin with memories of older days, Mary C. Crawford's "The Romance of the American Theatre" (Little, 1913) will be found interesting, as will the volumes by two veterans, J. R. Towse's "Sixty Years of the Theatre; An Old Critic's Memories" (Funk, 1916), and William Winter's "The Wallet of Time" (Moffat, 1913). The alliterative title of "The Diary of a Daly Débutante" (Duffield, 1910) ought to be attractive; it is by Dora Knowlton Ranous. Those to whom the names of William Warren and Annie Clarke mean anything will be glad to be reminded of Kate Ryan's "Old Boston Museum Days" (Little, 1915).

For general criticism and comment there is Richard Burton's "The New American Drama" (Crowell, 1913), not light reading; and, for contrast, George J. Nathan's "Comedians All" (Knopf, 1919), which may be named as a sample of his books about the stage, in all of which there is a little meat and a great deal of tabasco sauce. Despite Mr. Nathan, the leading American writers on the technique of the drama are Brander Matthews and George P. Baker. The former's newest volume is "The Principles of Playmaking" (Scribner, 1919). Prof. Baker's "Dramatic Technique" (Houghton) appeared last year. Gordon Craig writes essays on all kinds of theatrical subjects in "The Theatre Advancing" (Little, 1919). Another, by Mr. Craig, upon a special subject, is "On the Art of the Theatre" (Browne's Bookstore). Walter Prichard Eaton's "Plays and Players" (Stewart & Kidd, 1916) has some general essays on the theatre, as well as comments upon certain plays. Ludwig Lewisohn in "The Modern Drama; An Essay in Interpretation" (Huebsch, 1915), Archibald Henderson in "The Changing Drama" (Holt, 1914), A. B. Walkley in "Drama and Life" (Brentano, 1908), and Clayton Hamilton in "Problems of the Playwright" (Holt, 1917) deal in all manner of subjects about the theatre, but chiefly in dramatic criticism. It is hardly necessary to remind the reader of James Huneker's "Iconoclasts" (Scribner, 1905), a book about great contemporary figures among dramatists.

Persons interested in special developments in the theatre will find these described in Thomas H. Dickinson's "The Insurgent Theatre" (Huebsch, 1917), with its essays on the little theatres, the "dramatic laboratories," etc., in Constance Mackay's "The Little Theatre in the United States" (Holt, 1917), Percy Mackaye's "The Civic Theatre" (Kennerley, 1912), Alice M. Herts's "The Children's Educational Theatre" (Harper, 1911), and Huntley Carter's "The Theatre of Max Reinhardt" (Palmer, 1914).

David Belasco's "The Theatre Through Its Stage Door" (Harper, 1909) is varied and entertaining. Montrose J. Moses in "The American Dramatist" (Little, 1911) has written a book of reference that is also readable, with its chapters on early playwriting in the United States and discussions of the work of the present.

EDMUND LESTER PEARSON

IDEAL MID-WINTER READING

BRENTANO'S recommend

Seldwyla Folks

By GOTTFRIED KELLER

A collection of three of the best tales of this famous Swiss writer selected because of their idyllic charm and literary distinction. Gottfried Keller, artist, scholar and author, is renowned throughout Europe as the foremost Swiss writer. Americans will welcome this opportunity to become acquainted with him at first hand. $1.75.

Tales of a Cruel Country

By GERALD CUMBERLAND

Author of "Set Down in Malice"

These are rugged tales of a rugged country. Mr. Cumberland knows his Greece, having lived there. He has instilled into his stories the beauty of Ancient Athens and the menacing ruthlessness of barren hills and jagged mountains. You will find here naked life, wild and untamed, and dominated by passion. A man's book. $1.75.

At all bookstores. Postage extra.

Publishers Brentano's 27th St. and 5th Ave., N.Y.

Richard Aldrich in "The New York Times"

"A charmingly easy and persuasive style . . . his views are consistently squared with high ideals . . . much of little known anecdote that is extremely entertaining . . . complete, organically continuous, vivid and informing."

H. T. Finck in "The Post"

"Invaluable for reference . . . entertaining to all lovers of opera."

W. J. Henderson in "The Sun"

"The mass of information in its opulent pages . . . its clear, simple and merciless arraignment of the sinister powers . . . an array of incontrovertible facts."

J. G. Huneker in "The World"

"He mixes his facts with his lovable personality . . . He knows opera in New York as no one else."

W. H. Chamberlain in "The Tribune"

"Rich in personal reminiscences and anecdotes . . . a monumental achievement."

Krehbiel's

More Chapters of Opera

With 40 portraits, full repertories and index. xvi + 474 pp. Large 12mo. $3.50.

Henry Holt & Co., 19 W. 44th St. NEW YORK

Attractive offerings are made during the Midwinter Book Season.

95

THE REVIEW

Vol. 2, No. 38 New York, Saturday, January 31, 1920 FIFTEEN CENTS

Contents

Brief Comment 95
Editorial Articles:
Hoover 98
New York's "Town Meeting Hall" 99
Holland and the ex-Kaiser 100
Still Fumbling with Russia 101
A Glimmer of Hope for Ireland. By Herbert L. Stewart 102
Can Germany Recover? By Dr. Paul Rohrbach 104
Correspondence 105
Coöperating with the Coöperatives. By Jerome Landfield 107
Book Reviews:
Beneficent Results of a Wicked War 108
Kipling—First and Last Impressions 109
Folks and Folk 111
Beyond the Fields We Know 111
The Run of the Shelves 112
The New French President. By Othon Guerlac 113
Einstein and the Man in the Street. By Arthur Gordon Webster 114
Music:
The New York Opera War—Hints to Librettists. By Charles Henry Meltzer 116
Books and the News:
Spiritism. By Edmund Lester Pearson 118

IN the public mind, as distinguished from the schemes and combinations of political managers, the two names that are far and away foremost in the Presidential field at this time are those of General Wood and Mr. Hoover. In this circumstance there is ground for genuine comfort, at a time when comfort in the contemplation of our political state is a very scarce article indeed. For, whatever else may be said about either of these candidacies, they both rest fundamentally on great and rare achievement. It was General Wood's admirable work in the regeneration of Cuba that was the basis of his subsequent career, as well as the primary cause of his high place in public esteem. And his hold on that place was signally confirmed by the invaluable part which his foresight, energy, and efficiency played in giving the country some degree of preparedness for its entry into the great war. Mr. Hoover's emergence as a possible candidate for the Presidency arises still more distinctly from the exertion of splendid administrative powers in momentous work successfully accomplished. In contrast with the nightmare of political impotence exhibited by both parties at Washington, these things shine out with special lustre, and it must be a solace to all patriotic Americans to think that they are adequately appreciated by the nation. That both the men were from the outset staunch supporters of the Allied cause in Europe is an additional reason for satisfaction, and one by no means without importance in its bearing upon the future.

BETTER late than never is the thought that comes uppermost when one has read the sober, concise, and straightforward statement made by the Secretary of Labor on the subject of deportations of members of the Communist Party of America. If such a statement had been made by Attorney General Palmer at the time of the recent wholesale arrests, a great deal of mischief would have been averted. The worst of the raiding business, when it is conducted in a sensational way, is that nobody knows where it is going to end. With no definite indication of the legal basis of the proceeding, and with many outward signs of high-handedness and lack of discrimination, it encourages both the extremists who favor a policy of ruthless repression and the opposite kind of extremists who acclaim it as proof of the accusation, which they have long been making, that we are already guilty of oppression that puts America into the class of the Russia of the Tsars. Secretary Wilson's statement shows that the proceeding against the members of the Communist party was strictly in accordance with the law, and it gives everyone the means of knowing what he must do to avoid coming into collision with the law. Nevertheless, the question remains whether the best judgment was exercised in the application of the law, and also to what extent, in the prosecution of the cases, administrative discretion should temper its execution. No statute of this nature is in practice carried out with literal exactness. The matter is one of political expediency quite as much as of law. If enough is done to serve for warning and prevention, the purpose of the legislation is achieved.

SEVERAL weeks ago, we referred to "definite and serious charges of misconduct" made by Harvey's Weekly against Norman Hapgood, late Minister to Denmark. Shortly after that, Mr. Hapgood replied to the charges in a full and straightforward statement of the facts in the case. The rejoinder to this statement made by Harvey's Weekly fails to sustain the charges either by adducing any substantial evidence of its own, or by pointing out any untruthfulness in Mr. Hapgood's statement. The sinister interpretation which it seeks to put on the facts admitted by him we see no reason whatever for accepting.

"I BELIEVE," says George Washington, in a statement which accompanies an editorial in a New York newspaper pouring forth its denunciation of our "iniquitous treaty" for many reasons that are vague, but one that is explicitly stated ("because it refused self-determination to peoples"), "I believe it is the sincere wish of United America to have nothing to do with the political intrigues or squabbles of European nations." The credo, just as it is stated, is as good to-day as on the day it was uttered; but it does not seem to occur to the newspaper in question that if there is a single situation in Europe which at the moment deserves to be described as a squabble it is precisely that Irish business into which some more or less American noses are so fond of obtruding themselves. On the other hand, it is absurd to pretend that everything that happens in Europe is by definition "political intrigues and squabbles" with which we have no concern—the war and its consequences, for example.

If American statesmen knew Bolshevik Russia as well as Bolshevik statesmen know America, how simple it would be to set everything to rights! Look at this admirable statement, in a note sent by Commissar for Foreign Affairs Chicherin to President Wilson October 24, 1918:

> In your country, Mr. President, the banks and the industries are in the hands of such a small group of capitalists that, as your personal friend, Colonel Robins, assured us, the arrest of twenty heads of capitalistic cliques and the transfer of control, which by characteristic capitalistic methods they have come to possess, into the hands of the masses of the world is all that would be required to destroy the principal source of new wars.

Just how much of the merit of this wonderful summary of American economic conditions is to be ascribed to Chicherin and how much to Raymond Robins, it is impossible to say. The prosperity, not only of a jest, but also of other interesting communications, lies in the ear of him who hears it. But while in this instance the ear was a good one, it is safe to say that the tongue did its fair share. After breathing for a year or two the stifling atmosphere of America, Colonel Robins will doubtless feel that it is impossible he should ever have said anything like what Chicherin states that he did; but to appeal from Philip drunk to Philip sober is not always a conclusive way of arriving at the truth.

Hans Vorst, well known for his excellent contributions on Russian affairs to the Berliner Tageblatt, has published in that paper extracts from a letter written to him by a professor in the University of Tomsk who belongs to the party of the Mensheviki (i. e., Minority Socialists), adherents of the so-called Plekhanov group. This man's testimony to the high character and patriotism of Kolchak is worth quoting as, coming from that side, it forms a strong refutation of the slander of which the Admiral has been the victim both in Europe and this country. The Siberian professor says:

> The Government of Kolchak has rendered extraordinary services to Russia, whatever the revolutionaries and their hangers-on may say of him. He had to work under the most trying circumstances and absolute lack of money and personnel. His Government has made no few mistakes and often veered to the Right—but on the whole it has steered the course of a democratic government which wishes to reunite the divided parts of Russia and establish law and order in the place of Bolshevist tyranny. All the talk of the reactionary tendencies of Kolchak's Government is downright slander. Kolchak was perfectly loyal and his Government recognized its chief duty to be the reunion of Russia and the convocation of the legislative assembly.

We print in other columns correspondence from Berlin by Dr. Paul Rohrbach, a well-known writer on German politics and, before the war, a prominent advocate of Germany's economic and colonial expansion. We are glad to give him this opportunity of stating his country's present case, which must afford bitter reflection to a man who had dreamed of quite a different future. But we can not help feeling that his appeal for material aid and mitigation of the peace terms would have impressed us more if the writer could have assured us that, even more than by their physical sufferings, the Germans are tormented by the consciousness that, but for the crime against civilization to which they were parties, Germany and the rest of Europe might now be enjoying the continuance of old-time prosperity.

It is difficult to define the full bearing of the Pyrrhic victory by which M. Millerand obtained the Chamber's vote of confidence in the entire Cabinet. Léon Daudet's attack on Jules Steeg, the new Minister of the Interior, was obviously a preliminary skirmish by which the opposition meant to test the strength of the new Government and, perhaps, to ascertain on what auxiliary forces they could reckon for the full onset that is to follow. It is a very heterogeneous group by which the Millerand Cabinet is challenged. There are first of all the Socialist members who naturally will join any opposition against a Government formed by the Bloc National. By helping to defeat it they would take revenge for their recent discomfiture at the polls. The extreme Right, as whose spokesman Léon Daudet led the attack, will not be withheld from repeating the assault by fear of playing into the Socialists' hands. The latter are too few in number in the new Chamber as compared with the representation of the Bloc, to derive any substantial gain from the overthrow of the Cabinet. These two extremes are strengthened by several deputies of the Bloc National, who owe the new Premier a grudge for not having offered them or their friends a place in the Government.

The personal element has always been a strong factor in French politics, and now that the German danger is past it reasserts itself with fresh vigor. The Frenchman's interest in the contest of parties is stimulated by his realistic tendency to transpose the clash of abstract principles into a conflict between ambitious politicians. The present crisis is a case in point. Behind the opposition looms the powerful figure of Briand, who, if he succeeds in ousting Millerand, will be the chief gainer. It was Briand who manipulated the election of Paul Deschanel to the Presidency, and in the event of the fall of the present Cabinet Briand will be charged by the new President with the formation of a new one. It would, therefore, have availed Millerand but little if he had waived insistence on M. Steeg's being excluded from the vote of confidence in the Government. The attack on the Minister of the Interior was only a means to an end, and the end is the ousting of M. Millerand himself. The latter's position is the more precarious as he has no definite programme to offer on which a strong majority of the Chamber could be brought to agree. The cement of the Bloc National is a negative formula

There is no unity of design between its various fractions as to the best plan for the economic reconstruction of the country. The financial policy to be adopted will be the supreme test of the Cabinet's vitality. The new Minister of Finance, François-Marcel, has denounced the work of his predecessor, M. Klotz, as "incoherent and altogether incapable of meeting the present needs of France." But he will soon find out the difficulty of steering a course which must not only meet the needs of France but must also meet with the approval of such an incoherent body as the Bloc National.

THE Ohio State Bar Association, in annual session at Dayton last week, listened to a very vigorous discussion, by Hon. John A. McMahon, of the attitude of labor organizations towards what they are pleased to call "government by injunction." The speaker showed that the injunction is an ancient familiar remedy, developed as a means of enabling courts of equity to protect citizens in their legal rights. "Its area of jurisdiction is as wide as that of human rights invaded by unscrupulous men." It has been a very common resort of the poor and the weak against attempts at ruthless encroachments by wealth and power. Only a small percentage of the cases of its use have had anything to do with labor controversies. In no case has a court assumed the authority to enjoin strikers simply as strikers, but only as particular circumstances involved them in the illegal infraction of the legal rights of others. "There is no recorded case where workingmen have been compelled to return to work by the order of any court." While admitting that individual judges might err in the discretion necessary to the use of such a means, the speaker argued very earnestly that the injunction is a bulwark of human right and justice which we can not afford to weaken. In the Ohio campaign for the adoption of a long series of amendments to the state constitution, in 1912, a proposition was submitted separately which limited the use of the injunction, in cases involving the employment of labor, merely to the protection of physical property from violence. It was defeated by over sixteen thousand votes in the State, and through a campaign of education led by Mr. McMahon it was beaten by more than eleven thousand in the counties containing the great manufacturing centres of the Miami Valley.

THE slogan "1919 has been the radicals' year, 1920 belongs to the sane thinkers" may represent only a pious hope, but it is a hope worth holding up before men as one that is at least possible of realization. Some recent publicity of the McGraw-Hill publications, appearing under the above caption, suggests large possibilities in the use of advertising space for the purpose of teaching the fundamental economic truths in a plain and forceful way. The plain citizen may be pardoned if he feels that in his economic diet he must perforce choose between some pretty raw east wind and a simoom that may be heating but is not sustaining. Like plant foods in the ground, economic truth exists in abundance, but for most mortals it is not in "available" form. In such a possible campaign of education, quite as important as explaining what is true, would be the effective demonstration of what is not true, or is characterized by the possession of a mere dangerous fraction of the truth. Indeed, it is the things that seem to be true that are the chief source of danger. The things that are palpably false will be seen through, sooner or later, by even the plainest citizen. But he needs to be put on his guard against the mischief-breeding half-truths and possible falsehoods with which he is constantly confronted.

THE plan for a general final examination of candidates for degrees at Harvard is connected by President Lowell, in his annual report, with the feeling that the individual student, rather than the individual course of study, should be treated as the unit in education. The general examination is to cover the field in which the student has "concentrated," a technical term in Harvard which happily avoids some of the suggestions of the more common word "specialized," or of the ill sounding "majored." The system begins with the present Freshman class, but is not obligatory on any department against its will. All departments except those of mathematics and the natural sciences have so far voted to make the experiment. Perhaps the greatest advantage of these examinations will be their influence in extending and systematizing the student's collateral reading, which examinations in single courses can not control, and which, with the multiplicity of present-day college distractions, is taken for granted far oftener than done.

THE suggested unionization of college and university teachers is discussed by President Lovejoy, of the Association of University Professors, in his recently printed annual message to the Association. He gives three very forcible reasons for opposing the scheme. In the first place, it is certain that a large part of the profession would refuse to join an organization affiliated with the American Federation of Labor. Again, the trade-union usually is, and is generally understood to be, preponderantly economic in its aims and methods. It is not wise that the professional organization of university teachers and investigators should exist, in fact or in popular opinion, primarily for the purpose of increasing the salaries of its members, or that its characteristic business should be the application of economic pressure for such ends. Rather, its first concern should be to enable its members to discharge their distinctive function in the economy of modern society with the highest possible degree of competency and serviceableness. Finally, that part of the profession which is engaged in teaching the "social sciences" should avoid, in the interest of a suitable detachment, entangling alliances with any of the purely economic groups now struggling to retain or increase their share of the "social dividend." There is little ground to apprehend much dissent from this reasoning.

Hoover

THE New York World's courageous declaration in favor of Hoover for President has awakened an enthusiastic response. It would be impossible, we believe, to find any parallel to the announcement, by a newspaper generally acknowledged to be the most powerful organ of its party in the country, that it will support a particular man whether he be nominated by the Democrats or by the Republicans or by an independent movement, provided only that the platform on which he stands is sound in its fundamental character. And the applause that the World has received has come from Democrats even more than from Republicans, though there has been a great deal from both.

It is being widely asserted that the Hoover boom, to which the World's announcement has given so sudden an impetus, has been industriously fostered by strong political and other interests. To attempt to determine the facts as to this aspect of it would be a futile undertaking. But whatever may be the truth as to the existence of any factor of this kind in the case, there is no question at all as to the existence of another factor so powerful as of itself to account for the spread of the Hoover idea—a factor without which the machinations of politicians and cliques would have been impotent to produce it.

Without urging of any sort, the thoughts of thousands of citizens have turned to Hoover as the man who possesses in a unique degree qualifications singularly suited to the needs of an extraordinary situation. People turn to him after much the same fashion as in other days republics in time of stress were wont to turn to "the man on horseback" as the only possible "savior of society." A republic threatened with immediate and possibly fatal convulsion is prone to overlook all other considerations in the presence of the overmastering need of safety. In such a situation the one strong man whose name is a synonym for safety—and he is very apt to be "the man on horseback"—outclasses all competitors. Our country is in no such plight. Neither the evils with which we are already contending, nor the evils that we apprehend, forebode any sudden convulsion or overturn. But they are of a seriousness unexampled in our history; and nowhere is there any sign that they will be vigorously and effectively grappled with. The profound economic disturbance brought on by the war enormously aggravated all forms of social unrest; and to-day, fifteen months after the armistice, our reasons for anxiety as to this situation are not less, but far greater, than they were when the clash of arms came to an end. To do what can be done for the betterment of these conditions is the one supreme need of the moment; and it requires nothing more to explain the underlying cause of the Hoover boom. For Hoover is the one man whose achievements and character mark him out as signally qualified to meet that need.

The great foundation for this belief in his achievements and his character is his work in the rescue of Belgium. A private citizen, a man not theretofore connected with any great philanthropic enterprise, he undertook a task before which all the world shrank appalled, and he achieved it. Not only on the economic side, but on its manifold human sides, he grappled with all the difficulties of an unexampled situation and overcame them. To awaken his countrymen to a duty of which they were slow to appreciate the magnitude, to enlist and to retain the devoted coöperation of the ablest assistants, to institute methods which brought to devastated Belgium the maximum of assistance with the minimum of pauperization—these were the aspects of his work which soon became apparent, and which excited the admiration and gratitude of all the world. It was only later that we came to understand by what combination of firmness and tact, of vigilance and foresight, he succeeded in maintaining livable relations with the German authorities, while yielding nothing of the principle that every ounce of the help that he provided for the Belgians, and of the self-help which he made possible to them, was to count for their good and not for that of their conquerors. History records no more splendid example of the consecration of great powers to the service at once of humanity and of liberty.

Mr. Hoover's work in Belgium was followed, when our country went into the war, by administrative work on a still greater scale, for which he was chosen by President Wilson because of the preëminent ability and energy which he had exhibited. In the execution of these tasks he has manifested the same quality of practical insight combined with breath of vision, as well as that perfect command of detail, and that genius for organization, which were essential to the success of his work in Belgium. And he has never lost sight of the human elements without which even the highest organization is incapable of achieving great ends. He did not underestimate, as many men of the merely engineering instinct might have done, the immense potentialities of voluntary coöperation at a time when a whole people are deeply stirred to a sense of patriotic duty. Nor has he failed, at each of several notable conjunctures, to say a ringing word that has had conclusive potency. Without in the least countenancing preposterous notions of the punishment to be inflicted upon Germany, such as were fomented by Lloyd George in his electioneering campaign after the armistice, he put his foot down firmly when sentimental pleas for the relief of the Germans were filling the air while our undivided attention was required for the rescue of populations that had been crushed in the mire by the German power; and when the downfall of Bela Kun was followed by what looked like a recrudescence of the Hapsburg idea, a few forthright words from Hoover gave what was generally regarded as the coup de grace to that unfortunate project. Preëminently a man that "does things," Mr. Hoover is not much of a talker; but when he does speak he hits the mark.

To a man of this type it is natural that the country should turn when it stands in crying need of relief from evils in which the economic and the human elements are equally involved. We are not going to straighten out the troubles between labor and capital either by an appeal to lofty generalities or by the application of merely economic remedies. We are not going to deal successfully with the grievances that have arisen from the enormous advance of prices by exhorting men to be more high-minded or unselfish, nor can we do so by looking hither and thither for means of artificial legal restraint upon the processes of business. In so far as anything can be done by the Government for either of these ends, its action must be animated by just that combination of broad-mindedness and practicality which, in the fields in which he has thus far been engaged, Mr. Hoover has so signally exhibited. Accordingly we believe it to be true that his advocates will be found in about equal proportions among those who are adherents of Mr. Wilson because of the loftiness of his idealism, and among those who oppose and condemn Mr. Wilson because of the disastrous vagueness of that same idealism. Men of the latter class are ready to welcome with profound relief a change from glamorous generalities to concrete helpfulness; and we feel quite sure that by this time even men of the former class, whether they admit it to themselves or not, have had a surfeit of rainbow-chasing.

So much for the case in favor of Mr. Hoover as a possible President of the United States. But strong as it is, it is very far from being an adequate case. Before we can as sober citizens of a self-governing nation declare that he is our man, we must know much more about the kind of President Mr. Hoover is likely to make. It has been announced by a friend of Mr. Hoover's that a statement will soon be forthcoming, in which he will lay down his views on the issues of the time. This may go far towards determining the inherent merits of his candidacy, even if it still leaves wide open the question of his possible nomination by either party. In the meanwhile, it is proper to point out some of the vital considerations, other than those involved in his personal ability and character, which must be taken into account by the nation.

The term of the next President will begin not to-morrow, but more than a year hence; it will end more than five years hence. During these five years great national concerns will be affected, other than those which at this moment are pressing so heavily upon us. The ship of state is in stormy waters, but, whoever is President, she will right herself. She is not going on the rocks. It is extremely important that we should get through with as little injury as possible, but we are not reduced to the necessity of electing a merely emergency President. In the main, the salvation of the country from the immediate evils in the contemplation of which we are now absorbed must come from the sound sense and the fundamental virtues of the people themselves. On the other hand, the political and economic structure of the country may undergo very great changes, even in the course of a few years, through the action of those whom the people choose to carry on their Government.

Even before the advent of President Wilson, the presidency had gradually come to be a political force so dominant as, in the hands of a strong man, to overshadow all other factors. Whatever other issues there may be in the presidential campaign, one issue is bound to run through it, whether explicitly formulated or not. We are either going to stand by the fundamental principles of the American political and economic system, or we are going to drift away from them. It may or may not be that Mr. Hoover has profound or well-defined convictions on these principles; it may or may not be that he realizes the essential importance of surrounding himself with men who are devoted to them. We can not afford to be saved by a wonder-worker, a superman. We want to get the benefit that such a man is capable of conferring on us in a time of great and extraordinary need, but we do not want to purchase those benefits at the sacrifice of the permanent character of our institutions. In a word, we must know what the election of Hoover would mean politically, before we can decide whether he is the man that we ought to have for President.

New York's "Town Meeting Hall"

THE League for Political Education was founded twenty-five years ago by a little group of public-spirited women, of whom the late Mrs. Henry M. Sanders was the leader. Its growth has been quiet, unobtrusive, and steady. It is now to have a centrally located building, of ample dimensions and suited to varied uses. If the tributes paid to its past by men of such diverse views as Bishop Burch on the one hand and Rabbi Wise on the other may be accepted as a token of the future that lies before it, the civic and social activities which are to be centred in the new building will in the years to come exercise an important influence, which will be felt not only in New York but throughout the nation.

Not the least of the reasons for such an anticipation is that feature in its history and purposes which was especially dwelt upon by Mr. Robert Erskine Ely, to whose energy and devotion as its administrator the other speakers ascribed the chief share in its success. It has relied for its growth not upon the munificence of a few individuals, but upon the hearty coöperation of many hundreds, each of whom gave his or her help without the special urging of anything like an organized "drive." By way of emphasizing the point, Mr. Ely declared that if the $1,250,000 needed for the new building, whose corner-stone was laid last Saturday, were to be offered to him in a single check, he would feel obliged to decline the gift. In the new career now opening for the institution, it should, and probably will—like the City Club of New York—have imitators throughout the country, and it is important that these should be inspired by the same idea of self-help and spontaneous coöperation.

Of the building the most conspicuous feature will be what is formally called the "Civic Auditorium," but what is by preference referred to as the "Town Meeting Hall." The friends of the project love to think of it as offering in some measure a revival of the New England town meeting. The town meeting, however, as everybody knows, can play no such part in a world-city of six million inhabitants of the utmost conceivable heterogeneity as it did in the New England town of six hundred, or six thousand, transplanted Englishmen. Indeed, as we understand it, there are two quite distinct objects for which the Civic Auditorium is to be established. The regularly planned lectures and discussions, under the auspices of the League for Political Education, will there have access to large audiences, instead of the comparatively small ones which they have hitherto reached; but during the greater part of every week the hall will be available for public meetings of miscellaneous character.

The League will do well to keep clearly in mind, and to keep clearly before the public, the distinction between these two functions. The principle of free speech has its bearing on both, and the principle of intelligent speech has its bearing on both. But the emphasis on freedom and the emphasis on intelligence should be different in the two. It will be a great thing to have a recognized centre where opinions and sentiments of almost every possible shade can find vent without the sponsorship of any organization; and accordingly the League should be as sparing as possible of any censorship of the purposes for which its hall may be used as a place of general assembly. On the other hand, a League for Political Education is bound by its very title to see to it that the matter which is presented under its own auspices shall be educative. There is a superstition of free speech, just as there is a superstition of bigotry. It may be right to let wild or ignorant people talk nonsense, but it is silly to suppose that such talking is educative, or that it is sure to be harmless. The views set forth by speakers for a League of Political Education need not be in accord with what the officers of the League think just or desirable, but they must fulfill one condition—that of being the result of sober and competent thought. To be a lecturer for such an association is not a natural right, but an acquired privilege. Undoubtedly, it has been upon this principle that the League has proceeded in the past; but once it gets into the limelight in its larger sphere of operations it will be likely to meet with much sophomoric criticism if it continues to adhere to it.

Another of the uses to which the building is to be put appeals to us perhaps even more strongly. It will house a club for men and women, to which admission will be easy, and of which the annual membership fee is to be only fifteen dollars. There ought to be a score of such clubs in New York, and every city should have one or more of them. To a large class of women especially it would supply something the absence of which it is pitiful to contemplate when one thinks how easily it might be provided. There are in New York tens of thousands of women living solitary lives of hard work, women of education and refinement, whose life would be transformed by the mere possibility of such human contact as a club of this kind would furnish. In many cases the effect of this contact would be to open opportunities for civic or social usefulness which these women would eagerly welcome, and from that standpoint alone the existence of the club would be more than justified. But it is the benefit to the individuals themselves—men as well as women, but women most because they need it most—to which we attach the highest value. The civic or public side will be peculiar to such a club as is to be housed in the League's building; but if this should prove a success, lesser clubs, clubs of a neighborhood character, ought to find their cue in it. Without any aspiration for larger results, such clubs would do their share in filling a need not less acute than that for social or political reform—the need of a livable life for thousands of individual men and women oppressed by the utter bareness and unfriendliness of their social surroundings.

Holland and the ex-Kaiser

IN its note to the Netherlands Government demanding the extradition of the ex-Kaiser, the Supreme Council expressed the opinion that "Holland would not fulfill her international duty if she refused to associate herself with the Entente Powers, within the limit of her ability, to pursue, or at least not to impede, the punishment of crimes committed." The Council has thus, in anticipation, condemned Queen Wilhelmina and her Government as lacking in duty to the rest of the world. It seems open to doubt whether it is in accordance with that high international policy in whose name the demand for extradition was made to force, by the threat of a stigma, the Kingdom into fulfilling its alleged duty. A compliance with the request, since that menace was made, would, whether justly or not, have been explained as due to Holland's fear of the consequences of a refusal. Holland was thus given only the choice between fulfilling a new-sprung duty without receiving credit for her moral sense and satisfying her own conscience by a strict adherence to the laws of the kingdom and national tradition.

The decision, though thus facilitated for Holland by the threat of the Powers, would not have fallen out otherwise if they had simply appealed to her "respect for law and love of justice." It is on these very principles that Queen Wilhelmina has based her refusal; respect, indeed, for the laws of the kingdom and love of that justice which is embodied in national tradition. Those two were the only principles by which her Government could let itself be guided, as no international law exists on which the demand of the Powers could be based. There is greater force in that argument than in the plea, put forward by French editors and politicians, that the demand is founded on a new moral law which, by its application to the ex-Kaiser's case, would be carried out of the sphere of theory into that of international practice. The prestige of the International

Code of Law would suffer from this novel mode of enactment, contrary to the juristic principles of all civilized countries. Taking this point of view, which seems to us unimpeachable, the Government of the Queen declared that "if in the future there should be instituted by the society of nations an international jurisdiction, competent to judge in case of war deeds, qualified as crimes and submitted to its jurisdiction by statute antedating the acts committed, it would be fit for Holland to associate herself with the new régime."

The Dutch press seems to be unanimous in its approval of the Government's attitude. We should wrong the Hollanders if we ascribed their satisfaction to any love for the exile of Amerongen or to a wish to condone the many crimes committed in his name. If they could, without prejudice to their national honor, get rid of the intruder, they would gladly see the last of him. Those who refuse the Kaiser's extradition would be more glad of a justifiable reason for delivering him than the Allied Governments probably would be of receiving him at their hands. The Dutch reply must have brought a sense of relief to the Cabinets in Paris and London. The fear lest the failure to enforce one provision of the Treaty of Versailles should invalidate others has small basis. It is not the German Government which raises the obstacle, but a Power which can, and does, claim as a reason for refusing the Council's demand that it is not a party to that treaty.

The two parties chiefly concerned have good cause, therefore, to thank Queen Wilhelmina's Government for its decision: the Entente Powers, which are barred from the dubious honor of establishing a new international law which would set up the accuser as judge in his own case, and the Dutch nation, which has the satisfaction of seeing its respect for law and tradition prevail over its aversion to the guest who, little to his honor, abuses that feeling for his own safety. It is only the ex-Kaiser himself who, if he were the man he has so long pretended to be, should regret a conclusion which prevents him from rising out of his present obscurity into the full glare of the world's stage, to make his exit as a martyr.

Still Fumbling with Russia

ANNOUNCEMENTS in recent official Soviet Government newspapers, as well as from the Soviet authorities themselves, confirm the statement made in our last week's issue that the Russian Coöperative organizations were under control of the Soviet Government, and that to trade with the Coöperatives as proposed in the announcement of the Supreme Council is to deal with the Soviet Government.

The real meaning and intent of the announcement are still far from clear. Three possible explanations have been suggested. The first is that Alexander Berkenheim, sometime representative of the Central Union of Consumers' Coöperatives, had taken in the Supreme Council and led them to believe that it was possible to deal with the Russian people through the Coöperatives independently of the Soviet Government; in other words, that it was possible "to go over the heads of the Government to the people." The cryptic remark in the announcement concerning "the report of a committee appointed to consider the reopening of certain trade relations with the Russian people" may refer to Berkenheim and his assistant, Krovopuskov. The latter has now admitted that the Coöperatives are completely controlled by the Soviet Government. A second view is that the announcement is a scarcely veiled proposal to enter into negotiations with and recognize the Soviet Government. This, however, seems unlikely in view of the categorical statement that the arrangement implies no change in the policies of the Allied Governments toward the Soviet Government, and also because the proposal has been coldly received by the Soviet authorities. A third supposition is that Lloyd George put forth, for its political effect upon the radical labor element in England and elsewhere, a proposal of which he knew well that nothing would come in practice, but for the failure of which he could place the blame on the Soviet Government itself.

In connection with this, it is interesting to note that the pro-Bolshevist press charges a British plot to secure a favorable trade position, regardless of what develops in Russia, and to exclude America from similar opportunities. Attention is called to the fact that the action at Paris was taken after America had burned her bridges behind her by the deportation of the Russian "Reds" and by the publication of the State Department memorandum on Bolshevism. Meanwhile the Allied policy toward Soviet Russia is a mass of inconsistencies and contradictions. Side by side with the proposal to trade with the Russian people comes the recognition of the independence of Georgia and Azerbaijan and the promise of assistance to Poland in her struggle against the Bolsheviks. It must be reiterated that the announced policy of placing a "barbed-wire fence" around Bolshevik Russia is fraught with great danger. Any proposal that threatens the unity and integrity of Russia tends to unite patriotic anti-Bolshevik Russians under the Bolshevik banner for the defense of the unity of their country, and discourages those forces which are making for revolution from within. Nothing could be more disastrous to Europe than to have the war against Bolshevism transformed into a war against Russia.

THE REVIEW

A weekly journal of political and general discussion

Published by
THE NATIONAL WEEKLY CORPORATION
140 Nassau Street, New York
FABIAN FRANKLIN, President
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER, Treasurer

RODMAN GILDER, Business Manager

Subscription price, five dollars a year in advance. Fifteen cents a copy. Foreign postage, one dollar extra; Canadian postage, fifty cents extra. Foreign subscriptions may be sent to Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons, Ltd., 24, Bedford St., Strand, London, W. C. 2, England.
Copyright, 1920, in the United States of America
Editors
FABIAN FRANKLIN
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER

A Glimmer of Hope for Ireland

IT would be premature to express more than a tentative judgment upon the new proposals about Ireland until we have the full text of the Government bill. So far we have only an outline of its broad principle, and there are immensely important matters of detail which one still eagerly awaits. But some salient points at least are clear.

Full recognition is to be granted to the claim that Ulster, no less than the rest of Ireland, shall "determine herself." Mr. Lloyd George insists that no plan is admissible which does not rest on general consent, though his recommendations clearly imply that this consent may be the outcome rather than the prerequisite of a well-conceived reform. He has in mind Gladstone's central doctrine that popular sympathy must in the end be enlisted by any constitution which is to succeed, and he will not limit the scope of this rule to one part of the island only. Whatever the causes, reasonable or unreasonable, which divorce public feeling from the administration, he realizes that these must be considered, and, so far as possible, removed. The obstacles which have their root in reason will, of course, be more manageable than those which spring from unreason, and Mr. Lloyd George's many speeches on Home Rule bills in the past leave us in no doubt that for him "Ulster" has been the seat of the more irrational obstinacy. But this, too, he is anxious to meet and to reconcile. The new scheme assumes that it is the melancholy discord among Irishmen themselves which now stands in the way of settlement, and that circumstances exclude the hope of overcoming this conflict by the mechanical imposition of a common legislative assembly. Hence it is proposed to divide the country, at least for a time, into two areas, giving to each a provincial legislature, and setting up besides a federal council to form, for certain carefully defined purposes, a connecting link between the two. The temporary character of this arrangement is emphasized by the provision which the bill is to include for bringing the two provinces in the end more intimately together. It is to be within the power of the provincial legislatures themselves, without further reference to the Imperial Parliament, to decree their own fusion into a single House.

Thus the bill makes room for the simultaneous acceptance of two principles hitherto deemed irreconcilable. It removes all ground of complaint on the part of "Ulster" that she is being coerced, and it entrusts to Irishmen alone—uncontrolled by outsiders—the next step to a complete national unity. No doubt the Ulstermen will protest that their chief weapon is to be forced from their hands when they are deprived of the power of appeal to English, Scottish, and Welsh support. On the other side the southern folk may feel aggrieved that for the purpose of the next negotiation, which can not be far distant, thirty per cent. of voters in the north is to be held equivalent to seventy per cent. in the south. But on the whole the plan seems a remarkable feat of ingenuity.

The self-determination which is here acknowledged is something very different from that which to certain dreamers seems to imply an independent Irish Republic. Constitutional nationalists, like the writer of this article, must welcome the unambiguous terms in which Mr. Lloyd George bids defiance to any such proposal. That in this respect, if in no other, they can join hands with even the most inveterate Ulster opponent is among the tokens, still too few, of a possible reconciliation.

If Sir Edward Carson and his friends acquiesce in the new policy, they will have to abandon some of their most cherished arguments. They used to say, for example, that they had comparatively little fear for the interest of the "Plantation Counties" under Home Rule, for these would be well able to look after themselves, and that their chief anxiety was for their scattered brethren so hopelessly outnumbered in Leinster, Munster, and Connaught. These last, to use the old Ulster phrase, are to be "thrown to the wolves." But the southern and western Unionists have, ever since the 1916 Convention, voluntarily abandoned their would-be protectors, and have distressingly avowed that the wolves have for them no terror at all! Again, it used to be a Unionist contention that "Ulster" means the whole geographical entity of nine counties—an idea obviously in the interest of those who urged it, so long as the northern province was expected to remain in parliamentary union with Great Britain. Will this view be retained when the fate of the northern province is to be decided by its own inhabitants alone? Will Sir Edward Carson agree to have an autonomous province which contains some fifty per cent. of Home Rulers? Or will he devise a new zigzag boundary line, in utter neglect of that geography about which we once heard so much, and cutting out an irregular but homogeneous area of his own pledged supporters? Some humorist has already suggested "Carsonshire" as a name for the strange province that would thus be created. But to accept this would be to introduce a permanent hindrance to the amalgamation that the bill contemplates. We must wait to see how this very essential point is determined when the full text of the measure is before us. On the principle of division the Prime Minister's introductory statement was far from definite. He spoke of tracing out "homogeneous areas," and there was more than a hint that homogeneity was to be determined by religion. But we must wait to see whether he really meant so disastrous a scheme of cleavage.

Meantime we have much reason to hail some features of unusually rich promise in the plan as we have so far been allowed to know it. First of all, it is much to have resolutely faced the problem of the Irish schism, however we may have to deplore its existence, and with whatever sanguine hope we may anticipate its extinction. Such extinction will be best promoted by talking less of the grounds of variance in the past, and setting the discordant parties to work together, even under some disagreeable limits, in their own house with a common responsibility for the present. The late Mr. John Redmond once declared in ever-memorable words that almost any compromise should be welcomed which did not shut out the future chance of a really united Ireland. He was willing to accept even the plan of a local option by counties for a period of six years, after which the whole problem might be reopened, though he well knew that at least four counties were certain to separate themselves from the rest. Things have moved fast and far since that statesmanlike concession was defeated of its purpose. But the granting to "Ulster" of a legislative exclusion, until such time as Ulstermen shall themselves decide to come in, is in exactly the same spirit of far-sighted conciliation.

It is much, too, that the new bill will withdraw the ultimate settlement of Irish internal difference from the corrupting influence of party politics across the Channel. Perhaps the deepest source of the long difficulty has been the fact that Ireland has been the obvious and habitual tool for rival ambitions to exploit in interests quite apart from her own. Long before this her domestic feud might have been composed if it had not served the turn of second-rate politicians elsewhere to intensify it. Under this bill she will be exposed to that risk no longer. And to those who fear that the first step of the southern province as now dominated by Sinn Fein would be to declare an independent republic the simple reply is that the powers of the new legislatures will be defined by the statute which creates them, and that a revolutionary move of this sort is as easily prohibited as a corresponding move —if such were conceivable—by Ontario or Nova Scotia. To all, except on the one hand the irreconcilable Sinn Fein, and on the other the no less irreconcilable Ulster Covenanters, Mr. Lloyd George's plan is full of fresh possibilities for good.

The smart critics say that previous bills satisfied somebody, but that this bill will satisfy nobody, and they take for granted that herein lies its sufficient condemnation. But is this a defect? Is it not rather a conspicuous merit, without which one would doubt that a settlement was in sight?

It is safe to guess that not one, even among the sub-committee responsible for drawing up the provisions, is satisfied with every clause of them, and it is certain that Irishmen of all parties both at home and abroad can see much to justify their own discontent. One can understand how English critics hate to see self-government inaugurated at a moment of such intense passion between classes, when the voice of moderate men is drowned in clamor, and when the apostles of violence hold so great a part of Ireland in their grip. One can appreciate, too, how all genuine Irishmen revolt against an arrangement which will even for a time divide their kindred into hostile camps, revive old memories that should long since have been allowed to die, and officially acknowledge the wretched doctrine of "two nations." Still deeper must be the disgust of all who remember how needless and artificial are these hindrances, how political manœuvering for place and power has found its ready instrument in envenoming a wound that had almost healed, how many chances were missed for a settlement that promised well, so that the only chance still open is for a settlement that promises indifferently. Speaking as an Irishman to my compatriots I would say that if we are mere disputants, wrangling about "who is to blame," we shall find it easy to dwell upon a dozen grounds for discontent with either this bill or any other bill that the wit of man can now devise.

But we have something better to do than to recapitulate our case against the coercions and postponements, the stupid misunderstandings, the wilful chicaneries, the Carsonism that inspired Sinn Fein, and the Sinn Fein that stooped to take its model from Carsonism. These matters will belong to history, and we leave it in confidence to the historians to do stern justice. It is for living Irishmen to take their own decisions for the future in the light of the present.

The cool-headed are always a small group, but it would be idle to deny that they are dissatisfied too. What dissatisfies them is not, however, the fault of the proposed bill, but the lamentable circumstance that a better bill is not, in the light of the whole situation, at present practicable. We must not blame the unfairness of Ministers when the trouble lies in the desperate nature of the business they are trying to mend, and, even if we believe that some of them have themselves to thank for their difficulties, let us give them the credit of rising to a task which they have at length, though slowly, come to appreciate. Nothing is settled by invoking "self-determination" until one has defined the area that can be called a national self.

Mr. Lloyd George has come to understand the truth of that old saying of Mirabeau that for men dealing with a national crisis there must often be a bold "swallowing of formulas." But in the present proposal about Ireland the formula of self-determination is being sanely though not slavishly kept in view.

Not by pleasing those who think that they are not "self-determined" until they have got all they either asked or wished, not by deferring forever to those who refuse to see the need for a generous programme of give and take, not by taking seriously those who have sworn in advance a "Covenant" about what "under no circumstances" they will accept, will this problem be guided to a solution. What Ministers seem at last to realize is that they have been led to the present situation in part at least through their long delays, their dexterous chopping and changing, in the vain hope that extremists can be cajoled into combining. The new scheme is not for the complete satisfying of anyone, but for the establishment of an order with which all reasonable men should, at least for the time, be satisfied. If Mr. Lloyd George will only preserve an impartial courage towards all the violent alike, whether they are his own electoral friends or foes, there is a glimmering of hope.

HERBERT L. STEWART

Can Germany Recover?

THE other day I received a number of the Japan Financial and Economic Monthly, a periodical edited by Japanese but written in English. The editors had asked several leading politicians and strategists for their opinion as to the future of Germany. The answers all agreed in asserting that Germany's power of economic recuperation is not broken, and that she is destined to make rapid progress in social developments by which she will recover her former position among the nations. These Japanese prophets evinced a common tendency to reckon on this expected revival of Germany as a trump card which Japan can play out against the Anglo-Saxon nations. Dr. Misao Kanbe, a professor in the University of Kyoto, expressed himself thus: "Germany is bound to create a new civilization, which will compete with the Anglo-Saxon world and its capitalistic system." The Marquis Okuma, who was Prime Minister in the Cabinet which declared war on Germany, is of opinion that Germany, when peace has been concluded, will doubtless resume her economic life-and-death struggle with all the nations of the world. Especially the English and Americans will experience that."

Similar statements are made by Japanese residing in Germany. They are not to be shaken in their belief that the German nation will recover its strength and fix on a conscious policy for international reconstruction. Every foreigner who visits Germany is anxious to find out what are the real political intentions of Germany, of the Government, and of the leading personalities among the nation. In the press of the Entente countries, especially of France, there is a great deal of talk about German plans and purposes against which the Allies should be on their guard. A French General in the Baltic region recently said to a Swedish interviewer that the refusal of the German troops to evacuate the Baltic Provinces had convinced him of the existence of a Russo-German conspiracy against the peace of the world!

To those who know the actual conditions in Germany, who have lived through the Revolution and have watched its further development, such notions seem either bitter irony or, if they are not, they afford an illustration of the levity with which lack of knowledge forms its opinions. Is it at all possible that Germany will again become an economic force in the world? If the Peace Terms of Versailles are not altered in any way and Germany is left without aid in her present state of distress, there is no chance of her economic recovery. In that case Germany's political bankruptcy is inevitable, bringing in its train private bankruptcy and a terrible proletarisation of the whole nation.

It is impossible for the German nation to maintain its life on the territory left to it by the peace of Versailles. Before the war about one-tenth of the necessary bread-corn had to be imported, and a similar proportion of meat had to come from abroad.

It would seem as if, with increased economy, the nation would be able to live on the products of its own soil and land. But the experience of the war has shown that this is not possible. First of all, the maximum produce of agriculture, in spite of German kali, could not be maintained without a large supply of mineral manures from abroad. Manufactured inventions can only partly replace them, as there are no substitutes for phosphates, only for nitrogen. In the second place, agriculture needs a large stock of cattle and horses for manuring and team-work. But our live stock has been reduced by the war, and the prevailing dearth of fodder precludes its extension. Thirdly, German stock-raising, before the war a flourishing trade, depended largely on foodstuffs imported from abroad, especially all kinds of so-called "Kraftfutter," residues of oil-refining and such like. With the cessation of their import, the cattle deteriorated and produced less milk. Without this foreign food the stock can not be maintained in sufficient numbers. And lastly, Germany could only remain self-supporting as long as the eastern provinces produced more corn than they consumed themselves. Of these granaries Germany has lost two almost entirely, Posen and West Prussia, and large parts of Silesia and East Prussia will also, probably, be taken from her. The result, in the present and the future, is such a large shortage of home-produced foodstuffs that, even with the utmost economy, Germany can not possibly subsist on her own output.

There are three possibilities left to her: imports from abroad, emigration of the population surplus for which no food can be provided, and gradual reduction of the number of inhabitants by hunger and suffering. By a fair estimate, Germany, after the cession of the territory required by the treaty, will contain a little less than 60 million people. Before the war this number was 67 millions, and, if peace had been maintained, it would now have risen to over 71 millions. It is difficult to make a guess at the number which Germany, reduced in size, will be able to maintain on her own resources; probably no more than 40-45 millions. How will Germany pay for the foodstuffs which must be imported if the other 15 or 20 millions are to be kept alive? She has no raw materials to export in return, except kali, part of which comes from Alsace, now ceded to France. Manufactures are the only means of payment left to her. But in order to engage in manufacture Germany needs raw materials: wool and cotton, metals, wood, caoutchouc, hides, etc. Without these supplies, Germany's economic life is paralyzed. The only great industry which, in that case, could still subsist is the steel industry; all other industrial concerns would amount to very little. And even the steel industry will be doomed if the mines in Silesia and Poland are to be ceded to Poland.

It is clear, therefore, that Germany, of her own power, is not able to recover economically so as to keep the nation from starving. First of all, raw materials must be obtained from abroad, so that the industries can start afresh. That can only be done on credit, as the German mark has lost all purchasing power. The scarcity of raw materials for all industries, on the other hand, forces prices to a fabulous height, and the buyers of such scanty products of manufacture as are on the market are mostly not Germans, but foreigners, who, in consequence of the abnormally high purchasing power of the dollar, can buy Germany empty at little expense. Half a year ago the price of a beautiful China dinner service was M. 1500, of a fountain pen, M. 30; of a small electric cooking apparatus, M. 50. To-day these prices have gone up to M. 3800, M. 70, and M. 120. When you inquire into the cause of this rise, the salesman will tell you that the material is growing scarce and that the foreigners pay any price, as at the present exchange rate the most exorbitant charges seem still cheap to them.

The general aversion to work which came as a natural reaction after the hardships and deprivations of the war, and as a consequence of the new revolutionary "Liberty," lasted for about eight months. In the early autumn of 1919 the will to work began to come back to the people. To-day the majority are willing to exert themselves; only a terroristic minority opposes the return to labor, wishing to continue the revolutionary movement to the point of anarchy. But how shall the people be set to work without raw materials, and without sufficient food to make the masses physically fit for the task? The rich can afford to pay five or six times the price they formerly used to spend on the necessaries of life, but the masses can only subsist if the State, by paying the surplus on bread and meat prices, keeps them down at a normal level. How long will that last? There is still a small reserve stock of foodstuffs, especially of those supplied by America at a time when the German mark had not yet abnormally depreciated. But in March or April a severe crisis is to be expected. The scarcity of milk is the gravest calamity. Berlin, before the war, consumed a million liters of milk a day. At present it receives a daily supply of only 150,000 liters, as a great number of cows have had to be slaughtered and the rest yield less milk than before. American powdered milk is sold at M. 10 a packet, a price which only few people can pay. The children, the sick, and the old people are the chief sufferers. The Entente insists on the surrender by Germany of 140,000 more milch-cows, which means, at their present abnormally low yield, a daily loss of about one million liters.

Is it possible to organize the emigration of 15 million Germans within a sufficiently short period to prevent a grave crisis of unemployment and starvation in the coming years? The question implies its own denial. Germany is still in a somewhat better condition than Austria. There hunger scourges the country, and people are dying in masses. The mortality figures of last year in Vienna reveal a terrible scene of suffering. The death rate is twice what it was in peace time, and child mortality has risen by 300 per cent. In the clinics at Vienna new-born children are frozen to death, as the hospitals can not be heated. The price of firewood is prohibitive: two pounds of wet wood, which does not even burn, cost 1½ to 2 kronen. Since the beginning of the cold season 90 per cent. of the Viennese population have not had a coal or a log on the hearth. The few pounds that can be procured are used for cooking the dinner, if food can be found. The people are shivering in their houses until they can creep into bed. Jewelry, furniture, etc., are sold to get money for food. The birth of a child means fresh terror. A sick child is a doomed child. A well-known Viennese physician, a well-to-do man, lost last winter three children who all died of hunger-grippe; i. e., they were so weakened by hunger that their constitutions could not offer any resistance to the disease. A fourth child remained alive, thanks to a few weeks' visit, in the preceding summer, at the house of some kindly people in Switzerland who let it eat its fill.

But even worse than in Vienna is the condition of the German districts of Bohemia. The reporter of a Hamburg paper, who, in an automobile of the Hoover Commission, made a tour through the "German Hell," as the "Böhmisch-Sächsische Erzgebirge" is now called, gave the following description of his experience: "I saw the interpreter of the American Mission sob at the sight of the babies; I saw an American hospital-nurse, whose nerves had been hardened by a five years' lazaret service, drop unconscious in the presence of the starved skeleton of an old woman; I saw children of a year old who weighed less than at their birth; and I visited some large communities where 90 per cent. of the children were rachitic and do not learn to walk until they are three years old." Conditions as bad as these are as yet found only in a few parts of Germany. But they are indications of what will happen, if Germany is to be left without raw materials for her industries and the food supply from her own soil remains insufficient to feed the nation. The scarcity of both will have a paralyzing effect on German initiative and German hope.

It is, therefore, quite out of the question that Germany could plan an active economic campaign abroad, as without foreign support she can not even avoid a domestic catastrophe. That support must be given in the form of an immediate supply of raw materials and foodstuffs, and by a mitigation of those terms of the Peace of Versailles which, apart from the present acute distress, tend to paralyze the country's vitality. First among these are the uncertainty as to the amount which Germany will have to pay, and the possibility that any Entente Power which should remain lastingly hostile to the German people may interfere in Germany's economic life with negative, obstructive, and confiscatory measures in carrying out the provisions of the treaty.

Bolshevism has little chance of thriving in Germany. It could only gain ascendancy if distress and despair rose to such a height as is unavoidable in the event of national labor being left without the means of recovery. The Government can remain in control of the industrial masses only as long as it can secure them employment and a living wage, and if it possesses the means to keep a sufficiently large military force. German militarism is done for in consequence of the experiences and hardships of the war. The parties which are trying to revive the monarchical military aspirations of former days are actuated by the hope that such bitter need and unrest may develop as to cause the people, in their despair, to wish for a return of the old order. Neither is there any truth in the rumor that the Government is planning an alliance with Russia and a common Russo-German policy against western Europe. Such suspicions overestimate the energy and capacities of the men who are now at the head of the Government. The armed forces which Germany needs—and she needs more than the Entente will allow her—are wanted as a safeguard against internal anarchical crises, which are unavoidable if aid from abroad and mitigation of the peace terms are refused.

Dr. Paul Rohrbach

Berlin, December 23, 1919

Correspondence

"Two-thirds of Both Houses"

To the Editors of The Review:

In your issue of the 17th inst. under the caption of "Two-Thirds of Both Houses," you well say with reference to the vote upon the so-called Eighteenth Amendment:

> The objection thus raised rests on no finespun or metaphysical view; it is simply a question of fact. It was not "two-thirds of both houses," but only two-thirds of the members voting, that placed the Eighteenth Amendment before the Legislatures for ratification. The Supreme Court, when the case is brought before it, will have to pass upon the question whether two-thirds of the members voting are to be regarded as two-thirds of the House.

But this question has been before the United States Supreme Court. It is true it has not been before it with reference to the requisites to initiating a proposed constitutional amendment, but in connection with the provision relative to the passage of a bill over the presidential veto, which is:

> If after such reconsideration two-thirds of that house (i. e., the place of origin) shall agree to pass the bill, it shall be sent together with the objections to the other house, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered, and if approved by two-thirds of that house, it shall become a law.

The opinion in Missouri Pacific Ry. Co. v. Kansas, 248 U. S. 276, involving the so-called Webb-Kenyon Law with respect to inter-state traffic in liquor, handed down January 7, 1919, by the Court (with the same personnel as at present) interpreted this provision.

In ruling against the contention that "two-thirds" as thus used means two-thirds of the entire membership, the Court prefaced its decision with the following language (p. 279):

> In view, however, of the importance of the subject, and with the purpose not to leave unnoticed the grave misconceptions involved in the arguments by which the proposition relied upon is sought to be supported, we come briefly to dispose of the subject, and supported its conclusions by analogy to the practice on constitutional amendments, saying (p. 281):

> The identity between the provision of Article V of the Constitution giving the power by a two-thirds vote to submit amendments and the requirement we are considering as to the two-thirds vote necessary to override a veto make the practice as to the one applicable to the other.

As regards that practice, Chief Justice White said (p. 283):

> The settled rule, however, was so clearly and aptly stated by the Speaker, Mr. Reed, in the House, on the passage in 1898 of the amendment to the Constitution providing for the election of Senators by vote of the people, that we quote it . . . "The question is one that has been so often decided that it seems hardly necessary to dwell upon it. The provision of the Constitution says 'two-thirds of both houses.' What constitutes a House? A quorum of the membership, a majority, one-half and one more. That is all that is necessary to constitute a House to do all the business that comes before the House."

Now that somewhat similar language of the Constitution is before the Supreme Court for construction, it is necessary, if we are to reach a different result, to overcome the dictum of that tribunal in the course of its reasoning to sustain the validity of the Webb-Kenyon Act. Moreover, the ruling of Speaker Reed has to be disapproved, and—what then is to come of the constitutional change with respect to the popular election of senators?

The difficulty seems to have arisen from the fact that there is some uncertainty as to how many of the Congress voted in favor of the first ten amendments to the Constitution—The Bill of Rights—a most important feature of that instrument, itself appealed to for the overthrow of the Eighteenth Amendment, as violative of due process of law and the reserved rights of the States and those of the peoples of the States. These amendments were passed by the vote of two-thirds of those present—non constat, however, but that this vote was equivalent to two-thirds of the entire membership of both houses.

The question first arose when the Twelfth Amendment, providing for a change in the method of electing the President and Vice-President, was under consideration. In the House the Federalists objected to it as unconstitutional because instead of two-thirds the vote of the entire Senate, it had obtained the vote of only two-thirds of those present; but the Speaker ruled against the objection on the precedent set in the case of the first ten amendments (Ames, pp. 79, 295). The question arose next in 1861 when the so-called Corwin amendment, which sought to temporize with slavery, came up in the Senate, and the Chair's ruling that two-thirds of those present was sufficient was sustained by that body (Ames, p. 295). It did not arise in Congress again until the amendment which is the subject of the obiter remarks of the Supreme Court in the case of Missouri Pacific Ry. Co. v. Kansas, which has been previously referred to.

Here then are two structural features of our Constitution initiated admittedly by less than a two-thirds vote of the membership of both houses, though of course by not less than two-thirds of those present—so that the decision of the validity of the Eighteenth Amendment may involve the present method of choosing the President, the Vice-President and the Senate.

BENJAMIN TUSKA

New York, January 22

Col. Lynch's Catholicism

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

I wonder if you have good authority for saying that Col. Arthur Lynch is a Roman Catholic. Such is not the impression that I get from a striking chapter in his book, viz., "Priests in Politics." I spoke with him on Saturday night at the Economic Club of Portland, Me., and we both hammered the priests in the presence of the Roman Catholic Bishop of Portland, Dr. Walsh.

I feel very strongly that you are mistaken.

GEORGE L. FOX

New Haven, Conn., January 11

[There have been good Roman Catholics in all ages who were not afraid of hammering the priests. Colonel Lynch's hostility to priestcraft is no disproof of our statement, which was based on words spoken by Colonel Lynch himself in the course of the address we referred to: "Remember," he said, "I am not a Protestant, but it must be borne in mind that some of the most glorious leaders of Irish freedom have been Protestants." It seems to us that if Colonel Lynch was a Jew or an atheist he would not have used the negative phrase, which suggests Catholicism as its alternative. —Eds. THE REVIEW.]

An English University for New Jersey

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

At New Brunswick, New Jersey, a great educational transformation is now under way and the foundation is being laid of what, in a few years, is destined to be one of the largest and most brilliant of our Eastern university centres. The humanities are well intrenched at New Brunswick in that venerable institution, Rutgers College, whose birth occurred ten years before the American Revolution, whose history has been worthy of the best of those fine old Colonial colleges, and whose present activities are so admirably directed by Dr. Demarest. Schools of civil, electrical, and mechanical engineering represent creditably the scientific side of learning. Agriculture is well looked after by the State Experiment Station and Agricultural College, with Dr. Jacob G. Lipman of Cornell at their head. The new woman is not forgotten, for there is a very successful State College for Women, with Mrs. Douglass, of Barnard College, as dean, and there is even a long-established Theological Seminary with an admirable library, under the able management of Dr. John C. VanDyke.

The movement to coördinate these more or less separate schools and to bind them together as a university runs the risk of repeating in New Jersey the same mistake that was made in Massachusetts and in Connecticut, when two modest colleges were made to do duty for a great university organization, and what should have been called, and really made, New Haven University and Cambridge University, leaving Harvard and Yale Colleges parts of a larger whole, had to cope with a situation they were never intended to meet.

What will make this course all the more inexcusable if it is finally entered upon at New Brunswick, springs from the fact that Rutgers College, which some would expand into Rutgers University, is not the original name of the institution. For half a century it bore that of Queen's College, in honor of the consort of George III, who granted the first charter, and continued to be known as such down to 1825, notwithstanding our two wars with England.

Nor is this sentimental reason alone opposed to the proposed course. Ever since the Civil War the Rutgers trustees have been coquetting with the Legislature at Trenton, until the college has been officially pronounced both the State College and the State University. It is, therefore, fully in the power of the board to develop a university on the lines it sees fit, without returning to Trenton for authority.

If there ever was a form of university more suited to our genius and our ways, it is precisely that of Oxford and Cambridge, the only system known to John Harvard, Elihu Yale, Theodore Frelinghuysen, and the other promoters and founders of the early Colonial colleges, who, I feel sure, would be the first to protest against the abortive fashion in which their creations were treated towards the end of the second third of the nineteenth century. And now we see the authorities of Rutgers hesitating and groping, and perhaps about to let slip the almost unique occasion of giving us in America at least one institution of superior culture moving on the fine old English lines laid down by Oxford and Cambridge, where a group of rich and independent colleges and halls, each with its own governing body, its buildings, its library, its teachers, and its students, come together through their heads, and form the university which meets the outside world with united front, but which, within its own academic circle, never interferes with the entity of each of its component parts. How much more American is this plan than our present doubly autocratic form of university government, with its board of business men trustees and its all-powerful president, which has so often belittled and even disgraced our educational world!

THEODORE STANTON

New Brunswick, N. J., December 29, 1919

Coöperating with the Coöperatives

A LITTLE knowledge is a dangerous thing—especially when formulating foreign policy. The truth of this must have been borne in on Mr. Lloyd George by the developments of the week following the announcement of the Supreme Council at Paris with reference to the Russian blockade. To be sure, those who are wont to attribute to the Premier a Machiavellian subtlety of design will see in these developments the working out of a deep-laid plan to manœuvre the Allies into the position of recognizing the Soviet Government, for the purpose of satisfying the desires of radical labor and of meeting the insistent demands of British commercial interests. But when one recalls his Bryanic gaffes in recent speeches, such as confusing Novgorod (in western Russia) and Nizhni Novgorod (on the Volga) and his allusion to General "Kharkov" (a large city in south Russia), one is forced to the conclusion that his opportunist policy is due, not to knowledge of Russia, but to the lack of it. Indeed, the latest news indicates that Alexander Berkenheim, sometime foreign representative of the Central Union of Consumers' Coöperatives, was successful in imposing on him an utterly false view of the present status of these Coöperatives in Russia, a view which he grasped as a straw when faced with the necessity of meeting the crisis at Paris presented by the Bolshevik military danger.

Mr. Lloyd George is not alone in his confusion of mind concerning the Coöperative movement in Russia. The public generally has but a vague idea of the social and economic significance of this development. The tendency indeed has been to draw unjustifiable generalizations from insufficient data.

First, it must be understood that there are three distinct kinds of Coöperative societies in Russia, each with its own origin and course of development. In recent years these have tended to draw together, and the great Coöperative congresses have brought about a certain unity and community of action, but in some vital features they remain different and separate. These three classes are the Producers' Coöperatives, the Societies of Mutual Credit, and the Consumers' Coöperatives.

The Producers' Coöperatives are a peculiarly Russian institution, having originated in the artel, or primitive guild, which dates back to the Middle Ages. In the artel a group of workmen—fishermen, woodworkers, weavers, blacksmiths, or other artisans—would band themselves together for a particular task or for a special industrial undertaking, select their own foreman, carry on their work, and then divide the proceeds of their labor. They might work for themselves or on a contract. They might even borrow capital. Naturally, under serfdom this institution did not have much opportunity to develop on a large scale; still, it persisted. But in 1865, Mr. Nicholas Vereshchagin, a brother of the famous artist, who had devoted his life to agriculture and especially to the development of the dairy industry, established on his estate a small coöperative creamery, a sort of model artel. This may be said to be the beginning of the modern Producers' Coöperatives. The idea did not meet with rapid success, but it was kept alive, and a generation later suddenly took a fresh start and made tremendous strides. The present century has seen it grow in the province of Vologda and in western Siberia until now it constitutes an enormous undertaking. To-day, the Union of Siberian Creamery Associations operates some 2,380 coöperative creameries, conducts more than 2,000 stores, warehouses, repair-shops, etc., produces over 50,000 tons of butter a year, and handles millions of dollars' worth of other produce for its members. These latter number over 3,000,000. Hundreds of other Producers' Coöperatives sprang up, including flax-growers, tar-producers, poultry-raisers, and numerous craftsmen's organizations. Slightly different, yet in harmony with the movement and based upon the same folk institution, were agricultural coöperative societies which started in the late sixties, and which began to receive special government encouragement at the end of the last century. The Consumers' Coöperatives had two strong points in their favor. In the first place they were not an artificial creation, but grew out of a natural Russian institution. In the second place they had in general good management, since they were usually run by men who had been developed from the ranks, and who were therefore men of practical experience. This to a large extent accounts for their stability and substantial success.

Credit Coöperation may be dealt with very briefly, despite its importance. The idea of mutual associations of small credit came from Germany, and was first introduced into Russia in the sixties. Its purpose was the encouragement of peasant agriculture, and its first task was the education of the people to an understanding of the benefits of coöperation in credit. Later the Government, which was in general suspicious of all such movements, recognized its value and issued laws establishing model charters and bringing to its assistance the support of the State Bank. Out of the mutual credit movement grew the organization in 1912 of the Moscow Narodny (People's) Bank, which became the central institution for financing all coöperative undertakings.

The Consumers' Coöperative movement followed the other two. While it was based on the principles of the Rochdale system, there were two conditions particularly favorable to its spread in Russia. The first was the tendency towards coöperation in production as mentioned above. The second was the extreme simplicity of the peasants' wants, which limited the stocks required in coöperative stores to comparatively few articles. The demand for increasing facilities for distribution, especially after the famine of 1891, gave great impetus to the expansion of the Consumers' Coöperatives, and in 1897 the Government issued a model constitution and by-laws for the organization of these coöperative societies. In 1898, as a result of the first congress of consumers' societies, held at Nizhni Novgorod, there was founded the Moscow Union of Consumers' Societies, and this in turn was, in 1916, reorganized into the Central Union of Consumers' Societies, familiarly termed the "Centrosoyuz."

Up to the time of the war, the development of these societies had been normal and steady, but with the breakdown of private means of distribution under the strain of war conditions and in the presence of the eager demand for manufactured goods of all kinds, the Consumers' Coöperatives took a sudden spurt forward and increased by thousands. This growth was abnormal, and with it came many irregularities and abuses. Two of these are noteworthy, the lack of experienced and competent management, and the use of some of these coöperative societies for purposes of speculation and profiteering by the men who gained control of them. So, for example, manufacturers who had patriotically taken measures to prevent profiteering in the products of their factories and who, for this reason, sold almost their whole output to the Coöperatives, began to find that the managers of the latter were frequently turning over invoices of goods directly to speculators at 50 per cent. to 100 per cent. profit. In the hands of clever and unscrupulous manipulators, these Coöperatives had departed far from the principles of mutual coöperation for the benefit of all their members.

When the Bolsheviki came into power, they were confronted with the fact that these Coöperatives represented a membership running into millions, and they hesitated at first to take steps, in accordance with their programme, calculated to antagonize them. It must be borne in mind that the peasant population of Russia is not at all Socialistic and that the Coöperative movement was based on a purely capitalistic foundation, its object being merely to eliminate the middleman between the producer and consumer. After the Bolsheviki had consolidated their authority and acquired a military force to carry out their will, they attempted to put into effect their programme of the nationalization of trade. In the cities, the Soviet stores took the place of the Coöperatives, but in the country their attempted organization fell down, and they were obliged to come back to the Coöperatives. They did not do so, however, without taking steps to turn these organizations to their own purposes, or at least to exercise a careful supervision over them. In December, 1918, they seized the Moscow Narodny Bank and made it a division of their State Bank. Fresh decrees were issued with reference to membership in the Coöperatives, and gradually, although the Coöperatives in the country districts continued to do everything possible to supply local needs and keep up the past traditions of the movement, they fell more and more under the direction of Commissars, until, a couple of months ago, the official Bolshevik press announced with satisfaction that the Coöperatives were entirely in Bolshevik hands and had become a Bolshevik institution.

Considerable mystery surrounds the mission of Alexander Berkenheim, one of the officials of the Centrosoyuz, who was suddenly released from a Bolshevik prison in Moscow last year and permitted to go abroad as a representative of the Centrosoyuz. In this country he made overtures both to the Government and to business men, proposing to ship in goods to be distributed by the Coöperatives independently of the Soviet Government. He was unable to give any guarantees that such goods would not be taken over by the Soviet Government and used for its own purposes to the detriment of the civilian population, and the State Department refused to grant him permits for shipments to Bolshevik Russia. In many circles there was a strong suspicion that he had an understanding of some sort with the Soviet authorities, who saw in his proposal a strong lever with which to force the lifting of the blockade.

Later he went to England, where now he seems to have had more success. It looks as if his interviews with Mr. Lloyd George and with English business men, greedy for Russian trade, had resulted in bringing about the announcement of the Supreme Council at Paris. The most remarkable feature of this is that, within a week after this announcement was issued, Berkenheim and his assistant, Krovopuskov, were constrained to admit the falsity of their earlier claims that it was possible to do business with the Coöperatives independently of the Soviet Government. It is impossible to say what the result will be. To be sure, the final paragraph of the announcement of the Supreme Council states definitely that no change in policy towards the Soviet Government is implied, but the hopes held out for the opening of Russia to trade have so whetted the appetite of businessmen that the announcement may prove but the opening wedge to recognition of the Bolshevik régime. In this connection, it must be pointed out that the statement issued by the authorities at Moscow places the Supreme Council between the horns of a serious dilemma. To Russians, even those who are most strongly anti-Bolshevik, it displays a dignity and assurance that appeals to their national pride at a time when they are smarting under the contemptuous and even insulting treatment accorded to them by the Allies. They believe that England and France are both interested in dismembering and weakening Russia, and they see in the despatch of British war ships to the Black Sea a plan to destroy the remainder of the Russian fleet under cover of the excuse of war with the Bolshevik forces. Two years of Allied diplomatic blundering have led to a menacing impasse, and it would seem that only some startling change within Russia itself could serve to avert a catastrophe.

JEROME LANDFIELD

Book Reviews

Beneficent Results of a Wicked War

AFTER THE WHIRLWIND. By Charles Edward Russell. New York: George H. Doran Company.

THE behavior of the Socialists of the world during the great war was in some respects surprising and disappointing to themselves and to those who trusted in them, although it was not very different from what their wiser leaders had expected, and their keener critics had often predicted. For years they had done lip-service to internationalism, but when the storm burst this superstructure went by the board and they were carried along with their compatriots upon the tide of nationalism toward the rocks and shoals which they had detected so cleverly and charted with so much care. The German Socialists were especially disappointing, because they were so numerous —more than forty per cent. of the population, according to some estimates—and because of their loud professions of pacifism and their fervent appeals to the solidarity of the proletariat in all countries. Yet they voted for the extraordinary war credit of April, 1913; and in July and August, 1914, instead of declaring a general strike, they were almost, if not quite, as keen for war as the ignorant masses who made no pretensions to pacifism. Only a few fanatics, like Karl Liebknecht, tried to oppose the general movement and prophesied disaster, no matter whether Germany lost or won the war.

Oddly enough, socialism was taken more seriously in other countries, and it almost looks as though it had been a part of German propaganda—a disease more virulent abroad than in the country of its origin. However that may be, many Socialists in the Allied countries opposed the war, and if their advice had been taken, Germany would have dominated the world, with a faint hope of social revolution as the only consolation of those who still believed in liberty and democracy. Certainly, Socialists in Italy came near delivering that country into the hands of the Austrians; Russian Socialists dealt a staggering blow to the Allies; and if the majority of American Socialists had had their way, the United States would not have entered the war, or, after going in, would have carried it on in a half-hearted way.

Needless to say, Charles Edward Russell was not of the majority faction in the Socialist Party. Together with Charlotte Perkins Gilman, William English Walling, William L. Stoddard, Upton Sinclair, William J. Ghent, J. G. Phelps Stokes, and others, he signed a protest against the official action of the Socialist Party with respect to war and national defense, which was published in the New York Call on March 24, 1917. This document stated that Socialists do not condemn defensive war, but realize that, as Hillquit says, it would be foolish and futile to preach complete disarmament to any nation while its neighbors and rivals are armed, and that each nation must be prepared to defend its integrity and independence against the rest of the world. Here are a few of the sentences of this fine manifesto:

> We feel that the present opposition of the Socialist Party to national defence is contrary to the interests of democracy and contrary to the hitherto accepted views of the international Socialist movement. We are for peace, but not at any cost; and believe that the sacrifice of integrity and of general public and private self-respect is too high a price to pay for it. Although as a nation we are politically free, yet we are but a part of the social world, and as such we are glad that the isolation of our country is past. To refuse to resist international crime is to be unworthy of the name of Socialist. It is our present duty to the cause of Internationalism to support our Government in any sacrifice it requires in defence of those principles of international law and order which are essential alike to Socialism and to civilization.

Apparently, the minority Socialists of the United States and the majority of German Socialists were in the same boat in that they temporarily abandoned their internationalism. But if, as Mr. Russell believes, the German Socialists, deluded by their masters, were waging an unrighteous war, while the Socialists of America were defending the liberties of the world, the latter were the true champions of internationalism, and the former had denied the faith. Yet Mr. Russell does not blame them very much for their betrayal of democracy; nor does he blame the German people as a whole for blindly following their unscrupulous leaders, but he does affirm that the German Government was the real culprit, and that it did not represent the German people. It is, of course, quite "unscientific" to blame anybody, but Mr. Russell does not pose as a "scientific" Socialist and does not say much about economic determinism. Yet he injects a little of that into his explanation of the war in that he mentions the enormous growth of Germany's population since 1870, her need of colonies as sources of raw materials, her desire for seaports on the Atlantic, and the tendency toward expansion of the Empire in Europe by the annexation of the small neighboring states. He ventures, too, upon a sweeping generalization in saying that the theory of German supremacy was no more than the logical ultimate of the theory of competition endorsed and practised by all nations.

There were, then, according to Mr. Russell, at least two villains in the play—the mediæval monarchy of Germany, with its aristocracy and its militarism, and the competitive economic system that served to choke the spiritual life and exalt the material—the former playing a conspicuous and magnificent rôle, the latter skulking in the background as the evil genius, suggesting, if not controlling, the whole performance. A third influence, subsidiary but not less potent, was the military success of Germany in '66 and '70, which gave the whole German people a feeling of superiority, a desire for power, and a belief in manifest destiny that could find complete satisfaction in nothing less than world dominion. The very character of the people seems to have changed; they acquiesced grimly while their Government prepared relentlessly for the Day; and when the time was ripe a pretext was found and the dance of death began.

It is not easy to follow Mr. Russell's argument because of his florid style and his frequent digressions and exhortations, but such appears to be his conception of the tangled skein of world affairs, which now, after the whirlwind, proceeds to untangle itself in miraculous fashion. Germany has been defeated, and now, chastened and subdued, her people have renounced their vain ambitions, thrown off their evil institutions, reformed their ideals, and the world has nothing more to fear from them. No republic is a menace to the world's peace, nor could be, for secret plottings are impossible when the people rule. Of course, some remnants of capitalism are still there, but these will presently pass away in Germany and in all other countries. In France, Great Britain, and the United States, the Governments took control of the railways in order to win the war, managed them with marvelous efficiency and economy, and will never restore them to private ownership. The income tax in various countries is such a heavy charge on great incomes that private enterprise is discouraged and the Governments will have to take up the burden of saving and investment which capitalists are laying down. The laborers, who have played so noble a part in the war, will not relinquish their power, nor will they patiently accept a lower standard of living. The shop-steward movement in Great Britain is an omen of a new day for labor in all countries, when labor will be consulted on all matters, and even be represented on the directorate of every industrial corporation. If the Federal Reserve Board can supply part of our banking needs, it can supply them all, and if the Government can lend to farmers, it can lend to merchants, manufacturers, and wage-earners. The remarkable success of the American Government in the conduct of the war gives reason to think that it can carry on all important industries far better than private owners, and when this is fully realized "the industrial system that has cursed mankind and blighted so many millions of lives will pass away with the other anomalies of the dead old Night."

Mr. Russell must wish that he had been more cautious in his prophecies; for already some of his predictions have been refuted by the logic of events, and others appear to have but slight foundation of fact. His thesis that most of the ills that flesh is heir to are to be attributed to capitalism must seem strange to the historian who finds evidence of human misery long before the advent of Capitalism, and knows that the most wretched people in the world to-day are not those who live in the most civilized or capitalistic countries. Similarly, Mr. Russell's glorification of governmental efficiency must surprise himself as he considers his own observation and experience of enormous waste incurred during the war—a waste which was probably justified by the absolute necessity of winning the war at any cost of life or property, but which would bring speedy ruin to industrial enterprise in time of peace. Efficiency, as has been often pointed out, is not to be defined in terms of service only, but as the rendering of a maximum of service at a minimum of cost.

J. E. Le Rossignol

Kipling—First and Last Impressions

Rudyard Kipling's Verse, Inclusive Edition, 1885-1919. New York: Doubleday, Page and Company.

About thirty years ago a young Anglo-Indian poet surprised the English-speaking world with a new brand of lyric energy. In power he had often been matched and overmatched, but in sheer force it was hard to name his equal. Men had to brace or arm themselves to listen; he aroused a consternation which turned into delight or recoil according to the stoutness of the temper which received the impact of his blows. That he was a poet it seemed hard to question. His subjects might disquiet; his diction might amaze; but lyricism is the heart of poetry, and speed is almost the heart of lyricism, and lyric speed was the essence and distinction of Mr. Kipling's verse. His knowledge was great, it was practical and technical to an extraordinary and disconcerting degree; and the weight of his knowledge in relation to the energy of his movement made a powerful locomotive drawing a heavy goods train seem the precise and lively image of his genius. This knowledge had its novel and special field; his filiation to England by race, to India by birth, gave him a divided loyalty which he could solidify only by making himself a citizen and votary of the British Empire.

There are several first impressions of Mr. Kipling which later experience wholly or partly confutes. First of all comes the idea that he is a poet of things. Now Mr. Kipling is the poet of humanity in the gripe of things, but the thing by itself and for itself hardly figures in his verse. At most, you will find a bell-buoy or a coastwise light taking form as an active—almost a living—part of the wardership and stewardship of the earth-belting British Empire. Go with him into the engine-room of a steamship in the famous "McAndrew's Hymn." He knows the apparatus like a mechanic, and his sole aim at first is apparently to deafen and dizzy you with the uproar of his technicalities; but this is appearance only; he is not studying that engine, he is dredging the soul of its engineer. The British Empire itself is valuable to him chiefly as a whetstone for British human nature.

The second partly misleading thing in Mr. Kipling is the seeming imperiousness which consorts so well at the first glance with the task of the lyrist of empire. The word "peremptory" comprehends much of the surface man. The call to verse was peremptory, the nature of that verse is peremptory, its themes are peremptory necessities, and the gospel it enforces is peremptory in a superlative degree. But all this is half illusion.

No man seems freer from the littleness of dictatorship. This imperiousness is sometimes associated with a high and proud humility of which the august "Recessional" is the deathless witness and example. But his disposition is evinced most clearly in his choice of a protagonist for his verse. That choice fixed itself, not on royalty or premiership or martial fame or domination in any form, but on Tommy Atkins, private, butt, drudge, and underling, shoved from land to land, till the enemy's ball and the friend's spade insure him an abiding rest. To this humility the high-mettled Kipling bows himself. Energy, in God's name, but energy in obedience—not Prometheus defying Jove, but Hercules serving Eurystheus in mighty labors—is the ideal of the singer of the "White Man's Burden."

A third possible impression—and this time an entirely mistaken impression—in regard to Mr. Kipling is that he is an egotist. The literary evidence points to the conclusion that no man living is more self-forgetful. Lyrics, among all forms of literature, are the occasion, the excuse, almost the justification, of egotism. Yet here is a man who has written seven hundred and seventy pages of lyrics in which it is actually rather difficult to find a poem which is strictly personal or individual in its theme. It is always the other man's feeling, or the feeling that he shares with the other man, that provides the inspiration and incentive for his verse. Mr. Kipling loved and married in America; we can well believe that "never man sighed truer breath." Yet who can point out the poem in which that experience has shaped or tinged the verse? At long intervals, in some literary context most commonly, a dedication or an ode "To the True Romance," an allusion to himself or a personal note sparingly reveals itself. After all, why not? In his broad outlook upon the English race throughout the "Seven Seas," even Rudyard Kipling deserves a passing glance.

The fourth possible impression in regard to Mr. Kipling is that his view of life is blithe and heartening. He writes poems of adventure, and adventure sets our hearts aglow. He writes military verse, and military verse takes its keynote from the bugle. Yet if we discriminate Mr. Kipling's words from his voice, I think we shall find that the voice alone is cheerful; the words are sad. What is the most buoyant of his volumes, the volume that one would instinctively select if one sought to enliven a programme or a party? "Barrack-Room Ballads," undoubtedly. What is the first of "Barrack-Room Ballads?" "Danny Deever"—the story of a heart-chilling hanging. What is the best of them? "Gunga Din"—the story of an Indian water-carrier, reviled by those he loyally serves, shot finally upon the battlefield. What is another of the best? "Tommy"—a picture of British ingratitude and injustice to the private soldier. The "Song of the Banjo" should be a cheerful poem; it has a line that sears itself into the memory: "And the thoughts that burn like iron if you think." In the picture of army life, the facts are black, unless you presuppose the heroic temper in the spectator. Mr. Kipling treats them with a certain blitheness only because his temper is heroic. His philosophy is supposed to be superficial. In some respects the charge is just, but it remains true that Mr. Kipling from his earliest youth had grasped a basic principle of life and conduct which many people do not learn until middle or old age and which many more die without learning. That truth may be phrased thus: Life as datum, as mere material, is hard and raw, and the only means of extracting from it such happiness as it is capable of yielding is to relate ourselves to that hardness and rawness in some efficient, counteractive way. Pessimism plus heroism equals optimism—that is the formula for Mr. Kipling, if you concede that he is optimistic at all. It is this that removes the boyishness from his notion of empire. Empire is not booty; empire is debt. Possession is the call to toil and sacrifice.

The last of the possible mistakes in relation to Mr. Kipling is a mistake that has almost ceased to be possible; I have in mind the notion that he is immoral. At first sight, the breakneck pace had every appearance of a runaway; a little time showed that the driver kept his seat and his self-possession. In "Departmental Ditties," he reveled in cynicism. In early days Mr. LeGallienne deplored his militancy. The Nation called his "Truce of the Bear" his "retrocessional." When his soldier in "Mandalay" cried out: "Ship me somewhere east of Suez, where the best is like the worst," we forgot that the dropped scruples in the poem might pertain to Mr. Kipling as little as its dropped h's. The poet doubtless errs in particular moral judgments like the rest of us, but in spirit he is the most moral of beings, since the subordination of desires to necessities is not only his doctrine but his instinct. The cynicism was passing and partial; his calmness in the face of certain sexual misdemeanors was simply a part of that English good sense which views the inevitable—anywhere—with calmness. In his political opinions he may be sometimes partial and narrow, vehement and extreme; that will affect the soundness of his teaching, but will not threaten his place as the prophet and singer of responsibility. Mr. Kipling is effectually west of Suez, and the call of Mandalay finds no response in the steadfastness of his maturity.

Three things have made Mr. Kipling. The first is that simple, primal force, that Viking or Berserker energy, which made the man and all his words projectiles. The second was the consecration which this half-barbaric force received from its combination with sympathies and aspirations, which, if earthy in their content, were beautiful in their disinterestedness. The third was the circumstance—almost the accident—which supplied a novel field for the exercise of these capacities. That circumstance was Mr. Kipling's birth, the division of loyalty between England and India with its resulting concentration of loyalty on the union and conflux of these powers in the British Empire.

The collected edition of Mr. Kipling's verse will do nothing to dispel the prevalent impression that his power as poet has materially abated. After 1893, the fertility shrinks, the range contracts, and the force dwindles. The descent has almost the gradation and regularity of a terrace. I know of no body of verse in which a date comes so close to being an estimate as the poetry of Mr. Kipling after the "Seven Seas." There is tactics—possibly there is tact—in an editorial arrangement which throws poems of all dates indiscriminately into one receptacle. One is reminded of those early formations in the late war in which Americans, supposedly weak, were set side by side with tried French and British troops who might cover and sustain their inadequacy. The Americans hardly needed that defense; some protection, some convoy or escort, is undoubtedly needed for the later poems of Mr. Kipling. Of course the inferiority is only comparative. Mr. Kipling to-day does not write like a dull man; he writes like other bright men. It is so much easier to be bright than to be Kipling.

I do not understand this falling-off quite so clearly as I like to understand things, but one or two conjectures may be risked. Mr. Kipling is humanist, not materialist; yet the forms of humanity which appeal to him find their settings and promptings in a world of ardent physical endeavor. Now it is easier to write about Thor and Vulcan at twenty-five than at fifty. Again, his helplessness in the hands of Nature, which gave his earlier works almost the validity of a natural force, took from him all capacity to adapt, to modify, to re-create himself. He uttered nothing but finalities; that was his strength; but it involved the disadvantage that these finalities for other people were ultimata for himself. He had spoken out with rare freedom and abundance in his marvelous youth; and in later years, no new India, no new Tommy, appeared to replenish the declining store of his incentives. But the main point is always the sum of worth in his entire product, not the distribution of that value through the successive periods of his life. If one feels age in the newer verses, the youth of the elder ones is unimpaired. I can not but feel that there is much in this volume which will lastingly interest our time, and that there are parts of it which the centuries will treasure.

O. W. Firkins

Folks and Folk

Dust of New York. By Konrad Bercovici. New York: Boni and Liveright.

Their Son: The Necklace. By Eduardo Zamacois. Translated by George Allan England. New York: Boni and Liveright.

Lo, and Behold Ye! By Seumas MacManus. New York: Frederick A. Stokes Company.

Seldwyla Folks: Three Singular Tales. By Gottfried Keller. Translations by Wolf Von Schierbrand, Ph.D.

In "Dust of New York," by Konrad Bercovici, we are aware of an extraordinary "saturation" in the color and atmosphere of polyglot New York. In its topography he is especially learned. "The map of Europe is reproduced in New York by the different nationalities living there; each nationality having as neighbor the same that it has in Europe. Thus, the Greeks, Turks, Syrians, and Italians are close neighbors in Europe, and also here. The same thing applies to the Russians, who are neighbors with the Rumanians, the Poles, the Austrians, and the Germans. And one must not think," pursues our commentator, "that love attracts them. They hate one another as whole-heartedly as only neighbors can hate one another. Perhaps this mutual hatred attracts them: Hatred is not as bad as we have been taught to think. One can, and generally does, love lower than himself, but no one hates lower than himself." These, after all, are surface facts, from which we pass to subtler matters of racial contact and admixture:

> Walk through Grand Street from Third Avenue to Clinton Street, which is not a long distance, and you have the types of the whole world before you. They are not in concentrated form; they are diluted. But if you analyze, even hurriedly, you will soon be able to know the components of each one of them. . . . A remote Tartar ancestor of one of the push-cart peddlers is plainly seen in the small sunken black eyes. In another the straight line of the back of the head tells you that his mother, or his grandmother, had lived once in Hungary. In another one the Slav type, the flat fleshy nose, is mixed with the Wallachian strong chin. Some Teuton blood calls out through the heavy cast of an otherwise typical Austrian Jew. A Spanish grandee, as if come out from a page of Cervantes, is selling shoe laces and cuff buttons. And a Moroccan prince, ill at ease in European garb, is offering to the passerby some new Burbankian fig-plum-orange combination.

Out of such materials the tales in this book are wrought. The striking and somewhat pathetic thing about them is that they are wrought over-cleverly according to the current fashion of the American "short story." Strange portent of that literary melting-pot, the American magazine, when names like Achmed Abdullah and Konrad Bercovici stand among the most skilful practitioners of the "O. Henry" method! Here are the snappy introductions and the punchy endings of that great original, the buttonholing manner and the sentimental-cynical philosophy. Unluckily for the present teller of tales, something in him scorns the facile "happy ending" of Anglo-American prescription; and we have the anomaly of a Saturday Evening Post style and a Continental preoccupation with fact and with type at the expense of situations and endings as such.

With two tales by Eduardo Zamacois, still another leader of the new Spanish literary movement is introduced to English readers, a fresh prophet of the resurgimiento for us to put alongside Blasco-Ibañez and Baroja and Benavente. "This man," says the translator, "is a human dynamo, a revitalizing force in Spanish life and letters, an artist who is more than a mere artist; he is a man with a message, a philosophy and a vision." Rather oddly, we hear in the next breath that to his present interpreter, "Zamacois seems a Spanish Guy de Maupassant." In these exhibits, certainly, one finds more of the detached irony of the French story-teller than of philosophy or vision. "Their Son" and "The Necklace" are vivid and sardonic studies in minor tragedy, the overthrow of simple goodness or youthful idealism by the malice of fate. That goodness and idealism may be their own ultimate justification, and reward is not, at least, denied.

We may step back with frank relief, however, into the safe and comfortable zone of the folk-tale as rendered by Mr. MacManus. The author of "Ballads of a Country Boy" has had his honorable place in the poetic renascence of Ireland. But his most distinctive work is the series of volumes of folk-stories, of which "Lo, and Behold Ye!" is the latest. There we breathe clear of the somewhat musky symbolism which has so often hung about the "Neo-Celtic" muse, and are at home with the quaint and hearty humor of the Irish peasant who lives in the present without forgetting the past. Here once more is the chronicle, Hibernically flavored, of those deathless matters with which folk-fancy has always busied itself; the triumph of cunning, the triumph of brawn, the triumph of young love and of clean blood, the overthrow of witches and dragons and giants and cruel kings; the fulfillment of prophecies and the voidance of unholy maledictions. But as the story-teller brings them to us fresh from his own sources, we forget their hoary age, or dimly welcome it as a sign of old beloved intimacy; and taste again with relish the dish with which our literary feast long since began. I have just read these tales to a boy of eight years, and don't know which of us enjoyed them most.

Something of the same quality, though in more sophisticated form, belongs to the "Seldwyla Folks" of Gottfried Keller. "The Three Decent Combmakers" may be recognized as the story of the clever apprentice who outwits his fellows and marries the heiress; and "Dietegen" as the tale of the foundling who after many vicissitudes becomes master in the strange place of his adoption. "Romeo and Juliet of the Village," with its (in the conventional sense) unhappy ending, is upon less stable ground—the least effective of the three tales, as it happens, tedious in structure and relatively crude at least in its English form. Keller's work appears belatedly in English. He was a German-Swiss poet and story-teller born in 1819 and educated in Germany; author of several didactic novels, much verse, and "Die Leute von Seldwyla," a series in two volumes of whimsical studies of Swiss life from which the three stories here translated are taken. They belong to their century. If the deliberate and demure humor of "The Three Decent Combmakers" seems vaguely familiar, it is perhaps because of a certain kinship with our own literary humor of that period—the humor, say, of the Sleepy Hollow Irving and the Tanglewood Tales Hawthorne. The translator rather goes out of his way to insist that Keller was a Swiss and not a German writer. But though we may take it on his word that there is a strong Helvetian twist to the original text, its genius is clearly Teutonic, as was the breeding of the author. He is, at all events, a writer who should be known to readers who are extending rapidly, thanks to the new enterprise of our publishers, their hitherto provincial or purely racial knowledge of the world's treasures of imaginative fiction.

H. W. Boynton

Beyond the Fields We Know

Tales of Three Hemispheres. By Lord Dunsany. Boston: John W. Luce & Company.

In the two hemispheres we know more or less about, Lord Dunsany pretends now and then to set his story. But his heart is in the Third Hemisphere—the Hemisphere at the Back of the Map, which lies beyond the Fields We Know. And, indeed, even when we think for a moment that we are in the high wolds beyond Wiltshire, or looking out on the Tuileries gardens, or checked short for a peep at the cloud-capped tower of the Woolworth Building, we are pretty sure to be in, before long, for a meeting with the Old Gods, the gods whom Time has put to sleep. It is as well for the world to maintain an ambassador to these courts; the old gods wake up now and then.

Most assuredly Lord Dunsany gets an effect; and an effect quite different from that wrought upon us by realms longer familiar that yet seem to brighten, dim and distant, on the horizons which he casts about us. Sindibad sailed hereabouts, but did not quite venture to touch on these shores. Somewhere between here and there lies the land of the Prester John. Was it—sometimes we think it was—amid the desolate walls of Balclutha that we heard that note before? Or was it struck from the dulcimer by the narrow fingers of an Abyssinian maid, when our hearts were hungry for Mount Abora? Certainly, something very like it was a bit away to the left when we took the Thirty-Mile Ride to the brushwood pile—the time They were after us, you remember? When we ventured into the Hall of Eblis by the side of young Vathek, or were with Shibli Bagarag when he shaved Shagpat, the son of Shimpoor, the son of Shoolpi, the son of Shullum, as it is written by one who, for all he said he was making an Arabian Entertainment, had surely been aforetime a mabinog to one of his own Welsh bards—

But it is useless to attempt a definition of the Land of Dreams. You slip into it as into an habitual garment, or not at all. "It was evident," says Lord Dunsany, "that he had been drinking bak." Quite obvious, indeed. It could not have seemed a bit more natural if we had been assured that he had been drinking Woldery wine itself. We should have known it anyway, without being told. Drifting down the Yann, drinking on occasion the captain's yellow wine "which he kept apart among his sacred things," listening to the prayers of the sailors and to their pleasant talk about fair Belzoond and the little neighboring cities of Durl and Duz, touching at Mandaroon, Perdóndaris (here you may read, in addition, of the destruction of Perdóndaris and how it was avenged), and so to Bar-wul-Yann, the Gate of Yann, one does not need, reading this, to have drifted in the flesh down the Irrawaddy, stumbling upon jungle fowl among the ruins of Amárapura, viewing the spacious temples of Pagán and the twin towns of Minbu and Magwe, in order to cry, "Yea, even so it all is." To say that the Yann is not the Irrawaddy is to be somewhat on the way toward saying what it is.

Whoso does not already move about in this world of dreams with certain step and welcoming eye will not find his way thither for all Lord Dunsany's telling. Whoso makes too much of a little matter of allegorical grit will not rightly enjoy his dish of strawberries and cream. Of such, the cat who dwells on the other side of Go-by Street may well ask: "What does he know about anything?" and answer, after a little pause, "Nothing." Very likely the cat will say that in either case. But one who cares not at all for these things, let him go fetch down high prices, or find out the truth about Russia, or catch a falling star, as he chooses—and can.

The Run of the Shelves

THE cover of Donald Hankey's little book, the "Cross" (Dutton), is a very pretty, but a pale, almost a pallid, blue. It is sky-color attenuated. That phrase is exactly descriptive of the quality of the contents of the book. The best words it contains, the only words that come home to us, are the following on a fly-leaf: Donald Hankey, Born at Brighton, 1884, Enlisted August, 1914, Killed in Action October 12, 1916. However, let no one suppose that there is anything wrong or silly or even positively weak in the book. It is serene and humane; it is sound after a fashion; its sincerity is incontestable. But its soundness does not make it strong. Its sincerity does not make it strong. The ratification of that sincerity by its author's gallant death in battle does not make it strong. It is a book that will comfort and sustain the predisposed, but the problem of the world, which it attempts to solve, arises very largely out of the increasing rarity of the predisposition. The book which is very, very short, urges its readers to follow the self-sacrificing example of a man who, among other instances of self-forgetfulness, preached to his fellow-Galileans for nothing. The book itself costs seventy-five cents.

"The Book of a Naturalist," a pot-pourri of articles, some carefully, some casually written, and many years apart, adds little to Mr. W. H. Hudson's literary fame and detracts considerably from our estimate of him as a naturalist. The themes vary from cheap, bourgeois anecdotes, such as "The Heron as a Table-bird," to the exquisite essay on the "Serpent in Literature." We revel in the diction of his chapters on snakes, but we lament the logic of his explanation of the forked tongue, which he claims renders its owner visible to approaching enemies, and invisible to the prey which the snake is stalking.

The fifty-odd pages of uncompromising attack on the domestic dog is likely to invite attention. Hudson writes, "The dog's affection for his master . . . is in reality a very small and a very low thing," and again elsewhere, "I have a friendly feeling toward pigs generally, and consider them the most intelligent of beasts, not excepting the elephant and the anthropoid ape—the dog is not to be mentioned in this connection." Sentiment entirely aside, these are not the words of a sincere naturalist, but a statement of false psychology. Judged as an uncorrelated assemblage of various newspaper and magazine articles it is far inferior to similar volumes by Ray Lancester, Arthur Thompson, and Harting.

Hudson describes in inimitable language the museum something that was a snake; that "spiral-shaped, rigid, cylindrical piece of clay-colored gutta-percha, no longer capable of exciting strange emotions in us—the unsightly dropped coil of a spirit that was fiery and cold." And then the living serpent, "not seen distinctly as in a museum or laboratory, dead on a table, but in an atmosphere and surroundings that take something from and add something to it; seen at first as a chance disposition of dead leaves or twigs or pebbles on the ground—a handful of Nature's mottled riffraff blown or thrown fortuitously together so as to form a peculiar pattern; all at once, as by a flash, it is seen to be no dead leaves or twigs or grass, but a living, active coil, a serpent lifting its flat arrowy head, vibrating a glistening forked tongue, hissing with dangerous fury; and in another moment it has vanished into the thicket, and is nothing but a memory—merely a thread of brilliant color woven into the ever-changing varicolored embroidery of Nature's mantle, seen vividly for an instant, then changing to dull grey and fading from sight." This is magnificent, but no man has a right to belittle the plodding scientist and exalt the field naturalist who has not submitted every word to the censorship of their mutual goddess. No poetry of Maeterlinck or phrase of Fabre was ever the worse for truth.

The man who can not laugh more than once in reading Oliver Herford's "This Giddy World" (Doran), and who doesn't chuckle all the time that he isn't laughing, is fit for treason, spoils, and stratagems. He does not deserve to be reckoned a member of "the most moral and patriotic people in the world, [whose] army is second to none in bravery, and won the World War." As a work on geography it is as accurate and authentic as it is amusing. The only error we discover is a reference to Lief Ericsen. We seem to recall a verse in which that hardy navigator (Ericson, by the way) protests that he'd

Just as lief you called it Leif.

With this trifling reservation the treatise can be heartily recommended.

"The Burgess Bird Book for Children," by Thornton W. Burgess (Little, Brown), is a very clever, delicately executed book of birds. The author has encased a remarkable amount of nutritious fundamental fact in a sugar-coating of humanized wood-folk, which ought to give pleasure to hosts of children. Brer Rabbit—here alias Peter Rabbit—is the chief character, who by his love of gossip and his friendship and interest in all the birds of the field and the woods is made to serve as a most engaging interpreter or interlocutor. One reads easily through page after page of amusing dialogue between Peter and Jennie Wren, or Winsome Bluebird, or Creaker Grackle, or Butcher Shrike, or Plunger Osprey, without realizing that there is being conveyed a host of facts which deal with migration, molt, food, nesting, song, coloring, and instincts which, if presented as bare facts, would only repel childish readers. It is certain that many an older person will read this book on the sly, for it has not a little of the charm of "The Wind in the Willows" and the "Jungle Books," and higher praise could not be paid. There is a wealth of colored illustrations by Mr. Fuertes, and a fair index with scientific names for accurate identification.

"Un Soldat de France" (Paris: Plon-Nourrit) is composed of the letters written from the front by a young French surgeon, and is interesting as another example of the intellectual superiority of the youth of France, one of the few agreeable revelations of the recent war. Most of these letters are addressed to the father of the writer and perhaps the most remarkable of them, as it is surely the most touching, is the one in which this young man, not yet twenty-three, offers his friendship to his father, a curious example of a psychological and mental state that only such a war as this last one could produce; and all this goes to prove once more that Professor Rollo Walter Brown in his "How the French Boy Learns to Write" is quite within the truth in his general conclusion that the French lad's pen is facile princeps when compared with that of his American comrade.

Captain Ernest Peixotto, one of the official artists of the A. E. F., was close to the fighting at Château-Thierry, St. Mihiel, and the Argonne, and observed also our occupation of the middle Rhine. His diary and sketches constitute a sober personal record which is perpetuated in a well-made book, "At the American Front" (Scribners). There are thrilling touches, and even a thrilling chapter—that which describes the spectacular assault on the Montfaucon, but in general the narrative, and the illustrations as well, singularly repeat the quiet and not too colorful method of Mr. Peixotto's well-known sketches of travel. We have the accurate and restrained observations of a veteran traveler, and should be grateful for so much. For the romantic flavor of our military effort, one must look elsewhere.

The Society for Pure English, which was just getting under way when the war broke out, has now resumed its activities. Its membership includes some of the most distinguished British men and women of letters and students of literature. Among them are enough philologists of standing, like Henry Bradley, W. A. Craigie, Sir James Murray, H. C. K. Wyld, and Joseph Wright, to give color to the hope that the Society's tracts, which will be published by the Oxford University Press, will not be wholly dedicated to enthusiasms like those of Sir Robert Bridges or pedantries like those of the Fowlers. Indeed, the aims of the Society, as set forth in the prospectus, are modest and sensible. Such matters as the naturalization of foreign words, native word-coinage, the "regeneration" of neglected elements in the vocabulary, the protection of traditional speech-cadences from the assaults of ignorant pedantry, are among those to which it will give attention. No doubt the pamphlets issued by the Society will be of unequal value, but eventually its work, if it is carried on in the spirit suggested by the prospectus, should grow into very great usefulness. Applications for membership may be sent to the Honorary Secretary, Mr. L. Pearsall Smith, 11 St. Leonards Terrace, London, S. W. 3.

Anyone who buys for his children a copy of Jean Henri Fabre's "Field, Forest and Farm" (Century) is likely to be first disappointed and then greatly puzzled. He will be disappointed at finding its vocabulary far beyond the reading of any child to whom the form would be acceptable, and he will be puzzled to guess for whom it is intended. Like others of the series, it represents "Uncle Paul" imparting to his nephews information about nature and its processes. But of what age are the nephews to whom he delivers such observations as this on sap: . . . "It is not yet a nutritive fluid for the plant; it becomes so in the foliage by a double process. First, on being distributed to the leaves, which furnish a vast surface for evaporation, it exhales its superabundant water in the form of vapor and thus concentrates its usable ingredients?" If this represents their working vocabulary, they are too old to be lured by a form of dialogue as palpably didactic as anything in "Sandford and Merton" or the Rollo books. If in French the book is acceptable to children, as it comes to us it is only half translated, for no one could read it to a child without ransacking his mind, and his dictionaries, for intelligible circumlocutions for fully half the words and phrases in it. If he is wise he will keep it as a source of information for himself to deal out to the children in the presence of the facts and the actual questions.

The New French President

SOME twenty-five years ago, when M. Poincaré was still writing in the newspapers, besides being a lawyer and a Cabinet Minister, he said of M. Paul Deschanel that he was a man about whom one might prophesy not that he would some day become a minister, but that he surely would be elected to the French Academy. This prophecy was verified a long time ago. M. Deschanel has never been in any cabinet, but he has been a member of the French Academy for the last twenty years, and now he succeeds M. Poincaré as President of the Republic, a circumstance, by the way, that M. Poincaré did not and could not foresee.

The reason of M. Poincaré's emphasis on the French Academy is because of M. Deschanel's literary accomplishments, his singularly elegant oratory, the finish of his style and, taken all in all, the tone of distinction and refinement that characterizes all his parliamentary manifestations since the first time he entered the Chamber of Deputies, some thirty-five years since.

His political enemies used to make fun of this dandy of politics who dressed his person as well as he dressed his speeches and whose eloquence seemed to attract to the galleries of the Palais Bourbon all the pretty ladies of Paris. They called him the "Delaunay of the Chamber of Deputies," Delaunay being at that date the popular matinée idol of the Théâtre Français. They accused him of fastidiousness in the preparation of his orations, which they found a bit [illegible] polished. They prophesied that he could not keep on repeating the oratorical successes which he scored every time he took the floor. They were mistaken. M. Deschanel repeated them often, or at least as often as he chose to speak. He spoke only when he had something important to say, and that was about once or twice a year. And each one of his orations was notable for its power and literary charm. The training he received from his father, one of the distinguished writers on literature of the 19th century, his association with the Journal des Débats, one of the most scholarly and distinguished French newspapers, and his natural talent and taste for good style gave him immediately a prominence universally acknowledged as one of the leading men of the French Parliament.

In the early part of his career, between 1885 and the nineties, he was satisfied with discussing on the floor questions of a nature that could not rouse party passions. His maiden speech on June 28, 1886, is still remembered by old parliamentarians. It dealt with the tariff. The farmers wanted a tax of 6 francs on wheat, and he treated this arid topic with such imagination and brilliancy that he left the Chamber both delighted and surprised. A year later we find him, with the same success, treating the Naval appropriations and the problems of France's protectorate over the Christians in Syria.

Gradually, however, he approached questions of a more contentious nature. After the moderate party had been deprived of its great leaders, Gambetta, Jules Ferry, and also M. Ribot, temporarily out of Parliament, the younger men had to take their place and carry on the fight against radicalism, which was growing stronger every day, and Socialism, which was just then making its entrance into Parliament with Paul Lafargue, Jules Guesde, and Vaillant, soon joined by Jaurès, Viviani, and Millerand. Among these young men the most prominent were Jonnart, Barthou, Poincaré, and Deschanel. While the first three accepted cabinet positions in various ministries, Deschanel, for reasons best known to himself, remained in the ranks to fight the battles of the moderate party.

He resented the injustice and the unfairness of the extreme left, led by Clemenceau and Pelletan, against the great leaders of his party; so he decided to give radicalism a little bit of its own medicine in the form of aggressive criticisms and virulent denunciations.

Three times, in November, 1895, in April, 1896, and again in November of the same year, under the Bourgeois and Méline ministries, he attacked the radical party with a sharp, incisive, and petulant oratory, very different from his earlier more academic style, and one which was quite as much of a revelation as his first manner.

His talent had matured. His knowledge of political and economic science had been increased by continuous study, wide curiosity, and even a trip to the United States, from which he brought many observations often used in his speeches. He was one of the best-equipped members of the House, and to many of his colleagues whose knowledge hardly extends beyond local issues, his orations were as good as a university course in political science. Hence when he had to carry on controversies with the Socialists, he could not be satisfied with feeble platitudes and old-fashioned arguments. He had to argue against scholarly and well-informed Marxists like Paul Lafargue and Jules Guesde, crafty parliamentarians, powerful and passionate orators like Jaurès, and clever debaters like Millerand, Viviani, and a half dozen others.

Nothing has shown more strikingly the openness of mind of that opportunist and conservative spokesman than the way in which he had not merely grasped the abstruse metaphysics of Karl Marx's "Capital" and the rest of modern Socialistic literature, but also accepted some of their legitimate claims, while fighting their doctrines in a spirit of fairness and, sometimes, of sympathy, that many of them readily acknowledged.

His colleagues had come to look upon him as a man of keen intelligence, with a broad mind and a heart open to any appeal. That is why he shared the Speakership of the House with only one man during the first years of this century. When Henry Brisson died, Deschanel was the only possible candidate. He has filled his position with tact, impartiality, and common sense. In a House that is often unruly and still oftener intolerant, he has stood for freedom of speech and for fair treatment of all. When a House has finished its career, no one knows better than Deschanel how to praise its accomplishments; and likewise when the House reconvenes, he knows, without offending his colleagues, how to give them sound advice. His very duties as a president of the House have prepared him and made him more fit for his part as President of the Republic.

The restricted body by which the President is chosen has one advantage: it knows exactly what is needed in the position to be filled and who best fits the requirements. The presidency is never given as a reward for services to a man who, whatever his other merits, has neither the temperament nor the special equipment required to perform its duties. A soldier without political experience or elementary knowledge of public affairs, a public man who has been all his life a fighter and a polemist, would be equally out of place in the presidential position.

The President in France must forget that he was once the man of a party; he must become an impartial arbiter of all parties. That will be easy for Deschanel, who was elected by men of all groups and supported especially by those men whose doctrines are furthest from his own, the Socialists and the radicals. Since the President has many social and diplomatic duties, it is as well that he should be a man of pleasing presence, of distinction and charm of manner, of impeccable speech and sound views. M. Deschanel will have the distinction of being perhaps the best-looking of the French Presidents.

Although elected as a conservative Republican, M. Deschanel is a staunch and almost fanatic Republican. He has no patience with those who speak ill of the parliamentary régime. He knows and has often said that with all its defects it is the only guarantee of popular liberties. He rebukes the idle and foolish critics who always slander the Assemblies that they elect. During the war, in particular, he has rendered frequent and just homage to the work of supervision of the committees and their delegates at the front. To this man, whose father was an exile for his republican faith, the French Republic is something more than a form of government, it is almost a religion. He worships his country and he worships the republic.

After the proclamation of the vote that made him President, some one said that this election shows the continuity of the French Republic and the continuity of the ideals for which this war was fought. No other member of either House would have been more worthy than Paul Deschanel, not only to symbolize but to assure the continuity of the best traditions of the Third Republic.

Othon Guerlac

Einstein and the Man in the Street

When I was asked to write an article explaining the principle of relativity to the man in the street I felt very much like quoting the words of Faust:

> So soll ich denn mit sauerem Schweiss
> Euch lehren was ich selbst nicht weiss?

I do not entirely understand the principle of relativity and it is impossible for the man in the street to understand it. The explanations that I have seen in the daily papers do not in the least explain why rays of light should be bent by gravitational attraction, and yet I am disposed to make the attempt to throw a little light upon it without any mathematics and even without any diagrams. This is certainly no light task.

Everybody knows that light takes a certain length of time to travel, like sound or waves on the surface of still water, and whereas sound travels only about 1,100 feet per second, light is known to travel with a velocity of about 186,000 miles per second. Thus the delay caused in the case of a luminous signal of any sort, between its time of starting from any point and of arriving at another, is noticeable only when the distances concerned are very great, such as are celestial distances. In order to explain the finite delay in the arrival of light the notion of the luminiferous ether was invented to denote the medium in which the light existed between the time of its emission at the source and its reception by the eye. The late Lord Salisbury wittily said that the noun "ether" was invented to be the subject to the verb "to undulate." If we drop a stone upon the surface of a pond we see a system of waves spreading out in the form of a circle of ever increasing diameter. If we fire a pistol we similarly have a wave of sound which spreads out in the form of a sphere of continually increasing diameter and nobody hears the sound until this sphere has grown large enough to reach his ear. Similarly with light. The light spreads out in the form of a spherical wave and nobody sees the light until the sphere has reached the eye. The case of the wave on water is simpler insofar as a plane contains only two dimensions, length and breath, so that the position of a point is determined by giving its distances, say north and south from a given parallel and east and west from a given meridian. With the sound and light wave, however, the spreading is in three-dimensional space, and we require to fix the position of a point not two of these so-called coördinate distances but three, the third being the distance above or below some horizontal floor plane. I think it is pretty evident that if we consider a circular cone with its axis vertical and cause it to rise through the level surface of the water, if its point rises with uniform velocity it will intersect the surface of the water in a circle, the radius of which increases with a uniform velocity, thus constituting a circular wave. The height of the vertex of the cone above the floor plane of the water is then a measure of the time; so that if we were dealing with space of only two dimensions the time would be the third dimension for that space, as far as wave motions were considered. Beings living in the plane would have the same difficulty in imagining a third dimension that we do for a fourth. Now it is somewhat more difficult when we are dealing with three-dimensional space to think of time as a fourth. But by a certain extension of the imagination we are able to do it. In this sense the time is measured by the increase of radius of a spherical light or sound wave proceeding from a point. I do not say that this is all there is to the question of time as the fourth dimension, but it is sufficient for our purpose here.

Let us now come to some of the physical consequences of the notion of the ether as a substance which bears the light waves. It is, I think, very evident that if waves of sound go along with respect to the still air at a speed of 1,100 feet per second, then, if the air is moving forward in the form of a wind, the waves are carried along so much faster by the amount of the velocity of the wind. If one is in a train moving towards a sounding whistle the waves proceeding from the whistle are encountered faster than if one were standing still and the pitch of the whistle accordingly rises. The same thing would be true if we were standing still and the whistle together with the air were coming towards us with a velocity of their own. I may in this case leave the whistle out of account and simply speak of the waves that are borne along by the air.

Now the earth is going along through space at a great rate, moving in its orbit around the sun with an average velocity of about 19 miles per second, which, to be sure, is only about one ten-thousandth of the velocity of light, but still is very fast compared with ordinary speeds. If, then, ether acts like air and stands still in space, we shall have the effect of a sort of ether wind blowing against us with a speed of 19 miles per second. Such an effect was looked for about 30 years ago by the American physicists Michelson and Morley; the former, who is now Professor of Physics at the University of Chicago, has since obtained the Nobel Prize for this and his other optical researches. The result of the experiment was negative; that is to say, the ether did not appear to be in motion with respect to the earth. This was the beginning of the whole trouble and eventually led up to the invention of the principle of relativity in 1905 by Einstein, a young Swiss mathematical physicist who is now situated in Berlin, belonging to that talented race that is responsible for so much of our troubles, intellectual and other.

Suppose again that we are moving along above the surface of still water and at a certain time we drop a stone into it giving rise to a circular wave as before, only that now we move ahead. It is very obvious that at any subsequent time we are nearer to that part of the wave front that is ahead of us and which we are trying to catch up with than the part that is behind us which we are moving away from. Thus the velocity of the wave with respect to us is not the same in all directions.

The first question raised by Einstein is that of a criterion for the simultaneity of two events. If these events take place at the same place there is no difficulty. The clock must tell the same time for each of them. But suppose they take place in places a long way apart. The only way that an observer situated where one of these events takes place can tell when the other takes place is by the reception of some sort of signal, which must travel with the velocity of light. In order to set two clocks so that they shall correctly indicate the time we may suppose that a signal is given when the first clock shows twelve o'clock, and if the second clock is, we will say, 186,000 miles away, when the signal reaches there the clock must show twelve o'clock plus one second, and if the signal is then reflected back it must arrive at the first clock when that clock marks twelve o'clock and two seconds. If, then, the second clock shows a time which is halfway between those shown by the first clock on the departure of the signal and the reception of the reflected signal, the clocks are correctly set. But if the clocks are in motion, this will not be the case, because, as we have just shown, the velocity of the wave that is catching up will be different from that of the wave which is coming back. Consequently clocks in motion have a different criterion for simultaneity from what they would have if at rest.

Now, Einstein's first postulate is, saying nothing about the ether, which we need henceforth not mention, that the velocity of light is the same in all directions, irrespective of the velocity with which the source of light is moving. The principle of relativity may then be stated by saying that it is impossible by the observation of any natural phenomenon to determine anything more than the relative velocity of two points, the absolute velocity being entirely unknown. It is well known that this is true in mechanics. For instance, it is quite impossible to tell in a sleeping car which way the car is traveling as long as the velocity is unchanged, despite the fancies of particular passengers who wish their berths made up with the head facing forwards or back. This is well shown in the case of persons passing through the Broad Street station in Philadelphia in the night who come out facing the other way without any knowledge of it. It is when the speed of the train is changing or is experiencing an acceleration that we are able to tell the direction of the change by means of the pressures beween ourselves and other objects.

Now, although this dynamical principle of relativity has been known since the days of Newton, it was not supposed that phenomena such as the propagation of light or of electrical disturbances would be similarly independent of absolute velocity. Yet this is what Einstein proposes.

In order to explain the Michelson-Morley result Professor Lorentz, the celebrated Dutch physicist, following a suggestion thrown out by FitzGerald in Ireland, suggested that all bodies in motion experienced a shortening in the direction parallel to that of the motion, and thus that the light traveling in the direction of the motion of the earth in Michelson's and Morley's apparatus had a different distance to go from that going in a direction at right angles to the motion of the earth. Thus the result was satisfactorily explained. But this result was carried much farther by Einstein, who assumes that there is a fundamental relation between time and space, such that, to put it simply, no one can tell what time it is until he knows where he is and he can not tell where he is until he knows when he is. The difficulty of measuring the length of an object such as a bar in motion will be seen to arise from the fact that both ends must be compared with the ends of a fixed bar at the same time; for if we measure the coincidence of one end at one time and of the other at another, obviously we do not get the same length as if both were measured at once. Consequently, the question of length is seen to be connected with the question of time.

These considerations were thus introduced by Einstein in 1905. As will be easily seen, they say nothing whatever about gravitation, and since then the whole theory has been remodeled. Einstein now introduces a new postulate having to do with accelerated motion, which I may illustrate by the motion of an elevator. If we stand in an elevator which starts up or goes upwards faster and faster, our feet press harder upon the floor and we should weigh more upon a pair of scales. It is obviously impossible to distinguish the effect of a sudden increase in the pull due to the attraction of the earth from the acceleration of the elevator, our so-called frame of reference. Einstein's new postulate, then, is that it is impossible to distinguish the effect of a gravitational field or region where attraction takes place from an acceleration of our frame of reference. But this is not all.

A set of waves possesses energy; that is, the power to do work. We know that waves of the sea may knock down a breakwater or cut away a cliff. Waves of sound may cause a phonograph needle to dig up wax. Waves of light were predicted by Maxwell fifty years ago to exert pressure, which was experimentally demonstrated in this country by Nichols and Hull and in Russia by Lebedeff. But how can transverse waves, where the motion is at right angles to the direction of propagation, as is supposed to be the case with light, exert a pressure in the direction of propagation? Lord Raylei[illegible]s this by an analogy. Suppose that we have a ring sliding on a violin string which is vibrating transversely. In order to prevent the ring from being pushed along by the vibrations it will be necessary to hold it still, so that the transverse vibrations push the ring along endwise. In order to stop a set of waves and reflect them back, then, it is necessary to oppose a force, exactly as it would be to stop a ball, or make it reflect back. The waves act, then, as if they had inertia. In other words, a beam of light acts on a mirror just as a stream of bullets from a machine gun acts on a target. We are accordingly led to the notion that a beam of light possesses mass, using that term in the sense of inertia. But all ordinary mass has weight; that is to say, is pulled by gravitational forces that have their origin in other mass.

Einstein now makes the further assumption that everything that has mass or inertia has gravitational mass, and that therefore a beam of light is acted upon by gravitation. He is thus able to show that a beam of light passing near the sun or other celestial body would be bent. This is a very extraordinary prediction. The amount of bending even in the case of such a strongly attracting body as the sun is very small. A beam of light that just grazes the sun would be bent by a very small amount, one and three-quarters seconds, of angle, and such an observation can be made only at the time of a total solar eclipse when the light of a star can be seen passing close to the edge of the sun when the sun is dark. In the eclipse that took place last spring such observations were actually made. On photographing the light of the same stars at the moment of the eclipse and at another time when the sun was not there, a displacement was observed of the order of that predicted by Einstein. This was hailed by the English astronomers and physicists, including Sir Joseph Thomson, the President of the London Royal Society, as an extraordinary confirmation of the principle of relativity. When observed, the effect is extremely small. If we look at a letter an inch in height at a distance of about three miles from our eye, it subtends an angle of one second. Obviously, a powerful telescope must be used, and when the effect is so very small one may be pardoned a certain skepticism if one refuses to overturn one's preconceived ideas of the independence of time and space. Nevertheless, other phenomena, both celestial and terrestrial, have seemed to point in the same direction. It may be asked whether the ray of light is not bent by ordinary refraction in passing through the attenuated gases of the solar corona which we know extends to several diameters beyond the sun's disk. Undoubtedly the English astronomers have taken care of this.

Whether we believe it or not, the more closely we examine the principle of relativity the more we must believe that it is a very wonderful conception, incapable of being appreciated in its consequences without profound mathematical apparatus, and involving at least four assumptions which I have in a very rough way attempted to describe: First, that of the constancy of the velocity of light with respect to all directions and to any system moving with any velocity whatever with respect to any other system; second, a relation between time and distance such that either of two bodies seems shortened in the direction of their relative motion by an observer attached to the other; third, that it is impossible to distinguish a gravitational field from the acceleration of the frame of reference; and fourth, that everything that has mass, as determined by inertia, has mass of the sort determined by weight or attractability.

This is the best that I am able to do for the man in the street.

ARTHUR GORDON WEBSTER

Music

The New York Opera War—Hints to Librettists

AGAIN we are in the throes of an opera war. Managers are pitted against managers, millions against millions, and singers against singers. The crowd, night after night, packs two vast opera houses. The excitement of the fight is far more evident at the Lexington than at the Metropolitan, which affects unconsciousness of its Mid-Western rivals.

The more such wars we see, the more we like them. If they could last five months, and not five little weeks, we should not grumble. For, if competition is the soul of trade, in emulation lies the spur to art. The Metropolitan needs many spurs. Left to itself it sticks in ruts—and sleeps.

And while the larger houses strive and strain, the struggle at the Park goes on. The fight there is, however, strictly limited. Its aim is to build up a permanent home for opera of the light and lyric kinds, sung, not by foreigners, in foreign tongues, but by Americans in their own English idiom.

If they had done no more than that this year and last, the American singers at the Park would have accomplished a good deal for art by proving that the English tongue in opera may be plain and musical. But, incidentally, they have done something more. They have shown what good librettos mean in opera. Not in the obsolescent kind of opera, which was merely a vehicle for the display of virtuosity, but in those modern works which are really plays with music.

The demonstration I refer to has been made by the revival, at the Park, of Gilbert and Sullivan's delightful comic operas. Week after week large audiences have filled the theatre, not only to hear Sullivan's airs and glees, but, just as surely, to enjoy the quips and quirks of Gilbert's text. We have been told, by those who disbelieve in English as an operatic medium, that the success of the joint authors of "The Mikado," "Patience," "The Pirates," "Pinafore," and "Ruddigore" was a phenomenon unique and unrepeatable. But, both before and since the partnership of Gilbert and Sullivan, there have been other unions, possibly as fortunate.

Of these the most remarkable was that which long linked Offenbach with Henri Meilhac and Ludovic Halévy, all three imbued with the same spirit of mad levity. In Italy, again, for years the triumphs of the operatic "Veritists" were chiefly due to the great skill of two

(Continued on page 118)

Electrical Pioneers

Professor Crocker and Dr. Wheeler were the first to apply generators to not only the telephone and telegraph—but later to the wireless.

In 1919 the U. S. Government adopted Crocker-Wheeler Motor Generators for wireless in conjunction with aeroplanes in both naval and land use.

President

Crocker-Wheeler Co.

Ampere, N. J.

New York
Boston
Syracuse
Chicago
Cleveland
Binghamton

Pittsburgh
Newark
New Haven
Philadelphia
Baltimore
San Francisco

Tiffany & Co.

Jewelry Silverware Watches Clocks Stationery

Early American Silverware and Reproductions

Purchases may be made by Mail

Fifth Avenue & 37th Street
New York

Theodore Roosevelt's Letters to His Children

Edited by Joseph Bucklin Bishop

RICHMOND NEWS-LEADER: "No biographer can possibly show as much of the real character of the man Roosevelt."

LOS ANGELES TIMES: "Will form the keystone to the arch of Roosevelt's literary fame."

OUTLOOK: "The reader will lay down this book with a knowledge that he has been privileged to have had in his hands a great biographical document. We do not think its like can be found in the whole range of literature."

ATLANTIC MONTHLY: It has lessons of great concern to American children and lessons of love, cheer, courage and good sense, of even more concern to all fathers and mothers."

BOSTON TRANSCRIPT: "Many books have been written by and about Theodore Roosevelt, and this simple little collection of his letters will stand at their head."

INDIANAPOLIS NEWS: "No public utterance can compare with these letters as a revelation of the man who made friends in every walk of life among people of every age and taste."

Illustrated with "picture letters." $2.50

At Bookstores everywhere

CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS
FIFTH AVE. AT 48th ST. NEW YORK
PUBLISHERS

Attractive offerings are made during the Midwinter Book Season.

(Continued from page 116)

librettists — the romantic dramatist, Giuseppe Giacosa, and Luigi Illica. Another even more apparent proof of what librettos mean in opera is found in what Arrigo Boïto did for Verdi. And, to come nearer to our day, I might quote Maeterlinck, who inspired Dukas and Debussy with his dream plays.

Some years ago, before the production of "Francesca da Rimini," in Paris, I asked the late Maëstro Campanini what he thought of Zandonai's latest work. "I have no opinion on the subject yet," said the conductor; "I have not read the libretto."

The success or failure of the new works now being sung at the Lexington Opera House will, to a large extent (much larger than some think), depend on whether their composers had, or had not, good librettos. If "L'Heure Espagnole," to name one work, should not be liked, Laparra, the composer of the score, will have himself to blame. For, like Charpentier, Wolf-Ferrari, and Dukas, he now insists on writing his own words in opera. The example was set long ago by Wagner. As time runs on, it may be widely followed.

For those born librettists who inspire great lyric dramas grow rarer and rarer. And in some places they are sadly scorned. I do not speak now of the Broadway hacks, who grind out dull rubbish by the yard for "comic" operas, but of the few and well-intentioned men and women who have tried their hands here at the invention of ambitious opera "books." Among them, I may mention Bryan Hooker, who devised the words for "Mona," and Percy MacKaye, who twice collaborated with Reginald de Koven. Both did their best, but from the same wrong standpoint, and in the instances of "Mona" and of "The Canterbury Pilgrims," both good reading plays, both failed, and why? Because the method each preferred was purely "literary," appealing chiefly to the brain and eye, but disdaining the much more important ear, which must be courted by the man who writes for opera.

All good—all great—librettists know that truth. Boïto, Gilbert, Meilhac, Halévy, and, to add three to the exclusive list, Barber and Carré, who assisted Gounod, and Henri Caïn, who has signed many opera books, respected it religiously. So, though at times their verses may seem trite or tame, what they invented was at least quite clear. The most absurdly intricate of Gilbert's patter songs is understandable, provided it is sung by well-trained singers. While when, forsaking light for serious art, Meilhac and Halévy made a libretto out of Mérimée's "Carmen," they gave us what still seems a little masterpiece, melodic, graceful, vivid, full of life, poetic, humorous, tragic—always singable. Boïto rivaled them in his "Falstaff" libretto, and now and then in his arrangement of "Othello." Here we have models.

CHARLES HENRY MELTZER

Books and the News

Spiritism

THE word "Spiritism" seems almost to have displaced the older one, "Spiritualism," but if it ordinarily indicates bias either towards or against the belief, it is not so used here. Persons who work in libraries and book-shops can not doubt the extraordinary interest in the subject, and the lectures of M. Maeterlinck and Sir Oliver Lodge are increasing that interest.

Books about it are mostly written by convinced believers, who seem, to skeptics or agnostics, pathetically credulous; or by disbelievers, whose skepticism appears to the convert to be a resolute refusal to open their minds to the truth. If there is in the world a person absolutely without prejudice upon this subject, he will seek long to discover any book reflecting his state of mind. The most determined opponents are those who find the belief disturbing to orthodox religion.

Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, a believer, says that as a course of reading "for an intelligent agnostic who knew nothing about psychic science," he would suggest the writings of J. Arthur Hill. Two of these are "Spiritualism; its History, Phenomena and Doctrine" (Doran, 1919) and "Psychical Investigations" (Cassell, 1917). Sir A. C. Doyle's own writings are: "The New Revelation" and "The Vital Message" (Doran, 1918-19). It is hardly necessary to name Sir Oliver Lodge's "Raymond" (Doran, 1916) and "The Survival of Man" (Moffat, 1909). James H. Hyslop's "Contact with the Other World" (Century) is a compilation from his years of experience, his studies and conclusions. Hereward Carrington's "Modern Psychical Phenomena" (Dodd, 1919) is one of many books by this author; its evidence about "spirit photography" must be overwhelming if it convinces any who have known the mischances of the amateur photographer and the surprises of the developing room. Basil King's "Abolishing of Death" (Cosmopolitan Book Corp., 1919) and Sir W. T. Barrett's "On the Threshold of the Unseen" (Dutton, 1917) are friendly to the investigations.

Two important studies from, it is said, a scientific point of view, are W. J. Crawford's "The Reality of Psychic Phenomena" (Watkins, 1916) and his "Experiments in Psychical Science" (Dutton, 1919). An extensive and extremely interesting historical work is Frank Podmore's "Modern Spiritualism; a History and a Criticism" (2 vols., Scribner, 1902). Theodore Flournoy's "Spiritism and Psychology" (Harper, 1911), Emile Boirac's "The Psychology of the Future" (Stokes, 1918), Hamlin Garland's "The Shadow World" (Harper, 1908), and Samuel McComb's "The Future Life in the Light of Modern Inquiry" (Dodd, 1919) offer a variety of treatments of the topic.

Johan Liljencrants in "Spiritism and Religion" (Devin, 1918) and D. I. Lanslots in "Spiritism Unveiled" (Herder, 1913) pay the compliments of the Church of Rome to the whole subject, while J. G. Raupert's "The New Black Magic" (Devin), from much the same point of view, admits the manifestations and seems to class them with devil-worship.

"Some Revelations as to 'Raymond'" (Dutton, 1918), by "A Plain Citizen," is discriminating and by no means entirely hostile. It should be read with Sir Oliver Lodge's "Raymond." For an out-and-out opponent of spiritism, try Edward Clodd's "The Question" (Richards, 1917).

EDMUND LESTER PEARSON

Books Received

ESSAYS AND CRITICISM

Ben Jonson's Every Man in His Humour. Edited by Percy Simpson. Oxford University Press.

RELIGION AND PHILOSOPHY

Fort, Charles. The Book of the Damned. Boni & Liveright.

Living Waters or Messages of Joy. Introduction by Dwight Goddard. Brentano's. $1.50 net.

Randall, J. H. The Spirit of the New Philosophy. Brentano's. $1.75.

BIOGRAPHY AND HISTORY

Beamish, R. J., and March, F. A. America's Part in the World War. Introduction by Gen. John J. Pershing. Winston. $3.00 net.

Goddard, Dwight, and Borel, Henri. Laotze's Tao and Wu Wei. Brentano's. $1.25.

Simonds, F. H. History of the World War, in five volumes. Volume IV—America and Russia. Doubleday, Page.

GOVERNMENT AND ECONOMICS

Bullard, Arthur. The Russian Pendulum. Macmillan. $2.00.

Cheng, Sih-Gung Modern China: A Political Study. Oxford University Press.

Drake, P. H. Democracy Made Safe. Boston: Four Seas. $1.25 net.

Gompers, Samuel. Labor and the Common Welfare. Edited by Hayes Robbins. Dutton.

Harrison, Marie. The Stolen Lands: A Study in Alsace-Lorraine. Dutton. $2.00 net.

Hillis, N. D. Rebuilding Europe in the Face of World-Wide Bolshevism. Revell. $1.50 net.

Huang, Feng-Hua. Public Debts in China. Columbia University Studies. Longmans, Green.

McKenzie, F. A. Korea's Fight for Freedom. Revell. $2.00.

Thomas, H. C. The Return of the Democratic Party to Power in 1884. Columbia University Studies. Longmans, Green.

TRAVEL AND DESCRIPTION

Marcosson, I. F. Adventures in Interviewing. Lane. $4.00 net.

Mills, E. A. The Adventures of a Nature Guide. Doubleday, Page.

// THE REVIEW

Vol. 2, No. 39 New York, Saturday, February 7, 1920 FIFTEEN CENTS

Contents

Brief Comment 119
Editorial Articles:
The Issues in the Fight at Albany 121
America and the Plight of Europe 123
Mr. Gompers vs. the Bolshevists 124
What Are Colleges For? 125
Abolishing the Political State. By W. J. Ghent 126
The Human Cost of Living. By David Harold Colcord 127
The Lady of the Violets. By Mary C. Francis 129
Correspondence 130
Book Reviews:
France and Her Colonies 131
The Old and the New 132
On Our Way 132
New Psychic Faculties 133
The Run of the Shelves 134
Music:
Four Operas New to New York. By Charles Henry Meltzer 136
Drama:
The "Power of Darkness" at the Garrick. By O. W. Firkins 137
Books and the News:
Boys' Books. By Edmund Lester Pearson 138

VISCOUNT GREY'S letter to the London Times on America's position in relation to the treaty recalls vividly to mind the impression made by the British White Book published in the opening weeks of the great war. The same lucidity, the same fairness, the same grasp of the actual needs of a crucial situation, which marked his communications and statements as Foreign Minister, characterize his analysis of the present difficulty. It is not too much to say that the convincingness of the case presented in the White Book was a decisive factor in shaping American opinion and sentiment in 1914, and was thus in a perfectly true sense one of the most powerful elements in the winning of the war against Germany. While of course no such commanding importance can be attached to this plain though most weighty utterance, it has the same kind of merit, and bids fair to produce, in its degree, an equally wholesome effect.

THE signal importance of Lord Grey's letter lies not in its arguments or explanations, admirable as these are, but in the peculiarly timely aid it brings to the prospects of ratification. It had begun to seem as though nothing could be injected into the situation which would have potency to break the spell of inaction. The time for effective argument within the Senate had passed months ago. The possibilities of negotiation based on mutual good will seemed likewise exhausted. Now comes this new force, directed not to the dicussion of minutiæ, but to the allaying of controversy and to the impressive assertion at once of the supreme need and the entire practicability of an immediate settlement. There is every reason to believe that Lord Grey's communication has the sanction of the British Government, although of course he was careful to say that it represented only his own personal opinion as a private individual. But viewed even in this latter light it would, apart from its inherent merit, carry extraordinary weight. For it must not be forgotten that Lord Grey was one of the earliest and one of the most ardent advocates of a genuine League of Nations as the only hope of the world after the close of the great war. Coming from such a source, the conviction expressed by him that without America the League would be a failure, and that with America in it, in spite of the limitations set by the reservations, it holds out the promise of achieving its great ends, must go far towards settling the doubts of fairminded men.

ILLUMINATING as Lord Grey's analysis must be to most Europeans and to many Americans, it does no more than set forth in admirable form what has long been recognized by thinking people in this country who have not been blinded by partisan prejudice, or by the intensity of their devotion to President Wilson. Some of these latter are now urging that Lord Grey was precluded from saying what he really thought about the motives that lay behind the opposition to unreserved acceptance of the Covenant, because to offend the Republican leaders would be to defeat the object of his letter. But these same people made no such allowance when they pointed the finger of scorn at every American protester as flying in the face of the laudation of President Wilson and his programme which European statesmen were uttering last Spring. Surely those men were under much heavier bonds to keep well with Mr. Wilson than Lord Grey is to keep well with Senator Lodge.

REPUBLICAN leaders must bear the responsibility for the failure of Congress to carrry out Secretary Glass's well-considered recommendation for the relief of starving populations in Austria, Armenia, Poland, and other countries. Guilt would be a better word than responsibility, for we can not regard it as other than a crime to fail in such a duty. Mr. Glass has abundantly shown that he is no sentimentalist in such matters. His recommendation, and the statement made by Assistant Secretary Davis before the House Ways and Means Committee, went carefully into particulars both as to the desperate need and as to the means by which relief could be safely and properly applied. President Wilson has written an urgent and moving letter in support of Mr. Glass's recommendation. No decent reason has been given for not providing through the United States Grain Corporation the $150,000,000 credit proposed. It now appears that $50,-000,000 is the utmost that Congress will sanction, and the Republican Steering Committee in the House sought to prevent the giving of any aid at all. It is a spectacle of which our country, overflowing with abundance while millions in other lands are suffering the agonies of famine in the depth of winter, has reason to be profoundly ashamed.

WE can go far enough with the New Republic and The Nation to agree that the way to combat Bolshevism and other dangerous teachings is to let them say their worst, and refute it by convincing argument on the other side. Of course their statement of the method implies their own intention to use it, and we await with unbounded eagerness the forthcoming of the argument which we assume that the editors of these papers are busily preparing. If its solidity and lucidity, reach and grasp, comprehensiveness and impermeability, shall prove at all commensurate with the length of its period of incubation, it will certainly be one of the most effective logical assaults on error of all history. But life is short, and hope deferred maketh the heart sick. Feeling so sure of the effect of this impending attack, we are all the more distressed to be so unsure of the time when the signal to advance is to be sounded.

IN the dispute over the Rev. Percy Stickney Grant, which has attracted nation-wide attention, it is essential to distinguish between two entirely different points. How meetings should be conducted within the walls of an Episcopal church—and, for that matter, whether meetings for controversial discussion or political propaganda should be held there at all—is a matter of church policy, of no special importance to the general public, unless the thing assumes a character that makes it something like a public scandal. This may have been true of Dr. Grant's "forum" in the Church of the Ascension at New York; at all events, the matter appears now to have been settled by an arrangement accepted by him and by his bishop. But when we referred to the case of Dr. Grant, in a recent issue, as bearing on the principle of free speech, we were not in the least referring, either expressly or by implication, to the doings in his forum, but solely to his own expression of his own opinions. We are glad to observe that nothing whatever has come of this part of the charges against him; and we trust that the reason they were not pressed is that, when time was given for sober second thought, it was recognized that to suppress the opinions of a clergyman, or to discipline him for uttering them, is utterly wrong from the standpoint of policy as well as from that of principle.

SENSATION mongers are extracting a wholly unwarranted amount of gloom out of the answers to a questionnaire recently distributed among farmers by some officer of the Post Office Department. No one will be frightened, however, who knows something of farmers and also something of the tricky habits, tendencies, and temperament of the "questionnaire," as a means of collecting misleading information. Of course the farmers are finding it hard to get laborers, and still harder to get them to labor. Of course they are dissatisfied with the gap between the selling price of their products to the city consumer and the amount that comes back to the farm. Of course it nettles them when ill-informed critics throw the blame for exorbitant food prices wholly upon them. Of course a certain proportion of them grow weary of the struggle with these difficulties and feel inclined to give it up, even though they may be making a good living. All these complaints mean something about actual conditions, for which farmers themselves, as well as others, are seeking and will continue to seek suitable remedies. But the last thing in the world that they mean is that we are suddenly to be faced with a wholesale forsaking of the soil, and a disastrous slump in food production.

PARTY leaders at Washington will make a most serious mistake if they fail to favor a fairly liberal provision for the development of the Air Service. Aviation is in its infancy, and it is intolerable that America should be hopelessly handicapped in the effort to have her share in the enormous advances which air navigation is certain to record during the next few years. Because of the delay and uncertainty in Congress, many of the very best men in the service are leaving it for other occupations, and only long training will fit others to take their places. Apparently there are too many men in Congress who have not yet learned that real economy does not consist merely in paring down the total of appropriations.

IN dealing with various revolutionary movements, the New Republic has frequently drawn comparisons between the "Red Terror" and the "White Terror." For the former it has great sympathy; for the latter it can find no excuse. In its own words, "revolution releases the hot passions of the young, counter-revolution the cold hatred of the old." Of course, no attention is paid to the fact that the Red Terror is the overturn of all law and order and the venting of the passions of the mob and the criminal elements; or that the so-called White Terror, however wrong and deplorable, springs primarily from the impulse to punish those guilty of the crimes.

In putting forward its emotional appeal along this line in a recent issue, the New Republic assumes that the "Lasko" mentioned in the press despatches as among those recently sentenced to death by the present Hungarian Government, is Latzko, the author of "Men in War," and presumes that the reason for his execution was his exposure of the rottenness of the Austrian military command and the shameless profiteering and exploitation at home by the Austrian bureaucracy. The New Republic asks: "Must he be slain now because certain senile Hungarian bureaucrats tremble overmuch for their privileges and property?"

As a matter of fact, the "Lasko" mentioned is almost certainly Laszlo, who, when Bolshevism broke out in Hungary, gave the order that all the imprisoned criminals should be released. As political Commissar of all the revolutionary tribunals, he was responsible for these so-called courts of justice, and he was condemned to death for having deliberately instigated the murder of Dr. Joseph Stenczel and his companions on the ground that they were counter-revolutionists. What is interesting is the slant of mind that leads to such conclusions as the one here noted.

THE mere threat at this time of a strike by the stationary heating-plant operators is so surpassingly ghoulish (even ghouls do not themselves destroy the unfortunates on whom they fatten) that a community in which such a thing is possible can not afford to lose a day in taking stock of its resources to meet it. If it is impossible for the plain citizens of a city like New York to mine their own coal and produce their own vegetables and milk, it is not impossible for them to fire their own boilers and generate the heat without which life at this juncture would be intolerable. Modern society has been a bit heedless in allowing the specialization of industry to reach the point where the men engaged in almost any branch of it can under certain conditions presume to regard their services as indispensable. Here is an opportunity to demonstrate, by means of a little good will and a little organization on the part of the public, that there is a sharp difference between the indispensability of an industry and the indispensability of the particular individuals who engage in it. It would not be long before threats of such indescribable savagery as that which has recently been held over us would become a thing of the past. Meanwhile, the public may have been put in a position to discern a little more clearly the issues that are joined between closed shop and open shop.

FEW cities of Europe have suffered as much during the war as has the once prosperous city of Lille. Of every hundred men mobilized from Lille in 1914, only forty-three returned home to find their native place a scene of desolation. Out of 157 factories in operation in Lille in 1914, only seven or eight are now working, the plants of the other mills having either been carried off to Germany or struck down, mangled, and ruined where they stood. The agricultural districts round about have been laid waste, and will not be able, for years to come, to yield any harvest to speak of. Food and milk are, consequently, scarce in Lille. Nine out of ten children show signs of consumption, according to Colonel Mygatt of the Red Cross. The hospitals of the city are crowded with them, and the funds are lacking for proper attention to their needs. The Abbé Ernest Dimnet, a well-known French scholar and essayist, has come to this country to make an appeal on behalf of the suffering population of Lille. He asks for $100,000, necessary to help the two Children's Hospitals, Saint Antoine and Saint Anne. Five hundred dollars pays for a bed, fifty for the medicine daily required in the clinics, one dollar keeps a child in the hospital for two days. Gifts sent to the Abbé Ernest Dimnet, in care of the Review, will be forwarded to him.

IT is not entirely clear whether the prize of 100,000 francs is offered by the French Academy of Sciences for the best plan of communicating with another planet or for the actual achievement of inter-planetary conversation. On the latter supposition it is probable that the prize money, if put out at interest, will amount to a goodly sum before it can be awarded. Most of what we hear concerning the planet which we happen to inhabit tends to confirm a belief that any other planet that values its self-respect and peace of mind will refuse either to initiate or to respond to any efforts to establish a more intimate acquaintance with us. As a rather bright little planet with a faithful moon at heel, we dare say this world holds a respectable position among its fellows in the firmament, but for our part we love the rest of the universe too much to subject it to the disenchantment which a diminution of distance would inevitably produce.

The Issues in the Fight at Albany

NOTHING that has been disclosed, or that can be disclosed, in the hearings at Albany concerning the Socialist Assemblymen can make the proceedings against them right. If we have reached a point at which the method of procedure in such a case is a matter of indifference to us, we have already gone a long way towards the repudiation of our political institutions. The masterly presentation of the case in the brief prepared by a committee of the Bar Association of the City of New York leaves nothing to be desired in point of overwhelming convincingness. We can think of no better service to public education in the fundamentals of representative government than would be furnished by the printing of a million copies of that brief and their broadcast distribution among the people.

The central point made in that brief—and amply buttressed by arguments and citations which we can not attempt to reproduce—is that, whether or not the five Socialist Assemblymen might, upon investigation, be found to be subject to expulsion, there was absolutely no warrant for their suspension. It is a mistake, and a very grave one, to imagine that this is a mere technicality. The qualifications for membership in the Legislature are specifically laid down in the Constitution of the State, and the Assembly has no power to add to them. It is the sole judge of the question whether those Constitutional qualifications have been fulfilled, but if they have, the person elected is entitled to his seat. In spite of his having been seated, he may be expelled for cause; but when so expelled, his seat becomes vacant and his constituency thus has a fresh chance to fill it. A suspension, on the other hand, operates during the entire time of its continuance not only to deprive the member of his seat, but to deprive his constituency of representation; and in the present instance all this was done at a moment's notice and without the faintest pretense at any establishment of the charge. The only way to undo that wrong would have been to rescind the suspension as soon as its true character had been exposed. The members of the Assembly who endeavored to accomplish this in spite of their hasty vote in the first instance are deserving of unstinted commendation.

Important as this point is, we must turn away from it and consider the issues that have actually been brought out, as though bearing on the expulsion of the Socialist members. In the confused mass of facts, assertions, and accusations that have been brought before the Judiciary Committee three distinct threads are discernible. The case against the Socialist members rests in part upon obligations alleged to have been assumed by them, as members of the Socialist party, that were inconsistent with their oath of office. It rests in part upon inferences drawn from declarations of that party and its members, and from declarations by other parties or bodies with which that party is alleged to be virtually identified. And finally it rests upon utterances of opinion or purpose by the accused members themselves.

Of these three elements, as presented, the first has most force. Yet even here the burden of proof on the prosecution to show the substantial character of the alleged obligations, and their inconsistency with the possibility of a faithful discharge of duty by the accused, is very great; and, so far as we can judge, it has not by any means been met. For instance, the mere existence in the Constitution of the Socialist party of a requirement that the members elected shall sign in advance a form of resignation of their office to be used when the party thinks fit, is certainly no ground for expulsion if the members in question have not actually signed it; and even if they have, it is very doubtful whether anything more could be required of them than a revocation of that signature. It may be very wrong —and indeed it is very wrong—for any man to sign such a paper; but it is not a crime, it does not argue moral turpitude, and its existence in the past can hardly be regarded as a disqualification for the future.

What on the face of it looks more serious is a clause in the Socialist party Constitution which binds all members elected to office to vote against all appropriations for military purposes. Yet upon a moment's consideration it will be clear that this, taken in itself, is even less a disqualification than the provision that we have just been discussing; for clearly it would be absurd to exclude from all legislative bodies any person who is on principle opposed to war, and who will accordingly vote against every appropriation designed to make war possible. Whenever a majority of the people of the country are of this mind they have a right to have their way. The one thing that does give a substantial basis to this count in the indictment is the circumstance that the State Constitution requires the State to maintain a militia of at least 10,000 men. It may fairly be argued that the anti-militarist provision in the Socialist party Constitution is thus in express conflict with the Constitution of the State; but it would surely be a grossly strained view which should regard a member of the Legislature as liable to expulsion because some one of a multitude of provisions in his party's platform or Constitution runs counter to some one point in the State Constitution. Would it not have been absurd, in the days before the Civil War, to expel from Northern Legislatures every person who was avowedly opposed to the enforcement of the Fugitive Slave Law, or of the provision of the United States Constitution upon which it was based? Would it not be absurd to expel from every State Legislature to-day every man who might be avowedly opposed to the enactment of any State law enforcing the Eighteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution?

We come now to the general attitude of the Socialist party, and especially to its more or less direct association with the attitude of Communist parties in our own country, and of the Russian Bolshevists. Nothing is more certain than that within the Socialist party, as within every other, there exist all shades of conviction, opinion, and purpose. It is perfectly easy to point to extreme expressions in party declarations even within the Socialist party itself, and it is true that some of these imply great sympathy with the purposes of Communist parties and of the Bolshevist régime in Russia. But to hold any one individual responsible for everything even in his party's platform, not to speak of less authoritative declarations, would be monstrous. To what excess this sort of thing has gone in the line of attack pursued by the prosecution, is sufficiently shown in this deliberate statement by Mr. Stanchfield:

> My argument runs along this line: that every declaration, every speech, every statement of every man who is affiliated or belongs to that party, is bound by the speeches, the sentiments, the writings, the books, the publications of every other man affiliated with that association, whether they were present at the time when it was uttered or whether they were absent.

In its bearing on the decision of the Assembly, the third element of the case—the utterances of the accused men themselves—is likely to play less of a part than the other two; but from a broader point of view it is of the greatest interest of all. No speech or other expression of any of the five Socialist Assemblymen has been put in evidence that constitutes anything like direct advocacy of violent or lawless methods of bringing about the political and social revolution which the programme of the Socialist party undoubtedly contemplates. Stray expressions, of which the language is violent or extreme, have indeed been cited, but to these no sensible person attaches any great importance. What is regarded as important is the evidence of sympathy with Bolshevism, either Russian or other, and expressions of opinion to the general effect that unless a radical change is brought about peacefully it will some day or other be brought about by force. These things are very offensive to all of us who are attached to the existing institutions of the country, who take pride in its past, and who look forward to a future that shall be a worthy continuance of that past. But it is every man's right in a free country to declare that he is dissatisfied with its institutions, and that he proposes to do his utmost by lawful means to change or even to abolish them. Nor can he, without violation of the fundamental principles of free speech, be debarred from expressing his sympathy with people in other countries who resort to lawless or bloody means to accomplish objects which, as objects, he holds to be desirable. Thousands of patriotic, loyal, and law-abiding Americans regarded assassination and bomb-throwing as justifiable means of attempting the destruction of the Czarist despotism in Russia, throughout the long period of revolutionary agitation in that country. It is true that sympathy with the Russian Bolshevists tends to encourage Bolshevist plotting in this country; but it is also true that sympathy with Russian revolutionaries in the Nineteenth Century tended to encourage such assassinations as those of President Garfield and President McKinley.

If we are to preserve freedom of opinion, we must be prepared to maintain it in spite of its drawbacks. We must not erect it into a superstition; there is an essential difference between the free utterance of opinion and two other things which are often confounded with it—freedom to incite to lawless actions, and freedom to disseminate opinions in ways that are in themselves disorderly or indecent. Nothing of this kind is even alleged against the accused Assemblymen. If they really do sympathize with Lenin and Trotsky, surely no one can feel a greater abhorrence for their position than does the Review. But we have not reached the point where, for the sake of preserving our traditions of freedom and law, we are prepared to sacrifice one of the greatest of those traditions themselves. Americans are familiar with the fact that the most splendid intellects in the British Parliament at the time of our Revolution were undaunted champions of the American cause; but it would be well if at this time they recalled the fact that one of the foremost of them championed also the cause of the French Revolution. His advocacy of it caused a tragic severance of friendship between him and his great intellectual leader; but history does not record that Edmund Burke's profound abhorrence of Jacobinism led him to entertain any notion that Charles James Fox ought to be expelled from the House of Commons. It would be sad indeed if the America of the Twentieth Century should show itself more intolerant than the England of George the Third.

America and the Plight of Europe

SECRETARY GLASS, like Mr. Hoover, regards the European situation from an austere and logical standpoint. In his letter of January 28 to the Chamber of Commerce of the United States he sets forth the fundamentals which must guide the world if it is to resume the paths of economic blessedness. While admitting the logic in both the Glass and the Hoover statements, the average man can not fail to have some reservation on the point of their generosity and sympathy towards Europe. A carping critic might even question the good taste involved in lecturing our Allies at a time when they are confronted by heavy responsibilities as a result of their long fight to preserve the civilization of the world. It may be true that the people of Europe are indulging in widespread extravagance; it may be that their statesmen are not imposing taxation as heavily as we think they should. But still one may be permitted to ask if it is our place to assert and declare? Would not the limit of good taste be reached were our statesmen courteously to suggest?

Much has been written on the present disorganization of the exchanges. It requires no reiteration to bring home the dangers of this situation: exports from the United States valued at nearly eight billion dollars during the calendar year 1919, against corresponding imports valued at just under four billion dollars, leaving a balance due us for the year of approximately four billion dollars which our debtors can not promptly pay either in gold or goods. All this is very simple. It is easy to declaim about it. But we must not forget that the unprecedented disorganization of the world's economic machinery involves readjustments which can not be made at once.

The fundamental considerations relating to the problem are absolutely simple; the trouble lies in the intricacy of the practical application of those fundamentals. There is and can be only one solution of the present international financial difficulties, namely, an increase in production and an increase in saving on the part of the people of every country of the world. This necessity can not be obviated by any economic scheme which human ingenuity can devise. In proportion as the world shall work and save, just in that proportion can budgets be equalized and inflation reduced. This remedy is simple and unspectacular; but the world will not believe in it promptly, nor set about practising it with vigor and persistence until many hard days have come upon us. Offer a man a spectacular stock and paint a picture of affluence—his face lights up and you have his attention, and perhaps his money. Tell him to tighten his belt and get down to work, ten hours, twelve hours a day for an emergency period—he will turn away from your gloomy counsel and seek pleasanter pastures.

However, it is clear that the American business public are getting much education in the more practical features of foreign finance. We are developing some real international bankers. We may still be able to take up our share of the foreign trade which we shall be so eager for in the days to come. The cost of living in America may be lowered temporarily by a decline in exports from the United States at this time; but we shall do well to look forward to the time when the foreign countries which are now calling to us because of their necessities of reconstruction will be the object of our earnest solicitation as a necessary outlet for our important exportable surplus. These markets may not always be friendly if we do not cultivate them now. There is more to foreign trade than mere facts and figures.

The letter of Secretary Glass, together with the pages on international finance in his last Annual Report, the letter of Mr. Hoover, and the memorial recently submitted to the Government and to the Chamber of Commerce of the United States suggesting an international financial conference, form part of the common law on the new international situation. Their conclusions may be overruled by later experience; they may be confirmed by subsequent developments. But the main thing required is continued clear thinking and a minimum of dogmatism. Even the greatest minds can afford to be humble in the presence of debts measured in units of scores of billions.

What the future holds no one can say. It may be that private credit resources can be mobilized to meet the needs of European reconstruction. This does not mean bank credits; for the banks must keep their assets liquid to pay their depositors on demand. Does private action involve the sale of bonds to private investors? Will they buy? Is it sound to ask them to buy? Will they come forward with sufficient funds without positive governmental sanction? Can the large investor be expected to respond under our present system of supertaxes on large incomes? Should the American people, who have a stake in the foreign situation represented by Government loans of nearly ten billion dollars, and private loans to foreign Governments and municipalities of a billion and a half, and commercial credits of two billions more, lend more to make safe the great sums already advanced? Has the Government a direct obligation of leadership in this situation?

In answering these questions, there is no room for self-assurance and finality. Admittedly, the only remedy is the remedy of work and thrift. Debts must ultimately be paid with earned money, not promised money. If we will have patience a little longer we may see whether or not this fundamental moral as well as economic principle is going to prevail. Such emergency measures as may be needed meanwhile can at best be but temporary. With patience and cooperation, with the return of peace and a working understanding among the great nations of the world, we shall make progress.

Meanwhile millions will starve who could be saved from starvation if the tone of the Treasury letter is adopted by the people of America. It is very easy to carry over an aggressively asserted policy of governmental laissez-faire into a do-nothing private policy. America still has a heart, despite the more preponderant mentality of some of its public men. And if there ever were human facts to touch the heart of America, they exist to-day in the starving areas of Europe. Nor is it clear that our part in the work of rescue should be confined to the alleviation of immediate suffering.

And so we come back to our starting point. A world situation of terrible complexity confronts us. The strongest men in America are studying it from day to day, here and abroad. The answer is not clear. There never will be one all-inclusive answer. Meanwhile let us keep working at this—and at other things—with a good courage; and let us beware of those who talk to us in tones of mastery and full knowledge of a problem which passes the understanding of any single human mind.

Mr. Gompers vs. the Bolshevists

BY judgment and temperament, Mr. Gompers belongs with the group of conservative labor leaders represented at its best by the late John Mitchell. At heart a good American, devoted to American institutions, he realizes that no class would lose more by their subversion than that of the man who must make his living by the work of his own hands. The men over whom he has presided as head of the American Federation of Labor have both their extremist and their conservative elements, just as have other classes. While Mr. Gompers' record is by no means perfect as to his attitude toward lawless tendencies in labor organizations, he has given ample evidence of essential soundness on questions clearly involving the fundamentals of American institutions.

Fresh proof of this is furnished by his emphatic utterances of the past week in the editorial columns of the American Federationist. "We know about Russia," he says. "We know about Bolshevism. We know the piteous story of cruelty and intolerance, and we know the autocratic concept that underlies the minority dictatorship which is hailed to the world by its dupes and advocates as the most perfect state of society yet devised. We know about it, and we condemn it, completely, finally, and for all time." There is no mental confusion in those words. Not often is condemnation of a great wrong more lucidly and forcibly uttered.

Mr. Gompers is aware of the propaganda streaming in from Russia, but he regards the danger from that source as comparatively limited. The greater peril is from sources not discredited by known or presumptive connection with the Russian pay-rolls. "It is doubtful," he says, "whether those publications issued more or less directly by Russian Bolshevist agents have as great an effect in America as those publications which style themselves liberal, and which like to be known as journals of opinion, such as the Nation, the Dial, and the New Republic. In the same class with these are a number of newspaper and magazine writers who within the last two years have become more or less known as writers on the Bolshevist question." In these journals and writers of the "parlor Bolshevist" group, men and women who habitually preface their apologies for Bolshevists with a denial of personal belief in Bolshevism, Mr. Gompers finds "an air of tolerance, under the guise of which, however, support of the Bolshevist experiment has been at least generous." He can not accept the claim of these journals of opinion that we are not yet sufficiently informed as to what is going on in Russia, and should suspend our judgment on Bolshevism for the present, awaiting further information. This plea, in his view, "is a last desperate attempt to win favor from the American people for a system of government which, by the confession of its own advocates and defenders, is foreign to every concept of the American Republic."

Mr. Gompers is under severe pressure at the hands of revolutionary agitators who care nothing for American labor, but much for a possible opportunity to use the enormous power of the American Federation of Labor for destructive purposes. "Boring from within" has been no mere newspaper phrase for him, but a very real and painful process, not simply undermining his influence with the Federation, about which he is old enough not to feel much personal concern, but endangering the vital welfare of the American laborer. His fight against this insidious influence is no sudden impulse, but springs from a clear conception of the danger that threatens and a firm determination to meet it with all the resources and energy at his command. To free organized labor from its revolutionary parasites would be the greatest possible service that he could render.

It will be unfortunate for the employers of labor, unfortunate for the consumers of the products of labor, unfortunate for sober-minded citizens of whatever class, if they do not realize that in this struggle the enemies of Samuel Gompers are their enemies. Whether he has always been right in the past is not now an important question. His victory over the revolutionary forces seeking to work his destruction will do more than any other one thing now attainable to keep the pathway open to a sane and just settlement of labor problems. No right-minded employer of labor, at such a crisis, should put ammunition into the hands of the enemy by refusing or delaying any practicable and reasonable adjustment of grievances pending in his own portion of the labor field. The employer who in a time like this shows himself deaf or arrogant towards reasonable demands for amelioration does the one thing which is needed, in the mind of the laborer, to give the falsehoods of Bolshevism a dangerous semblance of truth.

What Are Colleges For?

THERE has been some fear lest the war should result in an unfortunate narrowing of the educational aims of our colleges and universities. The work of the scientific specialist in war service was so brilliant in itself, and lent itself so readily to newspaper publicity, that education along the lines of narrowly applied science seemed to many about the only thing worth while. The annual report of the President of Columbia, noticed in these columns a week or two ago, proved that no such idea is dominant there. And the trend of the Harvard report, by President Lowell, now before us, shows that Harvard, too, has passed the point of danger.

President Lowell takes direct issue with the view that the education of our young men should be "in the immediate problems of the day." It is not the problems of to-day, but of the future, with which the college student of to-day will have to deal, "and these are as little known and foreseen by us," he says, "as the questions now pressing were by our fathers, or theirs by an earlier generation." To give the youth of to-day the ability to deal wisely with the unforeseen problems of the future, President Lowell is not afraid to say, as Harvard presidents of generations long gone were wont to say, that "we must lay a foundation large and solid. We must train our students to think clearly." They must learn breadth and tolerance from the study of past experience, and profundity from communion with the thoughts of great men, thereby enabling themselves to distinguish the superficial or ephemeral from the fundamental and enduring. This, he holds, is the true meaning of the humanities, the study of what man has thought and done, not excluding what he is now thinking and doing, but not keeping the eye so closely upon the latter as to lose sight of the whole.

President Lowell does not regard the obligation of a college to its undergraduates as limited "to offering them an opportunity for self-improvement which they make take, neglect, or use in any way they please." The responsibility of the college is fulfilled only by positively encouraging the student to take advantage of his opportunity, and to develop his capacity for a useful and fruitful life. It is this feeling that has led to a system of distribution and concentration of studies in the student's individual course, under rules which place a very material restriction upon the freedom of "election" previously existing in Harvard. And to the same principle of college responsibility for the student's proper development, President Lowell refers the Harvard plan of requiring all freshmen to reside in the college dormitories. In this way, he thinks, can be established a consciousness among the students that they are bound together by common ties, and have common sentiments, aspirations, and interests. In the esprit de corps thus attained he hopes to find a line of practical approach for the moral influence which the undergraduate needs. While unwilling to make dormitory residence a positive requirement beyond the freshman year, he would be glad to see college dormitories so equipped and managed as to attract all students. Against the privately owned dormitory he raises the objection that it inevitably aims to gather those who can pay well, and thus tends to segregate the students on the basis of wealth.

THE REVIEW

A weekly journal of political and general discussion

Published by
THE NATIONAL WEEKLY CORPORATION
140 Nassau Street, New York

FABIAN FRANKLIN, President
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER, Treasurer

Subscription price, five dollars a year in advance. Fifteen cents a copy. Foreign postage, one dollar extra; Canadian postage, fifty cents extra. Foreign subscriptions may be sent to Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons, Ltd., 24, Bedford St., Strand, London, W. C. 2, England.
Copyright, 1920, in the United States of America

Editors

FABIAN FRANKLIN
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER

Associate Editors
HARRY MORGAN AYRES O. W. FIRKINS
A. J. BARNOUW W. H. JOHNSON
JEROME LANDFIELD

Abolishing the Political State

BOLSHEVISM, however detestable, has taught us much that it is needful to know—much that will be of incomputable value in our task of remaking the world. It has brought vividly to our forgetful minds the eternal proneness of a part of mankind, under the impulse of a fanatical creed or ideal, to inflict upon others the most savage cruelty. It has given us an illuminating example of the reflexes of that cruelty upon the minds and temperaments of other fanatics in other lands—particularly this land of ours. It has shown us again—what our optimism or our complacency has caused us to ignore—that jesuitry and hypocrisy are monopolized by no age or sect; that they flourish now and here as they did in Victorian England or mediæval Rome or ancient Egypt; and that the self-righteous may still vociferously proffer, in the name of democracy, liberty, and justice, unctuous excuses for tyranny, repression, and robbery. Its lessons are many, and all of them useful. One lesson, not the least in importance, may be drawn from the contrast between the industrial Government of revolutionary theory and the industrial Government of revolutionary fact.

The term "industrial Government" is used in two very different senses. It may mean either a Government the functions of which are predominantly industrial (if there is such a thing) or a Government which, whether predominantly industrial or political, is in the hands of the working class. It is the former meaning with which I am here concerned; and the question comes, "Is there such a thing as this industrial Government—Government which within constitutional limits is sovereign and yet which deals only or mainly with industrial questions?" The first Socialists of the Marxian school said that there would be such a thing with the triumph of Socialism. The capitalist state of a half-century ago they regarded as wholly political, even though it had already begun to enact social legislation. This state, they said, would pass away; and in its place would come something they refused to call a state, but a corporate entity concerned only with the administration of industrial affairs. Frederick Engels, the lifelong companion and disciple of Marx, in his answer to Eugen Duhring, wrote as follows: "As soon as there is no longer any class in society to be held in subjection, there is nothing more to repress, nothing requiring a special repressing power, the state." In another place he wrote to the effect that with the triumph of Socialism the government of human beings would end and the administration of things would begin.

August Bebel, in his book on "Woman," has the following:

"As the relations of master and servant disappear with the abolition of the present system of property, the political expression of the relationship ceases to have any meaning. The state expires with the expiration of the ruling class."

This concept of the disappearance of the political state and its succession by a power administering industrial affairs solely (because there would be no other affairs) was for a considerable time a commonplace in Socialist and ultra-radical thought. But it failed to convince many, even among those who accepted it. It had its origin in Germany; and it came to be regarded by the moderates as merely an expression of the bitter reaction against the Prussianism of a half-century ago. As the great nations developed their policy of social legislation the moderates came to a new concept. It was seen that the state was not necessarily wholly political, not necessarily capitalistic; that it could change with changing times, and that though it could fit itself so admirably to Prussian autocracy it might also fit itself to democracy and Socialism. As much as fifteen years ago Marxian Socialists in the United States were writing and speaking of the Socialist state. Socialists generally, both in this country and in Europe, had reached the position that the state was not to be abolished but to be transformed; and this concept steadily gained ground, at least until the Socialist party became tinctured with Bolshevism. Socialism would conquer the capitalist power at the ballot box, take over the state, continue those of its functions which were socially useful and add new functions. If by political functions are meant, in the main, those in which individuals are dealt with as citizens, and by industrial functions those in which individuals are dealt with as producers and consumers, there was nothing to show that the Socialist state would be any less political than the capitalist state. The fundamental relationship between individual and state was political, and no matter how far the state went in directing the control of industry, the primacy of the political relationship would be unaffected.

But the ultra-radicals would have none of all this. With communist anarchists, I. W. W.'s, S. L. P.'s, Bolsheviks, as well as with a strong minority of doctrinaires in the regular Socialist movement, the Engels concept and formula persisted. In the years just before the war it found expression in a rebellious movement in the American party, and in a similar movement in the German Social Democracy, led by Anton Pannekoek, which advocated direct action, and which, fashioning a phrase, "the cretinism of parliaments," rejected representative Government as useless to the working class and proposed the "industrialization of society." It has also powerfully affected the speculative divagations of an exceedingly highbrow school, copiously represented in some of our "journals of opinion," which proffers a system so far unnamed, but which may fittingly be called the "Federationism of Experimental Allegiances."

Perhaps even an I. W. W. or an F. E. A. would admit that any working-class administration supreme in authority would have to deal with such problems as sanitation, schools, parks, and playgrounds, nationalization, the franchise, elections, and relations with other nations or societies. He might also admit, especially since Lenin has said that the main business of a proletarian régime is to crush out opposition, that such an administration would have to deal with the problems of penal codes, prisons, police, detectives, and the conscription of armies. It is hard for the ordinary person to see how the mere calling of these problems by the term "industrial" would alter their character—equally hard to see how in any order of society they would be other than the same sort of problems that they are to-day. More difficult yet is to imagine them vanishing, or settling themselves automatically, through the mere transformation of capitalism into organized coöperation.

Argument, however, is unnecessary; for in Soviet Russia we have a striking test of the theory. From the Bolsheviki one might reasonably expect some approaches to this type of Government. They have the power, backed by the bayonet and the food decree, to enforce compliance. They have formally and bitterly repudiated modern Socialism, and they claim direct inheritance from Marx and Engels, with a doctrine uncorrupted by compromises with bourgeois thought. In Sovdepia therefore, if anywhere, should the observant look for the wiping out of political Government.

But he will look in vain. Soviet Russia has become the most rigorous political Government on earth. The "administration of things" has broken down at a thousand points, but the "government of human beings" has been extended and intensified to a degree heretofore inconceivable. The latest refugees are unanimous in their testimony that not a day passes without the issue of new decrees. There must be the registration of this, the surrender of that, payments must be made so and so, information must be given at such a place, in this or that manner, and with a stated frequency. On top of the denial or manipulation of the franchise and the suppression of speech, press, and assemblage, there is thus laid on the citizen the further tyranny of guidance by decree. Every movement of the individual is under executive direction; and not to know the prohibitions, or knowing, to violate the least of them, is to land oneself in jail.

"The state expires with the expiration of the ruling class," wrote Bebel. "As soon as there is no longer any class in society to be held in subjection—there is nothing more to repress, nothing requiring a special repressing power, the state." Well, it would appear that the bourgeoisie as a ruling class has expired. But the rest of the formula does not follow. The state, instead of expiring, waxes constantly more autocratic; it represses, with a brutal hand, those who disagree with it; and this repression is not of a class, but of dissident individuals of the same class (or mixture of classes) as that of the rulers. The bourgeoisie has indeed suffered; but the greater weight of Bolshevik brutality has fallen upon the Social Democrats and the Socialist Revolutionists. The abolition of the bourgeoisie has not abolished the political state; it has resulted in a political tyranny which would be impossible under capitalism.

All dogmas are to be viewed with suspicion. This one, the dogma of the disappearance of the political state by reason of the expropriation of capital, never had the slightest logical basis; it was an assumption arising out of a hatred of Bismarckism; it was sweeping, audacious, and "revolutionary," and it captivated thousands of zealots who took it as an expression of prophetic wisdom. More reasonable beings sought to show its fallaciousness, but the zealots refused to listen. At the first touch of reality it has exploded and left not a wrack behind.

W. J. GHENT

The Human Cost of Living

OUR industries kill and maim over 1,600 persons daily—half as many as were killed on the Union side at Gettysburg. Every six months our industrial casualty list exceeds the fatalities of the United States in the Great War. In fact, it has been estimated that the hazards of modern industry are equal to those that were found in the trenches on the Western Front. The only difference lies in the manner in which we sense the carnage: bunch the list to represent the human sacrifice necessary to gain an objective in battle or to record the effect of a great catastrophe and we are horrified; scatter it among ten thousand manufacturing plants over a period of six months and it scarcely causes a ripple on the surface of one's interest.

When one thinks of an industrial hazard, it is of the engineer on the Twentieth Century Limited swaying in his engine, plowing into the night at seventy miles an hour. One doesn't think of the marble-cutter at the corner shop unromantically hammering hour by hour at the dusty stone—inhaling a powder that brings premature death.

The tremendous facts of experience are accepted and commonplace. We dress, shave, eat, walk, ride, work, play, and write checks to discharge our obligations. They are ours if we pay for them. But is there any medium of exchange and measure of value that pays for the human risks that are assumed in constructing the accepted things of our lives? Will a dollar pay for the steel of a jackknife which was forged from a heat that burned alive three laborers when the ladle tilted and spilled? The human cost of living in civilized society!

Let us follow John Brown, of Detroit, as he is about to turn in, and see what a debt to his brethren of industry he is accumulating. What is the human cost of John Brown's right to live?

John starts to go to bed at 10 P. M. He snaps out the light. John, fifty years ago, would have blown out a chimney-smoked lamp or snuffed a candle. It isn't necessary to dwell on the comparative comforts of oil lamps and a system of indirect lighting—John has never known the inconvenience of the former, neither has he realized the value of the latter; he accepts the electric light as his heritage, paying for it at so much per kilowatt-hour. It might interest John to know that Edison, Westinghouse, and Tesla devoted a major portion of their lives to perfecting his lights. Hundreds of experimenters and testers were killed from electric shock before the alternating current was made safe. To-day, the testing of generators, motors, transformers, and switchboards is a dangerous occupation. Central station operation takes its toll in lives every year. Even John knows of at least one lineman who has met death repairing a live wire. Electricity to-day is comparatively safe, but it has taken forty years of human sacrifice to make it safe enough so that John may snap out his light and go to bed without a twinge of conscience. Seventy per cent. of all the fatal accidents in 1917 were caused by electric shock, John.

Just a moment, John, before you go to bed! It takes coal or water power to generate electric current. Coal mining is highly dangerous. Perhaps the current you burned in the last hour was generated from coal dug from the bowels of a Pennsylvania mountain that recently caved in, burying ten miners alive. Of course, they didn't risk their lives for you—they were after the tonnage—but whether they realized it or not, they were serving you, John, as faithfully and as courageously as your brother did in the trenches.

The coal that generated the steam that turned the turbine that sped the armature that created the 1600 volts that were stepped down to 110 volts that entered your house through a safety switch and insulated wire that burned in a filament enclosed in a vacuum globe—that coal has another story. It was carried out of the mine on electric cars. Sometimes sparks from the wire ignited methane gas in the mine and blew the miner to fragments. It is loaded on cars and hauled to Detroit. Think of the men that have been killed and injured in the steam-railroad service getting coal from Pittsburgh to Detroit! Think of George Westinghouse and forty-five years of tireless devotion to the air brake that has made freight trains a mile in length safe! The coal was fed into the furnaces at the central station by automatic stokers—they are made of iron and steel. Need I tell that story? Need I tell the story of the thousands of girls that sit, day in and day out, winding the coils for the generators, or the story of the men with fingers gone and feet crushed that have built the transformers? John, you couldn't pay for one kilowatt-hour of your current even though you were the richest man in Detroit.

Go on to bed and sleep—while the globe of the electric light cools and the carbon filament becomes gray. If you thought of the hours of life that were taken from the men that blew the glass for the small bulbs of your lights—in the intense heat of the glass oven—you could not sleep.

John, when your house was built, the men who did the work assumed a risk for you. Climbing round on ladders and scaffolding isn't the safest occupation in the world. Ladder casualties cost Ohio in compensation last year $49,574. If all of the metal products that went into your house came from Pennsylvania in 1918, you can figure that you, with all other customers who bought the metal, were responsible for 6,218 burns and scalds. In fact, the total number of burns and scalds in all Pennsylvania industries in 1918 was 12,394. Burns and scalds are not confined to any particular class of accidents, but cover every phase of industrial effort.

Modern industrial practice has promoted the traveling crane to first place as a mechanical conveyor, with an increasing danger to the workingman. Parts weaken with rough usage and constant impact, gears become worn, outside cranes are subject to pressure under high winds, footwalks beneath the cranes are dangerous, flying hooks strike workingmen, chains part, castings break loose and fall, operators inadvertently throw switches and start cranes with a repairman on the track, heat from spilled metal below cooks operators, and dynamic brakes fail to function. It costs in human life, John, to move the material that goes into your house.

We have followed John Brown of Detroit from the electric-light switch to his bed. Already we find an indictment of John's indifference that is staggering. We have selected one of the simplest devices that contribute to John's comfort and find that thousands of lives have been sacrificed to achieve this sole modern convenience, the electric light. To continue to follow John on the morrow about his home, on the city street, in the office building, at the hotel, on the surface car and in the theatre, measuring the "human cost" en route would drive John mad.

The whole conception is depressing in one sense, but in another highly stimulating. For it makes one feel that the drudgery and monotony of our day's work is not in vain, that the mite that we can do before we die to pay our debt to the civilization of yesterday is all too small. It is a dominant thread in the warp and woof of industrial relationship that relieves us of the pressure of crass materialism. After all, those who have contributed most to even our material comfort and well-being are very real heroes. The service of the men who have worked in the pit and the mine, in the machine-shop and on the wharves, in our offices and places of tremendous responsibility—the captains and privates of industry—these are heroes indeed.

And yet, industries kill and maim 1,600 persons daily! In a sense one can understand why our employees are crying aloud for a new industrial relationship—this carnage must be stopped! But I doubt if it is humanly possible to do more than our great industrial organizations like the United States Steel Corporation, the General Electric Company, the Eastman Kodak Company, or any one of a hundred others are doing to-day. The fight that the National Safety Council, the National Electric Light Association, and a score of safety-device companies, like the Square D Company of Detroit, are making to protect human life is bearing fruit. They are dealing with "things as they are."

Even so, our industrial accident rate is disgraceful. Undoubtedly it provides great ammunition for the Reds, the I. W. W.'s, and Bolsheviks, and it takes a rather comprehensive understanding of the tremendous difficulties of our accident problem to make one discount their ranting. To condemn the present economic order that has endured for centuries, and has at any rate worked, because its present complexity has so hidden the elements that we see only the driftwood of its progress, is superficial and unjust.

Theoretically, the alternative—the nightmare—the Soviet Government—is a very beautifully conceived plan. I think there are no industrial accidents in Soviet industry.

DAVID HAROLD COLCORD

The Lady of the Violets

AFTER all, the East Side begins at Fifth Avenue, and somewhere between the cool green-bordered spaces of the Park and the somewhat leaden waters of the East River there dwells a fair proportion of the two per cent. of the population which is said to own sixty per cent. of the country's wealth, and a rather large proportion of the remaining percentages of wealth and population. Wealth, it may be observed in passing, is somewhat more in evidence on the Avenue of Palaces, and population on the cluttered sidewalks and crowded fire-escapes nearer the river.

Eastward one goes—Madison, severely correct and a trifle depressing; Park, magnificent duplex apartments towering heavenward at dizzying rates; Lexington, a respectable shadow of former greatness. Lexington is the social Rubicon. Beyond lies the proletariat. But as the mantle of equal franchise has now fallen upon all alike, one may encounter the mistress of a palace on the Avenue presiding over a drawing-room discussion of politics, and within the hour run into a little woman on Avenue A, her big dark eyes glowing under a shawl, also discussing politics, and both are voters.

Voters both. For the Lady of the Violets has voted, many of her, and will do so again in increasing numbers in this Presidential year, quite unmindful of the threat reiterated in two exhilarating suffrage campaigns—"I don't care if you do force it on us, I will never, never vote," and later modified to "Oh, now I've got to vote whether I want to or not. What! Well, of course I don't have to, but you don't suppose we're going to let you run everything, do you?"

And vote they did, and not only that, but campaigned vigorously and with well-defined partisan adherence, which indicated at least certain inherited proclivities. And it is a fact that many potential executive types lurk behind the fronts of the palaces, waiting only the ignition spark to leap into new but congenial activities. No wonder that one candidate addressed his drawing-room audiences as "my only hope," and, judging by the fact that he was elected, there may have been something in it. Of course one has a suspicion—just a tiny little suspicion—that some of the Violet Lady's enthusiasm was due chiefly to the fact that certain candidates were practically "favorite sons" of the Avenue, as indicated by the fair citizen who triumphantly declared that she had voted for that dear Mr. Blank, and hadn't put another solitary mark on her ballot! But only a mere carper would carp at such a trifle; rather one notes the whirlwind of interest, the Belgian King and Queen to be entertained, a battalion of the all-important débutantes, and politics; and politics ran a dead heat with the other two and landed in front of the field on election day.

Gone indeed are the dear dead classic days of the hetaerae, whose intellectual and political companionship consoled their patrician friends beyond the narrow confines of domesticity. Politics has landed plump in the bosom of the family. Voter Père, Voter Mère, sons and daughters, and incautious males are likely to be confronted by a buxom mother, of the politically overnourished type, oozing "welfare" bills at every pore, a number of said bills being doomed to be passed at one session of the Assembly only to be repudiated by their sponsors before the next at stormy club meetings that almost wreck the organization.

Naturally, one observes a few trifling elisions amid all this fervor. For example, an examination of the primary lists with a high-powered magnifying glass reveals scarcely more than a trace of that soulful devotion known chiefly to the hard-boiled "regulars" who vote at the primaries even if they have to be carried there. Primaries are a trifle tiresome, don't you think, and, anyhow, nobody is ever really elected at them. But the onward movement now flows freely along the Avenue and its lesser satellites, and it is a matter of steadily increasing record that the Lady of the Violets, inspired perhaps by what Mrs. Siddons called a "desperate tranquillity" that always came to her before her greatest efforts, glides lightly through the ordeal, and is acclaimed to a waiting world in the morning press as having "voted like veterans."

But, with democracy itself in the melting pot, there are strange digressions beyond party lines. Take, for example, a section of a city, "communityized" beyond all resemblance to Jeffersonian democracy, and functioning as a "unit" vaguely but disturbingly suggesting certain familiar features of the Soviet, not the least insistent of which is the frank acknowledgment that the ultimate mission of the "unit" is political control. Somehow all roads seem to lead to the ballot box sooner or later. Thus it is that while all the older, well-known leaders and the great majority of the rank and file of women citizens are taking their politics straight, many others on the hither side of the Rubicon are sipping daintily, with a little near-Bolshevism on the side. Anything, so it isn't regular Plymouth-Rock-Pilgrim-Father-and-Mother stuff. For imagine the political darkness of one who has never had a block head worker—no, that should be head block worker—a head block worker call and ask more questions than the income tax commissioner and the census man put together, to the end that the Chairman of the Central Advisory Council may tell you how to do all the things you have always known how to do all your life. The most terrifying part is that you are airily informed that we know all about you anyway! A false dawn of liberty indeed, a mockery of the decent privacies that protect the initiative of individuality in the organized channels of government.

Yet the sinister propaganda goes on in myriad forms, questionable publications financed, dubious doctrines murmured softly, now and then a multi-millionaire pledging the support of his fortune to ultra-radicalism as lightly as a Roman noble flung priceless pearls into a flagon of wine—and we are only deporting aliens! Fortunately, clear voices are raised in the strident chaos. Some of them are women's voices. It seems something more than a mere chance that next June in the city of Madrid, old Madrid, erstwhile citadel of mediævalism, there will meet in conference the International Suffrage Alliance, delegates from our own seventeen millions of enfranchised women leading the representation of one hundred millions of women who are functioning politically, at least to some extent, in their respective countries. And there is an unmistakable unity of design behind it. It means that the spirit of the Middle Ages, mellowed by the intervening centuries, has met with the advancing, conquering spirit of the Anglo-Saxon, firmly establishing the rights of men and women in constitutional government. And the Lady of the Violets will be there, a champion of law and order. The Red army can not make permanent headway against the massed sanity of the world.

MARY C. FRANCIS

Correspondence

Radical or Conservative—a Perverse Dilemma

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

In these days of social, economic, and political unrest, our estimate of social forces, tendencies, and aspirations readily becomes confused with extraneous and often wholly irrelevant considerations. Thus we observe that the concepts, radicalism and conservatism, are well on the way toward replacing most other concepts involving social attitudes. Now, radicalism and conservatism, when looked at from the standpoint of their relation to civilization and to society, represent two inherent and equally basic characteristics of the social organism. Conservatism, the guardian of the old and established, is of the very essence of civilization; were it not for conservatism, the fluidity of civilization would result in inevitable self-annihilation. Radicalism, on the other hand, is but the limiting concept which includes all that stands for change, for progress, for reform, for creativeness. The conservative and the radical thus representing functions inherent in the very nature of society, have both their legitimate places, but the very legitimacy of these activities imposes upon their representatives the duty and the burden of knowing whereof they speak, of a thorough and searching familiarity with that society of which they constitute themselves the guardians and the directors.

On the other hand, it is ignorance, narrow-mindedness, snobbishness, and a selfish detachment from the vital problems of the hour which transform the conservative into a reactionary, who is a menace and a nuisance, a burden and a drag upon society. The same is true of the radical. It is ignorance, crudeness of attitude, superficiality of concrete background, lack of social experience, hazy idealism, which transform him into that "red" and dangerous individual whose intentions, idealistic though they may be, are shattered on the rock of incompetence and fanaticism. Knowledge about society, saturation with the values of civilization, from which alone can spring a deep-rooted humanitarianism and an idealism steeped in the realities of life, these are the prerequisites which the conservative and radical stand equally in need of. It is, therefore, best fitting that at this time, when reconstruction of the very foundations of our civilization is at hand, a body of scholars, idealists and humanitarians, should find themselves united in the common purpose of making society and civilization the object of their study, their discussions, and their teachings. Such is the source from which springs The New School for Social Research.

From the standpoint represented at the New School, radicalism and conservatism are but two among many concepts applicable to tendencies of individuals as well as groups in society. Neither of these concepts can claim to describe in any adequate way the aims, ideals, or methods of the New School. What it aspires to is to know and understand, and to impart to others the knowledge and understanding of the static and dynamic factors which hold and move that intricate fabric of actions, motives, ideas, and emotions which is our civilization. It seems thus both inaccurate and unjust to estimate, as has often been done, the significance of this new enterprise in terms of what is but a perverse dilemma—radicalism and conservatism. The School is neither radical nor conservative; but it wants to help the radical to guide and inspire social change rather than to fulminate and destroy, and it wants to teach the conservative wisely to safeguard the stability of essential principles and basic structures rather than stubbornly to hang on to antiquated ideas and institutions whose usefulness is no longer actual.

A. A. GOLDENWEISER

The New School for Social Research, New York, January 22

"Life or Death for the Railroads?"

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

I have been charmed by the interesting experiment Mr. Woodlock attempts in last week's Review in discussing the railroads. In one column, to discredit government operation, he declares that the Government took over "a solvent system in reasonably good physical condition." In the adjoining column, when another purpose was in his mind, he asserts that when the Government took over the railroads they were a "carcass," from which the Government "was gradually but surely starving the last sparks of life."

I believe the public is disposed to deal justly with the railroads, being fair-minded and having recovered from the entirely natural but disastrous reaction from the period when railroads controlled politics and grossly abused their control. But its state of mind will hardly be improved when its friends get their wires crossed so badly as Mr. Woodlock allowed his to become.

STILLMAN H. BINGHAM

Duluth, Minn., January 14

[The first of the sentences to which our correspondent refers was:

> As things stand at present it is not in the least degree an exaggeration to say that the Government, which took over at the end of 1917 a solvent system of railroads in reasonably good physical condition, is handing it back to owners in a state of physical deterioration and financial insolvency.

The second was:

> The Esch bill may be summed up in a word as the perpetuation of the miserable system of control of railroads which in 1914, when the war broke out, was gradually but surely starving the last sparks of life from the carcass.

There is no real contradiction between the two statements, though the picturesque emphasis of the language in the second may be open to objection. The "life" that Mr. Woodlock had in mind, and of which the "sparks" were being "gradually but surely" extinguished, was the life of enterprise, that kind of life which means the attraction of new capital and the continuation of progress. Such a process of injury may go on for a long time without bringing about "financial insolvency," and without reducing the "physical condition" of the roads below the point where it may still be described as "reasonably good."—Eds. THE REVIEW.]

Confiscation by Amendment

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

At a public meeting in Yonkers on the evening of January 11, Professor Scott Nearing, a well-known Socialist, who had been advocating the nationalization of private property, was asked by one of his audience: "How do you propose to take property away from its owners?" His answer was: "In the same way that the property of the brewers and distillers was taken, by constitutional amendment. The prohibitionists have shown us the way by which property can be taken for public purposes without compensation to the owners."

This frank admission that the Socialists purpose amending the Constitution of the United States so as to enable them to confiscate private property without compensation, should arouse the American people to a realization of the momentous issues involved in the question of the validity of the Eighteenth Amendment, soon to be argued before the Supreme Court of the United States. As is clearly shown in the pleadings filed in the test suit brought by us, if the Eighteenth Amendment is held to be valid it will be in the power of 180 members of Congress, 86 less than a majority of both Houses, to submit radical and revolutionary amendments to the State Legislatures. These amendments can be ratified by a bare majority of a quorum of the members of 36 Legislatures, less than 2,800 members being necessary to ratify. Thus less than 3,000 men can amend the Constitution so as to confiscate the entire property interests of the country, even though the subjects of the amendments were never submitted to the people of the several States.

Article 5 of the Federal Constitution provides that private property shall not be taken for a public purpose without just compensation. If the Supreme Court decides that an amendment destroying property values of $1,000,000,000 is valid, an amendment confiscating the railroads or steel industries would be equally valid.

The American people should know that a decision sustaining the validity of the Eighteenth Amendment opens the way for Socialism, Communism, or Syndicalism to abolish the right to private property, the basis of all civilized society, by the action of less than 3,000 persons.

E. J. SHRIVER

Chairman Executive Committee, The Vigilance League

New York, January 19

Public Schools and the Colleges

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

I have read with great interest the comment in your issue of December 27 on the good showing made at the colleges by boys from the public schools as compared with boys from the private schools.

You rightly observe that this does not mean better training at public than at private schools, but it is because of the process of "sharp selection" on account of "natural ability" and "inclination to study." The boys at the private schools lack this incentive, feeling that they will get to college anyhow.

There is something fundamentally wrong with such a situation, and in order to make our colleges a more vital factor in American life, some attempt should be made to improve conditions.

Theoretically, the colleges should be a part of our system of free public education, and as it would be desirable to have only a comparatively small percentage of our youths sent to college, those who do go should be chosen by reason of their "natural ability" and "inclination to study," and not because of the financial standing of their parents.

In the words of C. R. Mann, Chairman of the Advisory Board of the Committee on Education and Special Training of the War Department, when speaking of the methods of selection being put into practice in the college S. A. T. C. units towards the close of the war, "As these methods come more and more into general use and as they are perfected, the schools will gradually achieve a system in which ability, rather than financial competency, will be the entrance requirements for higher education."

Unfortunately, political conditions at present preclude the idea of having our colleges managed by the State, but still a start could be made by properly directed effort. Why not point out to public benefactors the chance to form and endow an educational foundation to assist in the matter? Such a body need not undertake to establish colleges, but having made arrangements with certain colleges in various parts of the country, it could then provide free scholarships in such colleges to those worthy of them; that is to say, to those who qualify by passing the required tests.

Here, indeed, would be real equality of opportunity in education which at the present time does not exist.

WALTER H. BUCK

Baltimore, Md., January 5

The "Cahiers de la Quinzaine"

[The author of the following letter, a young French officer, is the eldest son of the poet and essayist, Charles Péguy, who was killed at the battle of the Marne, and who edited during a long term of years what was known as "Cahiers de la Quinzaine," a series of pamphlets and volumes, which appeared from 1900 to the breaking out of the war, forming a collection of about 230 separate publications, from writers known and unknown.]

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

I have only just been discharged from the army. Demobilization has been very slow here in France on account of the bad temper shown by the Germans in carrying out the disarmament clauses of the treaty. All my spare time from military duties was devoted to trying to complete a set or two of the "Cahiers," not an easy task, as none of my father's friends are disposed to sell their sets, even at a high price. The fact is that only some of his very oldest friends really have complete sets, most of them lacking the first and second series, which appeared during 1900 and 1901, and embraced contributions from Romain Rolland, Jérome and Jean Tharaud, and other writers who have since become known. These two series were printed in a very limited edition, and it is now almost impossible to find copies of some of the issues. I have succeeded, however, in discovering isolated copies in out of the way places in France and have bought them at a high price, so that I have finally brought together two complete sets of the "Cahiers." But unless I can soon find a purchaser, I shall be obliged to sell them at a loss, the high exchange just now being the only way in which I can make any profit out of the bargain. In this affair I have used up all the money I saved on my army pay, and if I can not find a buyer in America, I shall have to sell them at a loss so as to get money to go on with my studies.

MARCEL PEGUY

18 rue Flatters, Paris, December 20

Book Reviews

France and Her Colonies

NOTRE FORCE FUTURE. Par Jean Dybowski, Inspecteur Général de l'Agriculture Coloniale. Paris: Payot & Cie. New York: Brentano. 1919.

FEW Americans are more than dimly aware of the fact that France controls a colonial territory of about ten times her own area, and inhabited by native races surpassing her own population by one-third. Indeed, the author of this volume insists that even Frenchmen themselves are not wide-awake to the fact and its present significance. It is the purpose of his pages to show what this significance is, and how its rich possibilities may be realized. In brief, his thesis is that the colonies of France are admirably adapted, by conditions of soil and climate, to render just the complementary aid to home production which is needed to lift the country out of the troubles brought on by the war and ensure a prosperous future. He sees, of course, that France is in no position to send out colonies en masse. But the native population already on the ground renders this unnecessary. France has already demonstrated her ability to get the confidence of the native, and start him on the upward path in many fields of productive efficiency. The effective presence on the battle front of hundreds of thousands of her colonial troops left no room for doubt on that point. To their successful use in the development of colonial agriculture, on a large and remunerative scale, two things are fundamentally essential, and these are simply humane treatment and intelligent direction.

For the too-well-known method of commercial exploitation of colonial territory by the virtual enslavement of the native, he has nothing but unmitigated condemnation. No possible temporary financial gain can counterbalance the probability of disaster towards which that path leads, under modern conditions of world-wide public sentiment. The native must not be forced, but must be led to labor by the assurance that he shall have his share in the fruits of that labor, and that his life shall thus be made happier and more secure. Very careful attention is given to the necessity of intelligent direction, if colonial possibilities are to be realized. Conditions in the colonies are widely different from those of France itself, and the successful farmer of the homeland is still in need of special knowledge and adaptability in order to repeat that success in Madagascar, Cambodia, or along the valley of the Niger. A system of special education for such work had already been inaugurated before the war, and M. Dybowski insists that this must be greatly developed and strengthened as rapidly as possible. He also gives warning to the people of France that if the colonial source of aid in time of need is to be made available, it must not be hampered by home jealousy of colonial competition. If the coco palms of the provinces can make a cheap and healthful addition to the expensive and insufficient butter supply of France, her legislators must not put a handicap on it through fear of the vote of the French dairyman.

M. Dybowski writes from a point of view attained by a thorough scientific study of agriculture, in both theory and practice, and by many years of official connection with its application to the French colonies, all of which he has studied in detail on the ground. The book should have a wide and deep influence in France, and is well worth the attention of American readers especially concerned with the intelligent development of agriculture.

The Old and the New

The Life and Letters of Lady Dorothy Nevill. By her Son, Ralph Nevill. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.

IF you took a cross section, so to speak, of the high-stepping eighteenth century and set it down in the sober circle of the nineteenth, you would have something comparable to the life of this descendant of the Walpoles and friend of all the great Victorian families. Lady Dorothy's relations to the world were already pretty well known from her own memoirs, but this biography by her son tells things about her which naturally she herself would not say, and it adds to the piquancy of the setting by showing the social relics of a past age as they appeared to one coming upon the scene still a generation later. Mr. Nevill, we may hint, is not much of a writer: he is not always clear when it comes to tracing the vast family ramifications which no doubt seem simple enough to him but to the outside barbarian are about as complicated as Kant's categories; he has an imperfect sense of order and construction, but as a compensation he knew and understood his mother, and he is familiar with her world with all its scandals and eccentricities and humors and decorums and magnanimities and condescensions, and he makes it real and vivid to the reader—which is no small part of authorship, after all.

As for reviewing such a work, made up as it is of patches and pieces, there is nothing to do but gather together a few samples; it is a case where the house may be known from its bricks. Coming to the book as this reviewer does with a strong predilection for the oddities and originals of Horace Walpole's gallery, he confesses that he has been particularly delighted by the portrait of such a monster of egotism as the Lord Clanricarde, whom Lady Dorothy used to meet at Christie's and found highly to her taste —or to one of her tastes. In his youth this scion of the nobility had been poor, and while an attaché to Sir John Hudson at Turin saved money by arranging with the custodian of an arch to sleep in the small chamber where the pails and brooms were kept. He did his own tailoring, it was said; and still in his old age you could detect his handiwork by the rough stitching which held together a yawning coat or a battered hat. For release from poverty only left him a miser. At home his greatest gastronomic extravagance was a couple of eggs, about the size of which he was very particular, keeping in the kitchen an old hard-boiled egg to show his servant the minimum he would accept. As a smoker his habits were incredible. A cigar, he thought, was never at its best until the third time of smoking. To indulge in this refinement of luxury he would cut off the end when about an inch had gone and put the remainder away; at the second time of smoking he would cut off another inch, and keep the stump as a bonne bouche for some special occasion.

Yet with all his stinginess and slovenliness Clanricarde had his touches of magnificence, even of coquetry. Though his tie might be secured about his neck by a piece of old tape, you would see in it a family jewel of great price. A favorite scarf-pin was a large diamond, at the back of which he would insert bits of paper colored by himself from a child's paint-box so as to obtain various effects. Though, too, his manners in general were almost brutal—it might almost have been said of him, as it was actually said of one of his tribe, that he made it a rule to decline to be introduced to people he did not already know—yet withal he was unmistakably a gentleman by the secret signs, and could at will be very gracious. His talk was a repository of all dead and living scandals, but he spoke with the accent of a philosopher. He lives imbedded in Mr. Nevill's pages; imagine, if you dare, how he would have tricked himself out in the letters of the present biographer's ancestral cousin, Horace Walpole!

We do not forget that we are reviewing the life of Lady Dorothy Nevill, and not that of Lord Clanricarde; but such, in part, was the atmosphere in which she lived— the eighteenth century, still refusing to die, was all about her. Nor would we have it supposed that this Whiggish society was entirely eccentric or egotistic; prouder names still resound through these pages—Chesterfields and Churchills and all the rest of the clan—some of them still doing large things, some of them courtly in their lives, some of them serving the state with a true and noble devotion; better men and women than the Clanricardes, though not necessarily so amusing to read about.

And by the side of these inheritors of renown and—as some would say, but never this reviewer—of infamy, Lady Dorothy lived much in the pulsing life of her own century and its needs and achievements. The Darwins and Tennysons and Chamberlains, half the famous names in science, poetry, art, statesmanship, are sprinkled over these pages; and the bearers of them came to their hostess to consult her about the newest things that were stirring in the world. This contrast of the new and the old is one of the charms of the record, and these divided, but never conflicting, interests were what made Lady Dorothy so significant and so loved a figure in the society that has just passed away.

Mr. Nevill's work is not perfect or important; but it is entertaining, and it has some meaning for those whose outlook is wider than the circle of this weltering twentieth century.

On Our Way

Youth Goes Seeking. By Oscar Graeve. New York: Dodd, Mead and Company.

The World of Wonderful Reality. By E. Temple Thurston. New York: D. Appleton and Company.

A Woman's Man. By Marjorie Patterson. New York: George H. Doran Company.

LIFE as a quest, we are always saying, is the root theme of all serious fiction; and the favorite story the world over is that of youth which goeth seeking. What it seeks, and how, remain questions which the story-tellers are free to answer in a thousand ways. Salvation, service, happiness, fame—any or all of these are among the common objects of adventure. But an adventure it must be. If we except the merely acquisitive industrious apprentices and Rockefellers of all ages and grades, youth does not choose to climb from surety to surety. Its primary impulse is less to build upon known good than to escape from known discomfort or tedium. Therefore, the romance of youth invariably begins with a violent dash of escape from dullness and smugness and routine, and fares on to the heroic-pathetic attempt at blazing an altogether new path to the stars, or at least to the given stripling's own private star. We must find the outlet first of all, whether to physical adventure, or the adventure of getting on, or the adventure of art, or the adventure of free relations, social and sexual and (as it were) intellectual.

Bohemia! However age may laugh at it, or even deny it altogether, youth knows better. A poor thing, but youth's own. Riddled with conventions and shams? They are at least the conventions and shams youth itself has chosen for its make-believe. If liberty and license are not the same thing, we have only Age's word for it: Let's see for ourselves! . . . So reasons the Henry Baker of "Youth Goes Seeking": a complete type of the essentially decent young fellow who longs passionately to be something more than a cog in the wooden machine of respectability and success. He lives with an uncle in Brooklyn, that dull and dominating elderly codger who in current fiction still represents the "Victorian" attitude. He has a "fat sonorous voice"; he bullies and blusters; he is grossly thick of wit and sympathy. Henry's schooling means something to Henry, and he wants to go to college. Not if the uncle knows it. Henry is to come into business with him, and, if he is good, to succeed him some day. Poor Henry is not interested in the manufacture of leather belting; but he knocks under. He shows some ability in the business. Unluckily, he has brought to it certain modern notions about the relation of employer and laborer — "unsettled ideas — dangerous ideas," cries the fusty old uncle. Henry is strong enough to have some of these ideas tried out—with small success. At twenty-five he is disillusioned of his rôles as industrious apprentice and benevolent employer, and quite ready to cut loose and "see life." This means throwing up his job and flitting across the river to the purlieus of Greenwich Village. There he shares a satisfactorily shabby room with his boy-friend Bert, now a proudly Bohemian newspaperman; and is presently engaged in those seriocomic feasts and love-feasts which are known to be the staples of life in all Bohemians. Ann Corcoran, the special partner of his freedom, is a well-drawn portrait of the modern virgin who, after much display of independence, sells her cold beauty to an old rich man. Henry has not failed to make modern youth's impassioned appeal to her: "I shall not interfere with your work," he pleads. "Marry me and things will go on just as they are—just as they are. You will retain your freedom—all of it. I shall only ask that I may creep up the back stairs to you once in a great while and offer you my love, dear—my heart to do with it as you will—to send it back empty if you wish, but happy with the glimpse of you—the look of you." Now Ann is properly touched by this wormlike devotion, but foresees that his view of the future is probably not so clear as it might be: he will be asking something more of her some day. There ensue certain emotional incidents which, apparently, reveal to Ann that she loves Henry and to Henry that he does not love Ann; and Ann goes off with her old rich man, leaving Henry to marry the Sadie whom he has taken off the streets, and whom in due season the now chastened and enlightened uncle and aunt are to take to their bosoms and their Brooklyn mansion as Henry's fitting mate! Thus confusedly and ardently youth in the person of the author interprets or reflects the muddle of youth.

"The World of Wonderful Reality" culminates in an analogous situation—the hero being disillusioned of his sentiment for the damsel of higher degree who, for her part, is revolted by the actualities of his Bohemian existence and not unwillingly obeys the mandate of her father. (The father is a close running-mate for Henry's uncle in his unregenerate state.) And we leave him, our more or less hero, on the way to a permanent and satisfactory relation with a former mistress—a virtuous semi-professional pretty lady whom we are by no means to look down on because she chances to have served her fellow-men somewhat indiscriminately before "the right man" turned up. Far from us are the days when women might conveniently be classified as the good and the bad, the upright and the fallen. Now that we recognize them as the bond and the free or, in our weaker moments, as the adorable and the tiresome, there is no marvel in our cheerful acceptance of heroines from all regions of the half-world and the nether world, ranging from the professionally expert pretty ladies of Messrs. Bennett and Cannan to the Sadies and Ambers and Sylvia Scarletts who are capable of deviating into virtue on occasion for the sake of the "right man. . . ." "The World of Wonderful Reality" is a sort of sequel to that "City of Beautiful Nonsense" which won a large sentimental public some ten years ago. Perhaps Mr. Thurston has been clever in estimating the swift change that has come about since then in sentimental fashions; so that the Ambers may now safely be set in the foreground at the expense of the too-virtuous Jills whom, a decade since, we adored without shame.

"A Woman's Man" may therefore be held a reactionary document since, though the good woman of the tale remains throughout her life the victim of the "fallen" or semi-professional one, virtue does in the end receive its posthumous reward. Mr. Thurston's Jill is made morally shabby and even ridiculous, with all her technical purity; while the socially frail Amber triumphs through her essential virtue, in the larger sense of the word. But the "woman's man" who has spent so many of his years philandering and worse, casting away his work and his true love and his peace of mind for a Parisian vampire, does come at last to realize that all that has been good in his work as well as in his life, has sprung from the quiet unfelt influence of the wife who is now dead. This is a novel of much higher type and quality than the two with which it is here rather ineptly bracketed. Upon a theme which might be rated as among the most hackneyed in fiction, and which is certainly among the most precarious, the author has built a story of surprising dignity, both in substance and in form.

H. W. Boynton

New Psychic Faculties

The Mystery of Space. By Robert T. Browne. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.

The sub-title of this book informs the reader that: "It is a study of the hyper-space movement in the light of the evolution of new psychic faculties and an inquiry into the genesis and essential nature of space." This is a large programme and, because of the widespread interest in psychic phenomena and the endeavor to materialize the spirit by giving it a domicile in a hyper-space of four dimensions, it is expedient to examine the author's thesis with some care.

It is excessively irritating that writers on this subject either choose or are forced to employ a vocabulary and a style which are repellent to the reader, and to mix the significant and insignificant into an almost inextricable tangle. Careful and prolonged searching brings forth the fact that Mr. Browne has a definite and interesting thesis. The guiding forces of man are the intellect and the intuition, which correspond to the mind and the spirit. The intellect receives its information from the senses and is cognizant of space phenomena in three dimensions; in this realm of the tangible there is "but one true divining rod and that is mathematics. By day and by night it points unerringly, so long as it leads through materiality; but falteringly, blindly, fatally, when that way veers into the territory of vitality and spirituality." Because the Euclidean geometry of three dimensions is not comprehensive enough to include the territory of the spirit, it must be incomplete, and so there has slowly and gropingly grown up the geometry of hyper-space, which has no counterpart in reality and can not be appreciated by the senses.

The writer first reviews the growth of non-Euclidean geometry and concludes truly that attempts to connect it with reality are impossible and even absurd. But, because we can develop logically unreal conclusions from unreal postulates, Mr. Browne assumes that there is a supersensible faculty dormant in man which can appreciate new kinds of phenomena that require hyper-space for their setting. This faculty is the intuition of the spirit, and mathematics will not answer the needs of its expression.

We must, of course, next bring in evolution. During the long ages of the past the soul of man became entangled in corporeality; so far as spirituality is concerned, this process was an involution; the spirit became progressively enwrapped in layers of thought until it was almost smothered by the evolution of the material world. We have now reached the state of evolution of materiality when the spirit, guided by intuition, is slowly evolving and shedding its wrappings. The historical record of this process began with Geminos of Rhodes (B. C. 70), who first expressed a doubt as to the finality of Euclid. And the history of the evolution of the spirit coincides with the development of the non-Euclidean geometry of hyper-space. Mr. Browne, in this review, is quite sane and evidently agrees with Carus, whom he quotes as saying: "Metageometricians are a hot-headed race and display sometimes all the characteristics of sectarian fanatics." But, although mathematics fails when it attempts to express the intangible, the fact that mathematics can develop logically dream-universes which exist only in the mind of the mathematician, induces the author to agree with Professor Keyser, the high priest of the worship of Mathesis, who says: "Certainly there is naught of absurdity in supposing that under suitable stimulation the human mind may, in the course of time, speedily develop a spatial intuition of four or more dimensions."

This stimulation of the human mind is to come from the clairvoyant, and Mr. Browne has himself been able to range pretty freely in this spirit world of hyper-space. He surmises that, as the heart dominates the body, so the pineal gland and the pituitary body are the seat of the spirit: "Those gifted with the inner vision can observe the 'pulsating aura' in each [of these bodies], a movement which is not unlike the pulsations of the heart and which never ceases throughout life. In the development of clairvoyance it is known that this motion becomes intensified, the auric vibrations becoming stronger and more pronounced." As this supposed excitation of the pituitary body is accompanied by deep breathing, the simple-minded may suppose that this psychic and pulsating aura is merely the sensation of floating produced by super-oxydation of the blood. Thus, deep breathing will evolve a new and a better man and as a consequence "a new heaven and a new earth."

So much for the argument. But why should an author go out of his way to fill a book with barbarous words, unnatural derivations, and hyper-logomania? As an example, consider this statement (p. 213): "Monopyknons are the quiescent, unawakened, though potential and archetypal principles peculiar to the monopyknotic period of space-genesis, which are ultimately to become, on the physical plane, singularities of life of whatsoever kind." It is some drain on the intellectual mind to go through a long book bristling with the following diet, however nutritive it may be to the intuitional spirit: "As soon as he can resolve the nebulosity of his consciousness into the conceptual 'star-forms' of definite ideas and notions, he sits down to the feast which he finds provided by super-foetated hypotheses fabricated in the deeps of mind and logical actualities unperturbed and unmindful of the weal of perceptual space in its homogeneity of form and dimensionality." Apparently these choice spirits, accustomed to the psychical, expand and revel in such mistiness that it fills them with lovely illusions; but there are other simple souls who surmise that if there were any real message from the psychic world, they could ascertain it without descending, on the one hand, to crude rappings and infantile babblings, and without soaring, on the other, into regions of esoteric verbalism.

LOUIS T. MORE

The Run of the Shelves

SIR ARTHUR CONAN DOYLE, in the "Vital Message" (Doran), makes much of the "etheric body." A second body is clearly a first need of spiritualism. The hardship of that cult has been the reconciling of its own craving for manifestations with the unruly fact that the source of those manifestations, the body, had been sealed up in a coffer underground or turned to ash and vapor in a crematory. Body was out of reach, and soul, however willing to speak, was a Helen Kellar before education. A secondary body is remedial on both points. It allows the grave or the urn its vails, yet it leaves an invaluable bodily residue which can be seen, heard, and even—so cunning is our epoch—photographed. What is this second body? Ether pervades the primary body much as, we may suppose, air pervades water. The second body, apparently, is a print of the normal body in ether. Inside a body, ether is known as "bound ether." One might surmise that on its release from the human frame at death this ether would disperse, like the unbound copy of Sir Arthur's book, already disintegrating, which his publishers have forwarded to the Review. One might go on, and paraphrase the "Merchant of Venice" in a tiny catechism for Sir Arthur. Hath an etheric body eyes? Hath it "hands, organs, dimensions, senses, affections, passions? Fed with the same food, hurt with the same weapons, subject to the same diseases, healed by the same means, warmed and cooled by the same winter and summer, as a Christian is?" To these questions Sir Arthur's answers are inadequate and curious. In the "Coming World" there are games and sports, which point to active, not merely phantasmic, muscles; there is no birth, but growth to maturity; there are no acts of sex, but there is sublimated marriage; there is no food and drink "in the grosser sense," but there "seem to be pleasures of taste" (page 96); there is even a very meagre supply of inoffensive alcohol and tobacco (page 91). Indeed the whole future world is singularly inoffensive; it is Paradise for the maiden aunt.

Many men in our time believe that Christ raised Lazarus from the dead; many men believe that Christianity has "broken down": the man who believes in both these propositions is a rarity, and Sir Arthur Conan Doyle is that man. The reason is that both beliefs are profitable to spiritualism in a way, the one by confirming its possibility, the other by enduing it with a vocation, the curing of a stricken world, which grows worse and worse, as he thinks, under the senile leechcraft of institutional Christianity. His book is very curious in another point. In his spiritualism the "ism" seems often to have expelled the "spirit," as if the etheric body had made superfluities of the old body and the old soul alike. Yet in his first chapter on the "Two Needful Readjustments," he writes of the present world with a moral incisiveness and courageous fervor which make us tolerate even his tolerance for "exudations," and forgive him a picture of the blessed dead which seems almost modeled on the order, the quietness, and the tameness of a cemetery.

The new "Memoirs of the American Academy at Rome" (New York: University Press Association) should be welcomed by many who will never rise to the height of reading these erudite disquisitions. The fine folios are made by the Instituto Grafico, at Bergamo, and compare advantageously in appearance with the Prussian and Austrian Jahrbücher. It is possible really to study from such large cuts as these. The publication marks a step forward in American scholarship. Libraries must, of course, have it, and bibliophiles who are innocent of archæology ought to welcome it to their shelves. It will help give character to any lbrary. The first volume, though bearing the imprint 1918, is issued as of 1915-1916. The leading paper is a most ingenious, but not wholly convincing reconstruction of the Reorganization of the Roman Priesthoods, by late Director Carter. He endeavors to unravel the odd discrepancies between prestige and actual power as possessed by the Roman magistracy and priesthood. E. K. Rand and George Howe make a most exhaustive study of the Vatican Livy and the Script of Tours. The Livy was a hurry-up job and well organized, the folios being distributed to many scribes whose names are endorsed on the sheets. The peculiarities of these scriveners are carefully analyzed, and beautiful sheets of their handwriting are reproduced. Handwriting has sadly run down since the ninth century. To study the Aqua Triana and the Mills on the Janiculum, Messrs. A. W. van Buren and G. K. Stevens had merely to go down in the cellar in the Villa Aurelia, the Academy's home. The aqueduct of Trajan passes through the site, and the mill emplacements and sluices were uncovered during building. G. Dinsmore Curtis makes a very minute study of Ancient Granulated Jewelry of the VII Century and Earlier—naturally B.C. The method of applying small granules of gold remains a bit mysterious, but the results are charming, and are illustrated by rare pieces chosen from many museums. Bartolomeo Caporali, a Perugian painter of the end of the 15th century, is the theme of Mr. Stanley Lothrop, who has just been translated to the directorship of the Louis Tiffany Art Foundation. The article is cautious and clean cut. The plates, many of slightly known pictures, are welcome to investigators in the Umbrian field.

Capita Desecta and Marble Coiffures is a topic that might interest both the great Casaubon and Mme. de Pompadour. Mr. John R. Crawford treats it discretely and with great thoroughness. Heads in two sections, generally with a removable crown, have been explained by Gauckler as signifying a Syrian rite of internal anointment. Headachy people might wish such salving the brain possible. Mr. Crawford, for excellent reasons, rejects the religious explanation and finds that a sectioned head is merely one started on too small a block and finished from another piece. Thus American commonsense rebuts German mysticism. Marble coiffures explain themselves, at least, to any woman archæologist. It is an obvious means of keeping a portrait statue up to date. No Flavian lady could bear to have her bust behind the times. The concluding article, and one of the most generally interesting, is by Eugene S. McCartney on The Military Indebtedness of Early Rome to Etruria. He finds that all the effective weapons of offense and defense, even the famous short-sword, were taken from the Etruscans, has observations on Roman mounted infantry which are novel, and substantiates his case with many cuts. Not merely a classicist but any fighting man with a lingering memory of his school Latin could page over the article with pleasure. These papers by the American School of Classical Studies, for some years federated with the Academy, are the work of professors and fellows who plainly are making good use of their exceptional opportunities.

Mr. Oliver M. Sayler went to Russia in the fall of 1917 to study the latest developments in the Russian theatre and found himself in the midst of the larger drama of Revolution. He spent some four months in Moscow, paid a short visit to Petrograd, and returned via Siberia. On his return he has proceeded to waste some three hundred pages of print on a banal account of his personal experiences, "Russia White or Red," (Little, Brown), varied by political observations that are not only superficial but often viciously misleading and false. He came into close contact with the Czecho-slovaks as they were making their way across Siberia, and had every opportunity to learn the details of the agreement between Masaryk and Trotsky whereby they were guaranteed a safe and unmolested passage. Yet he repeats the Bolshevik slander against them that they allowed themselves to be used for the purpose of bringing about intervention, the slander which is employed in the attempt to justify Trotsky's treachery in attacking them unawares. Similarly, he circulates the lies about Kolchak that at one time were current among the Bolshevik sympathizers in Vladivostok and which were used in this country to undermine the Russian national movement in Siberia. In the chaos in Russia he sees only a struggle between Capitalism and Socialism. Some at least of his ideas he seems to have picked up from association with the I. W. W., Wilfrid Humphries, a Y. M. C. A. man in Russia who afterwards came to America to carry on Bolshevik propaganda.

There is something piquant, tantalizing, fetching, in the thought of a great dog, with vagrant habits and very masculine tastes, made free of the society of a girls' college; and of this Miss Katharine Lee Bates has taken advantage in her story of "Sigurd, our Golden Collie" (Dutton). The author is a professor at Wellesley, a scholar, a poet of parts (all which we knew before), and a lover of dogs (which we did not know). And there is this mingling of traits in her present book: you never can tell when some waggish drollery or some naughty escapade of her four-footed friend will set her off in search of quaint literary allusions or cause her to protest from the sedate stronghold of her profession. And indeed we like her writing best when it is most bookish. That is its note. We have other books on our shelves aplenty in which the canine hero plays a more tragic or pathetic or even humorous rôle, but none in which he is more humanly literate than Miss Bates's Sigurd of the golden fleece. And this pleases us; for we know, as only a reviewer can know, the capacity of the animal for letters. Once we ourselves owned a young collie who was not only learned but critical. This is our secret never before divulged. If a parcel of books sent for review was left overnight on the floor, this discerning friend would infallibly rend and gnaw the worthless volumes and leave the worthy untouched for our consideration, thereby saving us much labor of reading. We wish Sigurd might have been tried by such a test.

Mr. Isaac M. Marcosson's "Adventures in Interviewing" (John Lane) is a book of many limitations. This sentence begins a chapter: "The great war, which was invested with an unparalleled inhuman interest by the enemy, was at the same time rich with an almost incomparable human interest." The sinking of the Lusitania lies outside of human interest. He has this to say about silent generals: "Their silence is in strange contrast with the mighty din of battle they let loose." Generals are illogical in not roaring with their own cannon. Mr. Marcosson would clearly be surprised to discover a fisherman whose wit was dry, an aviator whose manner was not fluttered, and a vagabond whose conversation was not rambling.

Mr. Marcosson has evolved a substitute for English with which his own satisfaction appears to be complete. His mixture of metaphors surprises people who thought that the sins of their contemporaries in that particular had hardened them against surprise. The mind of David Graham Phillips was an "unplumbed field." To "launch his flow of talk" is another phrase, a feat before which literature and seamanship stand agape. Mr. Marcosson is not even an observer, he sees only the most obvious features in a man's face and the most conspicuous qualities in his mind. His acquaintance with great men is unlimited, and his knowledge of them straightened to the last degree.

Nevertheless Mr. Marcosson's book is interesting, and the fact that a book so reduced and mulcted should be interesting is more interesting than its contents. He sees little, but he sees clearly; and, again, he writes barbarously, but he writes clearly. His self-confidence is unconquerable, and there is a youthful happiness in his work and himself which mollifies the justly discontented reader. Little as he gets from the conferences, he feels and conveys the dramatic excitement of wresting the interview from its protesting and retreating subject. Lloyd George, Woodrow Wilson, Sir Douglas Haig, Marshal Foch, Lord Northcliffe, General Pershing, Sir James Barrie, the list expands indefinitely. He has outmanœuvred all the statesmen; he has outgeneraled all the commanders-in-chief. Where the great men have all succumbed, the reader is hardly proof against the subtle self-flattery of including himself in the general capitulation.

Music

Four Operas New to New York

IT would be very hard, if not impossible, to find a precedent for last week's wild activities in our rival opera houses. Within six days we heard four works, unknown here. Nor was this all. For of the works performed, two were by Americans.

The offerings of the visiting Chicago Company at the Lexington were widely varied, including as they did the "Madame Chrysanthème" of André Messager, the "Rip Van Winkle" of Reginald de Koven, and the "L'Heure Espagnole" of Maurice Ravel (of which last week, by a slip of mine, the invention was attributed to Laparra).

At the Metropolitan we had one novelty, an important one, the "Cleopatra's Night" of Henry Hadley.

Before going into all these works in detail, let me record the brilliant opening of the Chicago artists' season—not with the promised "Norma" revival, which was postponed in consequence of Rosa Raisa's illness, but with a really wonderful and memorable performance of "L'Amore dei Tre Re." The work of Montemezzi has been heard often at the Metropolitan, where the four most prominent figures in the poignant story of Sem Benelli were originally interpreted by Lucrezia Bori (Fiora), Amato (Manfredo), Ferrari-Fontana (Avito), and Didur (Archibaldo). At the Lexington the Fiora was Mary Garden, who gave us a new reading of the part—not quite in keeping, if you will, with the intentions of Sem Benelli, who had conceived his heroine as a girl wife, racked with passion, but far more tragical, and (with submission to some oversensitive critics) neither outrageous and indecent, nor "impossible." Once only in her long and bright career, when she "created" Mélisande (for she really aided Maeterlinck theatrically in the creation of that character), had Miss Garden reached such heights as in the second act of Montemezzi's opera. Her struggle with her husband's blind old father, as he strangles her, her dying spasms, the limp swaying of her arms as Archibaldo bore her away filled one with terror, but they, quite as much, amazed by their stark realism.

Almost as fine in their contrasted styles were the Avito of the new American tenor, Edward Johnson, a singing-actor with a good lyric voice and romantic qualities; the Manfredo of Baklanoff, picturesque and histrionically admirable; and the Archibaldo of Lazzari, which did justice to a grim and psychologically enigmatical character. Of equal if not even more importance was the successful first appearance, as conductor, of Maestro Marinuzzi, who, though handicapped by a too strident orchestra in the second act—with its Wagnerian sweep and breadth and tonal eloquence — deserved all the applause with which the audience saw fit to honor him.

"Madame Chrysanthème" (which antedates "Madama Butterfly") is an operatic setting of Pierre Loti's cruel tale. If, like the book, it lacks dramatic force, the fault is due rather to the librettist than to the composer. The story could (and should) have been compressed into three acts. As it stands, it is in four acts, with a prologue and an epilogue. Much time is spent on suggesting local "atmosphere," on the portrayal of quaint Nippon types and customs. Pierre Loti deals more lightly than the librettists of Puccini's opera with the marriage of a beguiling little Geisha and her desertion later on by her sailor "husband." And, in his treatment of the tale, the composer rarely hints at deeper things than pathos. The heroine doubtless knew that, though a bride, she was so only in a vague, Pickwickian sense. Her anguish when her lieutenant sails away, while touching, is not tragical. Her emotions, like the love of her French husband, seem somewhat shallow.

To illustrate the plot and express the characters in this frankly cynical romance of life in Nippon, André Messager has invented gracious music. He has a dainty touch, which suits his fragile theme. He has charm and sentiment. And while, at times, he reminds one slightly of Massenet, he does not plagiarize.

Three episodes in "Madame Chrysanthème" delighted me: the long narrative, or soliloquy, of the lieutenant ("Oui, c'est bien lui, c'est bien le pays"), and the Breton Serenade in honor of the bride (both in the second act), and the enchanting ballet in the following act, a ballet planned as the chief feature of a festival, which seems informed with genuine Oriental poetry. The score, from end to end, is very delicate. And if it now and then does grow a bit monotonous, blame the librettist. Tamaki Miura's thin and brittle voice failed to express the varied music of Chrysanthème. But, on the other hand, the tenor, Charles Fontaine, and the baritone, our old favorite, Hector Dufranne, were wholly satisfying.

From this ruthless idyl, with its tender glow and charm, we passed next day to that brilliant epigram in music, "L'Heure Espagnole," an ironic comment by a most gifted artist on the old theme of what, in some countries, is called love. Technically, there is no parallel to Ravel's score. But "L'Heure Espagnole," despite its sparkle and its wit—yes, musical wit—will probably be caviare to the general run of operagoers.

I should be glad if I could say that in "Rip Van Winkle" the late Reginald de Koven and his librettist, Percy MacKaye, had turned out an effective lyric opera. It may seem ungracious, and it is surely unpleasant to have to speak rather unkindly of this work. But truth is truth, and it would do no good to pretend that, in this "American folk opera" (so called), Reginald de Koven and his associate had done good service to their respective arts. The libretto is far-fetched beyond belief, though the story as related is sweet and pretty. The addition of the village maiden, Peterkee, to the characters we had met already in the legend has its dramatic value. But the words which Mr. MacKaye has given his characters are for singing purposes so preposterous that they provoke one to derision. To express the fancies and emotions of Dutch rustics in the Catskills the librettist employs jargon of his own. He takes liberties with common sense and English. His choruses and songs are sometimes unsingable. It would be easy, even if it might be tedious, to sustain these statements by voluminous quotation. I will content myself with two extracts. Imagine, if you can, a group of Dutchmen, smoking and drinking, as they sing such stuff as this:

> Puff of cloud from pipe of clay,
> Drone of song from drowsy fountain,
> All we dream on fades away
> Far upon the summer mountain.

Imagine this, sung by a group of villagers:

> Up spoke Nancy, spanking Nancy,
> Says, "My feet are far too dancy,
> Dancy, O!"

Imagine, if you please, old Hendrik's crew employing the slang of Broadway. And this at the instigation of an "intellectual." There are passages, a few, in which the librettist more or less redeems himself, as, for example, in the closing chorus and, chiefly, in a romantic ballad sung by Peterkee ("Wait, wait, my own, till our ship comes in"). But, good or bad—and some were pathetically bad—not fifty of the words at most were heard. The composer, though for years he had been an advocate of the use of English speech in opera, had seen to that. He had killed his own melodies, which, when not "reminiscent," were curiously uninspired, and he had drowned the voices in orchestration of the most turbulent kind. What he had not done to destroy his songs was supplied by the conductor, Mr. Smallens. And even had the composer shown more discretion in his accompaniments to the trite choruses and airs and dances which succeeded one another with inadequate pauses, the singers in the cast, with the exceptions of Hector Dufranne (the Hendrik Hudson) and, at moments, Baklanoff (the Rip Van Winkle), both foreigners, would have been unintelligible. For they had not been taught the art of enunciation. The repeated waltz-rhythms in "Rip Van Winkle" seemed rather incongruous. The music here and there recalled Puccini. The most tuneful songs (there were some in the third act) harked back to "Robin Hood," by which, I think, Reginald de Koven will be best remembered.

In the "Cleopatra's Night," of Henry Hadley, inspired by a libretto of Alice Leal Pollock (founded, of course, on Théophile Gautier's admirable short story, "Une Nuit de Cléopâtre"), the Metropolitan last week produced what I believe to be the most nearly successful, the most workmanlike, the most technically skillful effort by an American to create a real "grand" opera. The work is in two long and dramatic scenes, or acts, abounding in interest, well put together, and uncommonly effective. The first act shows how the bold hunter, Meïamoun, courts Cleopatra, and, as the Queen of Egypt waits for Antony, makes offer of his life for one night of love. In the second act, which is innocuous, we get hints—no more than hints—of what came later. The opera ends with Meïamoun's suicide, and, as the curtain falls, Cleopatra halts awhile to take leave of her dead lover, ere she moves on to meet her living Roman lover.

Here we have all the required elements of a short, striking, and impressive lyric drama. Miss Pollock's words are, in the main, well chosen; while in setting them to music Mr. Hadley has convinced us that he knows everything his forerunners had invented. The one thing he has not shown is his ability to create new music. For, though technically excellent at most points, neither in his melody nor in his harmony is he original. There are episodes in this opera which Saint-Saëns might not disown. There are others of which Richard Strauss might be the author. There are more, again, for which Wagner might stand godfather. And once, at least, we are reminded of a lighter work.

But, as a whole, this opera charms and holds the attention. It is an opera, though so sadly unoriginal. Mr. Hadley has now proved that it is possible for an American to master the secrets of the art of composing operas. He was greatly helped in the interpretation of his work by Orville Harrold's clear, dramatic, and flawless rendering of Miss Pollock's words. Frances Alda also sang her part clearly and, if not quite Egyptian, was alluring. The stage settings of the work, by the young American, Norman Bel-Geddes, were distractingly beautiful, even if they were not wholly plausible.

Charles Henry Meltzer

Drama

The "Power of Darkness" at the Garrick

THE "Power of Darkness," that scourge which the later and harsher Tolstoi devised for humanity, is offered to New York by the Theatre Guild. The acting was competent, but generally featureless, and of the excellent settings I have only one thing to say, that they showed a skill which the actors, and the author himself, if alive, might have copied with profit, in conveying the effect of the intolerable or the repulsive by symbols which were themselves tolerable or attractive. One of the great secrets of art in this kind is to enlighten and to lighten simultaneously.

From this chronicle of blood and lusts among Russian peasants I select two points which may exemplify its quality. A wife poisons her husband that she may enjoy his property with the companion of her adulterous love. This lover, who becomes her husband, strangles and buries in the cellar the new-born child of his unhallowed commerce with a second woman. The blackness of these crimes of passion and interest looks white beside the dispassionate—and in a sense disinterested—savagery of the mature woman who is the prompter of the first crime and the abettor, if not the inspirer, of the second. To this moral abasement Toltoi has added the brutish in intellect, the raw in manners. It was curious that a theme which was the almost unexampled combination of the low in morals, in brains, and in manners should have found in its author an almost unexampled combination of the highest things in conscience, in intellect, and in social station. Let us be clear on two points. To that power of brain, that depth of conscience, which called itself Tolstoi, no latitude of theme must be denied. But the obligation is equally clear; the pain which he bids us suffer must be instrumental to our pleasure or our good.

In the "Power of Darkness," is the darkness powerful? Is the crime impressive? There is crime enough, the spectator may observe. Precisely: there is more than enough. Art has two ways of handling crime: it may magnify or multiply. Shakespeare has tried both methods in "Macbeth," with the instructive result that our horror of crime is much more vivid in the second act after the enlargement of the Duncan case than at the conclusion of the play when, by an accumulation of horrors, our possets have been drugged. Crime is powerful in the unit: to augment cases is to reduce the unit and to acknowledge its inadequacy. In the "Power of Darkness," the effect of massing crimes and loosely grouping them with less important things is to diminish, to confound, to slur.

There is another infirmity in the Tolstoian portrayal. We, the spectators, might possibly succeed in imagining ourselves as bad as the people on the stage, possibly as imbecile, possibly as coarse; but to do what Tolstoi asks, to imagine ourselves to be all three at once, is to overtax our imagination and our humility. What follows? The thing is not taken in; it remains foreign, aloof, spectacular—true perhaps in Mars, in Saturn, in Russia, that nearing and receding Russia, of our time always closer in its impact and remoter in its quality. To us the life is strange, and it is a life so limited, so abject, that every occurrence, birth, death, betrothal, marriage, combat, loses stature and meaning in its narrowing vicinity. Crime shrinks with the rest. The horror of murder is proportioned to the largeness and the dignity of human life, and a social condition which is destructive of that largeness and inimical to that dignity must result in the diminution of the horror. The less there is to ravage, the less terror in devastation. The "Power of Darkness" is so far from erring on the side of poignancy that it errs on the opposite side. I felt no laceration; my mind was divided between two quite different feelings, wrath at the attempted butchery of my feelings, and shame at my own callousness. It was wicked, it was impious, to sit before those horrors and to be conscious mainly of a mild weariness to which the high points of atrocity supplied a mild relief. To all appearances, the audience felt as I did.

So much for the appeal of the "Power of Darkness" to the imagination. What is its appeal to the reason? Every crime has a place in an individual experience and a place in a social order. A drama may instruct us by showing either its fitness in that individual experience or its dependence on that social order. The success of the "Power of Darkness" in the first of these tasks is respectable without being in the least distinguished. Nothing happens in the play that we peremptorily decline to believe. The downward limit for human possibility is very low and very dim, and we see nothing that absolutely contravenes our notion of this limit. Still, as a justification of conduct by motive, it is not comparable with other products of the same hand, with "Anna Karenina," for example. Take the last great fact of Nikita's remorse and confession, which comes to auditors of this drama like the sight of day to imprisoned miners. Our faith in this change is simply part of our vague general faith in the possibility of moral overturn; it is independent of anything that Tolstoi has told us of Nikita.

The truth is that a profound and minute psychologist like Tolstoi puts himself under a grave twofold disadvantage, when, in choosing a form like drama where speech is omnipotent, he chooses at the same time characters that are semi-articulate.

Let us turn to the second possibility. Tolstoi might have performed a high social service by showing in a debased society conditions not themselves criminal which are procreative of crime. In this point the "Power of Darkness" is a blank. Not the slightest attempt is made to explain why this particular community, to which labor, religion, and marriage have supplied the normal defenses, should have left the normal community far behind in the rankness of its butchery and fornication. With somewhat different tasks, Hauptmann did far better in the "Weavers," Brieux far better in the "Red Robe." In one place, indeed, an allusion is made by Mitritch (successfully acted by Mr. Erskine Sanford) to the failure to provide education for women. But the allusion is pointless on the side of women, since the chief active malefactor in the play is a man, Nikita, and pointless on the side of education, since the embodiment of moral perfection in the drama, the peasant, Akim, is a person so unschooled that even when he talks wisdom he talks drivel.

I regard the "Power of Darkness" as a weak play and a weak tract. With a series of events with which even incompetence could have done something, genius has failed to do much. I have strong doubts whether the exposition of the cloaca in human nature is justifiable except in so far as it fortifies the individual conscience or arms society with prophylactics. The "Power of Darkness" accomplishes neither of these ends. For the redemption of human nature, if redemption be practicable, two things are necessary, faith and knowledge; and the thing that prevents, or postpones, that deliverance is the separation of these two requirements, a separation that keeps faith ignorant and knowledge cynical. Books that sap our faith more effectually than they recruit our knowledge destroy faster than they upbuild. I do not forget Akim or Nikita's final conversion when I say that if the representations in the "Power of Darkness" are truths, they are truths which it is recreancy to believe and treason to utter.

O. W. Firkins

Books and the News

Boys' Books

WILL the boys of to-day read the books which their fathers and uncles read, twenty-five, thirty, or forty years ago? Some of the publishers believe they will—as when Scribners issue "The Last of the Mohicans," with its fine colored illustrations by Mr. Wyeth. If they will read that, they will read others of a later epoch: the books themselves will please the boys, and the pursuit of them will bring joy to the fathers and uncles. Recently I delighted in arousing envy in a group of venerable persons (forty years old, plus or minus), by producing a "Tom Sawyer," with the old illustrations, which I had just bought.

"That's the very blue cover that mine had! Say, where did you get it?"

So when you introduce the Boy Scout of 1920 to "Tom Sawyer," to "Huckleberry Finn," and to that dramatic and thrilling story, "The Prince and the Pauper," try to get copies with the old pictures. You must haunt second-hand dealers a little; but do not insist on first editions, unless you wish to pay fancy prices. With these goes Aldrich's "The Story of a Bad Boy," and this has been adorned by A. B. Frost's drawings. Another writer who entertained boys when Grover Cleveland was in his first term, is Frank Stockton. I know a senile gentleman—about the age of the group mentioned above—who chuckled all day, recently, when he picked up a copy of "The Floating Prince," by Stockton. "There's the picture," said he, "of the Reformed Pirate knitting tidies that I used to see in St. Nicholas, or somewhere." But "The Floating Prince" is for boys under ten—or over thirty-nine—the ones in between may not like it. "A Jolly Fellowship" is another of Stockton's inimitable books.

"Alice's Adventures in Wonderland" and its sister-volume, "Through the Looking-Glass," go without saying; but not as many as should, know Charles E. Carryl's "Davy and the Goblin," despite a few of its persistent advocates. Jules Verne's "The Mysterious Island" has also been illustrated by Mr. Wyeth; a boy will enjoy it more if he has already read "Twenty Thousand Leagues Under the Sea." My impression that Louisa Alcott's "Jack and Jill" is an amusing tale, which a boy will not scorn, is based upon a recollection which has not been refreshed for at least twenty-five years.

"If this don't fetch the kids," wrote Stevenson of "Treasure Island," "why, they have gone rotten since my day." And his remark I would echo about Mayne Reid's "Rifle Rangers" and "Scalp Hunters"—but they may not be easy to find. However, this article is intended to furnish good sport for book-hunting elders. They certainly can find J. T. Trowbridge's two Civil War stories: "The Three Scouts" and "Cudjo's Cave." As for Stevenson himself, I would pass over the ones so often recommended, and suggest "St. Ives" and "The Wrecker"—even if a boy has to skip all chapters of the latter to Chapter XXII.

We grown-ups are apt to insist upon a literary finish, to which boys are usually insensible. So we smugly inform them that they must like "Kim" and "The Jungle Book," when, perhaps, the straight adventure of Kipling's "The Naulahka" will please them better. My enjoyment of Dickens was deferred for five years, because it was proclaimed to me that I must begin with "Oliver Twist." Now, I would experiment with "A Tale of Two Cities" and see how it worked. If the boy seemed bored, there are the two excellent historical novels by Conan Doyle: "Micah Clarke" and "The White Company." If he remained torpid, I would administer "King Solomon's Mines," and see him wake up, or myself give up. How I hated the superior persons who said that Rider Haggard had "no literary merit"—how I still hate them! For two other stories of adventure, Janvier's "In the Sargasso Sea" and Clark Russell's "List, Ye Landsmen!" For humor, Lucretia Hale's "Peterkin Papers." For American history, Roosevelt and Lodge's "Hero Tales From American History." For a book telling how to make a hundred un-useful and delightful things: "The American Boy's Handy Book," by Dan Beard. I sometimes see the author on the street, and long to stop him and tell him how much string, and gunpowder, and glue, and buckshot, and how many fishhooks and eels' ears and other things I employed in trying to follow his recipes—and what a good time I had.

Edmund Lester Pearson

Books Received

FICTION

Dillon, Mary. The Farmer of Roaring Run. Century.

Greenberg, D. S. The Cockpit of Santiago Key. Boni and Liveright. $1.50 net.

Kelland, C. B. Catty Atkins. Harper. $1.60 net.

La Varre, W. J. Up the Mazaruni for Diamonds. Marshall, Jones. $1.50 net.

Locke, Wm. J. The House of Baltazar. Lane. $1.90 net.

Oldmeadow, Ernest. Coggin. Century.

Short Stories from the Balkans. Transl. by Edna W. Underwood. Marshall Jones. $1.60 net.

(Continued on page 140)

EDWARD T. DEVINE
Associate Editor of the Survey

Will lecture on the following subjects:

THE THREE R'S
Reaction: Revolution: Reconstruction

INDUSTRIAL AND SOCIAL UNREST
Remedies and Proposals

AMERICANIZATION
True and False

For dates and terms address Miss Brandt, Room 1204, 112 E. Nineteenth St., New York

C-W Motors in the Printing Trade

The first complete electrical equipment of a large printing establishment with individual motors was manufactured by the Crocker-Wheeler Company in 1894.

Today the use of individual motors is the only up-to-date method employed for the operation of printing presses and allied machinery.

S. S. Wheeler
President

Crocker-Wheeler Co.

Ampere, N. J.

New York
Boston
Syracuse
Chicago
Cleveland
Binghamton

Pittsburgh
Newark
New Haven
Philadelphia
Baltimore
San Francisco

TIFFANY & CO.

JEWELRY SILVERWARE WATCHES CLOCKS STATIONERY

EARLY AMERICAN SILVERWARE AND REPRODUCTIONS

PURCHASES MAY BE MADE BY MAIL

FIFTH AVENUE & 37TH STREET
NEW YORK

Just Published

Foch:
The Winner of the War
By Captain Raymond Recouly

So many facts, so many striking revelations indispensable to understanding Foch, the man, Foch, the general, and the mental background of the Allied victory are contained in it that it is sure to become an essential document to all intelligent readers who would go below the surface in a survey of the war. Here is first-hand knowledge of the immortal general and his methods given by a man who worked with him from day to day in the great crises. Illustrated. $3.00

Over 30,000 copies already sold in France

To be published February 13

The Life of Mrs. Robert Louis Stevenson
By her Sister, Mrs. NELLIE VAN DE GRIFT SANCHEZ

The multitude of readers and friends of Stevenson know through the "Life" and "Letters," through her collaboration with him in "The New Arabian Nights," and through countless side-lights in all the literature about him, that his wife was in herself a remarkable and most interesting figure. The fascinating story of her life not only deserves a separate telling but has the attraction of an adventurous romance. And Mrs. Sanchez, between whom and her sister there was a close sympathy and understanding, was the person best fitted to preserve her story. Illustrated. $2.25

Modes and Morals
By KATHARINE FULLERTON GEROULD

Here Mrs. Gerould presents a volume of extremely clever essays, including "The New Simplicity," "The Extirpation of Culture," "Tabu and Temperament," "Dress and the Woman," "The Remarkable Rightness of Rudyard Kipling," and her decidedly vivacious review of "British Novelists, Ltd." $1.75

CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS
FIFTH AVE. AT 48TH ST. NEW YORK

Attractive offerings are made during the Midwinter Book Season.

(Continued from page 138)

Cobb, Irvin S. From Place to Place. Doran.
Coppleston, Bennet. The Last of the Grenvilles. Dutton. $2.50 net.
Swinnerton, Frank. September. Doran.

ART

Collection of Mediæval and Renaissance Paintings. Fogg Art Museum. Harvard University Press.

BIOGRAPHY AND HISTORY

Cresson, W. P. The Cossacks, Their History and Country. Brentano's. $2.50.
Keith, Eric A. My Escape from Germany. Century.
Smyth, Ethel. Impressions That Remained. 2 volumes. Longmans, Green.
Theodore Roosevelt: An Autobiography. Scribner. $5 net.

DRAMA AND POETRY

Barr, Amelia E. Songs in the Common Chord. Appleton. $1.50 net.
Clapp, F. M. New York and Other Verses. Marshall Jones.
Cone, Helen G. The Coat Without a Seam and Other Poems. Dutton $1.25 net.
Guild, T. H. The Power of a God and Other One-Act Plays. University of Illinois Press.
Johnson, R. U. Poems. Yale University Press.
Little Theatre Classics. Vol. II. Adapted and edited by Samuel A. Eliot, Jr. Little, Brown. $1.50 net.
MacClintock, Lauder. The Contemporary Drama of Italy. Little, Brown. $1.50 net.
Representative One-Act Plays. By American Authors. Little, Brown. $2.50 net.
Sayler, O. M. The Russian Theatre under the Revolution. Little, Brown. $2.50 net.

ESSAYS AND CRITICISM

Brown, George E. A Book of R. L. S. Scribner. $2.50 net.

Clutton-Brock, A. Essays on Art. Scribner.

Gosse, Edmund. Some Diversions of a Man of Letters. Scribner. $2.50.

Great Artists and Their Works by Great Authors. Compiled by Alfred M. Brooks. Marshall Jones. $2 net.

Veblen, Thorstein. The Place of Science in Modern Civilization and Other Essays. Huebsch. $3.

GOVERNMENT AND ECONOMICS

Babson, R. W. W. B. Wilson and the Department of Labor. Brentano's. $2 net.

Cole, G. D. H. Labour in the Commonwealth. Huebsch.

Cory, Herbert E. The Intellectuals and the Wage-Earner. New York: The Sunwise Turn.

Fisher, Irving. Stabilizing the Dollar. Macmillan. $3.50.

Leacock, Stephen. The Unsolved Riddle of Social Justice. Lane. $1.25 net.

McPherson, L. G. The Flow of Value. Century.

Sayler, O. M. Russia, White or Red. Little, Brown. $2.50 net.

Scholefield, G. H. The Pacific, Its Past and Future. Scribner.

Starling, E. H. The Feeding of Nations. Longmans, Green. $1.90 net.

Stearns, Harold. Liberalism in America. Boni and Liveright. $1.75 net.

The Tryal of William Penn and William Mead for Causing a Tumult. Marshall Jones. $1.

Ward, H. F. The New Social Order: Principles and Program. Macmillan. $2.50.

MISCELLANEOUS

Brown, Francis Yeats. Caught by the Turks. Macmillan. $2.
Cram, Ralph Adams. Walled Towns. Marshall Jones. $1.25.
Chesterton, Gilbert K. Irish Impressions. Lane. $1.50 net.
Gibbs, A. H. Gun Fodder. The Diary of Four Years of War. Little, Brown. $2 net.
Karsner, David. Debs—His Authorized Life and Letters. Boni & Liveright. $1.50 net.
Latzko, Andreas. The Judgment of Peace. Boni & Liveright. $1.75 net.
Lockington, N. J. The Soul of Ireland. Intro. by G. K. Chesterton. Macmillan. $1.75.
Maurice, Sir F. The Last Four Months, How the War Was Won. Little, Brown. $2.50, net.
Spadoni, Adriana. The Swing of the Pendulum. Boni & Liveright. $1.90 net.
Teall, Gardner. The Little Garden the Year Round. Dutton. $2.50 net.
The Wisdom of Woodrow Wilson. Compiled by Chas. J. Herold. Brentano's.
Whitehouse, Vira B. A Year as a Government Agent. Harper. $2.75 net.

RELIGION AND PHILOSOPHY

Bond, F. B. The Hill of Vision. Marshall Jones. $1.50 net.
Gilmore, G. N. Animism. Marshall Jones. $1.75 net.
Lindsey, B. B., and O'Higgins, Harvey. The Doughboy's Religion. Harper. $1.25 net.
Porter, A. Kingsley. The Seven Who Slept. Marshall Jones. $1.50.

TEXTBOOKS

Carver, T. N. Principles of Political Economy. Ginn.
Modern Industrial Movements, 1919. Compiled and edited by D. Bloomfield. H. W. Wilson Co.

A Literary "Find"

In the Shadow of Great Peril

By Horace A. Wade—Age 11
America's Youngest Author

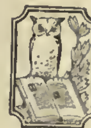
With a Preface by George Ade

A Wonder of a Story for Every Man Who Has Been a Boy--and a Chortle of Delight from Beginning to End

Irvin Cobb says: "He's a genius"

Ready February 7—Cloth, 12mo
Price $1.25 net.

Publishers - - - REILLY & LEE - - - Chicago



JUST ISSUED

BY

O. W. FIRKINS

DRAMATIC EDITOR OF THE "REVIEW"

Author of "Ralph Waldo Emerson," etc.

JANE AUSTEN

This book is different from the voluminous biographies and few critical estimates of her character and imperishable work, and fills an important niche long vacant. The author preëminently treats Jane Austen's work as it appears to our contemporary taste, not sparing her defects, but sympathetically appraising her lasting merits. After a penetrating study of her novels, he gives a masterly chapter on her realism, and concludes with a biographical section which throws further light on his central theme. A well-planned appendix includes a clarifying "List of References" and a comprehensive index.

$1.75

Henry Holt & Company
19 West 44th Street, New York

Attractive offerings are made during the Midwinter Book Season.

THE REVIEW

Vol. 2, No. 40 | New York, Saturday, February 14, 1920 | FIFTEEN CENTS

Contents

Brief Comment 141

Editorial Articles:
- Article X 143
- A B C of the Exchange Question 145
- Labor in Politics 146
- America and the English Tradition 147

President Wilson's Japan. By Charles Hodges 149

The "New Republic's" Exhilaration. By Jerome Landfield 150

Correspondence 151

How the Soviet Came to a Russian Village 153

The Unreconstructed Professor. By Philo M. Buck, Jr. 154

Book Reviews:
- A Carthaginian Peace? 155
- Education in a Democracy 157
- Between Worlds 158
- The Art of the Greek Ceramists 159

The Run of the Shelves 159

Drama:
- Jacinto Benavente: Theatre and Library. By O. W. Firkins 161

Music:
- Mary Garden and "Louise"—The Concert Season. By Charles Henry Meltzer 162

Books and the News:
- Health. By Edmund Lester Pearson 164

I AM willing to be a candidate, provided I can do so honestly—this sums up the spirit of Mr. Hoover's statement. But it contains other matter, and very pertinent matter. It disposes unmistakably of the idea of an independent candidacy. It takes ground clearly against "any form of socialism, whether it be nationalization of industry or other destruction of individual initiative." The meaning of its protest against any endeavor "to set aside our Constitutional guarantees for free speech or free representation" must be plain to the most careless of wayfaring men in these days of Speaker Sweet at Albany and wild sedition bills at Washington. It does not define "those constructive economic policies that will get us down from the unsound economic practices which of necessity grew out of the war," but Mr. Hoover's record is ample guarantee that in making reference to them he pledges himself, far more distinctly than most men could by elaborately specific promises, to substantial achievement in case he gets the chance for it. To our mind, the statement is far from colorless. It does not go into details, but it furnishes just that assurance as to fundamentals which liberal conservatives in either party require.

DISAPPOINTMENT has been expressed in some quarters over Mr. Hoover's failure to lay out a definite programme—to write, so to say, the platform upon which he is willing to stand. At the bottom of this disappointment lies the feeling that if Mr. Hoover is to be regarded as a Presidential possibility, he ought to supply the leadership which, it must be admitted, is at present painfully lacking in both parties. But that is not at all Mr. Hoover's rôle. He shows eminent good sense in standing aside until the issues develop themselves, within the recognized party councils, to a far greater extent than they have done as yet. To attempt to lay them down, of his own motion, would be to overstep the bounds of his claim, great as it is, upon public attention and regard. The consequence of this restraint may be either to help or to hurt his chances of nomination, but that is not his primary concern. Let him be himself—neither more nor less—and let the situation develop. In any case, the chance of his nomination by the Democrats rests on the slimness of their chances with any other candidate. And the chance of his nomination by the Republicans—pretty near zero at present, owing to the advanced state of organization of some other booms—seems to rest entirely on its affording the best solution of a quite possible deadlock at the Republican Convention.

THE Legal Adviser of the American Peace Commission, Mr. David Hunter Miller, has made a charge against Mr. John Maynard Keynes's discussion of the Treaty of Versailles which, if well founded, would go far to destroy its standing. The charge is nothing less than that "in Mr. Keynes's chief point of attack he has completely misinterpreted the terms of the treaty." Specifically, what Mr. Miller asserts is > that instead of an indemnity of $40,000,000,000 laid upon Germany, as claimed by Mr. Keynes, with annual payments of nearly $4,000,000,000, the indemnity of the treaty amounts to approximately $14,000,000,000; that this sum cannot be added to except by a unanimous determination of the Reparation Commission (composed of representatives of the United States, Great Britain, France, Italy and Belgium), that Germany is in equity able to pay more, and that before any such determination, evidence and argument on behalf of Germany must be heard. (The italics are Mr. Miller's.)

But Mr. Miller goes on to explain that he means by "the indemnity" not the total obligation assessed against Germany for reparations, but only so much of that obligation as is covered by payments specifically called for in the treaty. In other words, Mr. Miller does not deny that the big indebtedness spoken of by Mr. Keynes will actually hang over Germany until such time as it is either paid, or remitted by the Reparation Commission; he only points out that actual payment of that full amount, or of anything beyond the smaller figure he mentions, can not be demanded except by unanimous action of the Reparation Commission. Such action Mr. Miller regards as so unlikely that he declares again and again, in one form of words and another, that "the debt, so far as it is not to be paid, either principal or interest, is a figment of the imagination; it is the payment that matters, and nothing else." But whether this be a correct opinion or not, it is, after all, nothing but an opinion; and to charge Mr. Keynes with having "completely misinterpreted the terms of the treaty" because he does not share Mr. Miller's opinion as to the unimportance of one of the most conspicuous of those terms is a flagrant injustice.

WE ourselves are far from sharing Mr. Keynes's view of the enormities of the treaty. His book bears many marks of extreme bias, and of being the work of a brilliant and not too scrupulous special pleader. But he commits neither the error charged by Mr. Miller, nor, so far as we have been able to discover, is he guilty of misstatements of such gross character upon any point. As to the particular point in question, he recognizes quite as clearly as Mr. Miller the distinction between the theoretical indebtedness and the actual payments. The difference between Mr. Miller's view and Mr. Keynes's is that, while Miller regards the theoretical indebtedness as virtually non-existent because payment will not be demanded, Keynes regards it as an incubus upon Germany because payment may be demanded. It is all a question of opinion, or rather of emphasis. The one thing certain, to our mind, is that, whether the incubus be real or imaginary, it is a thing which the people upon whom it presses can not fail to regard as a terrible grievance, and therefore that the sooner it is removed the better.

THE oft-repeated conflict between mob violence and law broke out again the other day, at Lexington, Kentucky, and the law won. A negro had already been tried for murder and found guilty, within less than a week after commission of the crime. Almost at the moment when sentence of death was being pronounced, a mob assailed the Court House and attempted to wrest the prisoner from the hands of the law. In contempt of due warning the mob pressed on, and a moment later four of its members lay dead before the Court House door, with seventeen others wounded. Lawless violence had had its fitting answer. The mob fell back, aware for once that the majesty of the law had the facilities and the spirit necessary to defend itself. There were threats of a larger mob from surrounding districts, but Governor Morrow promptly called for troops from Camp Taylor in sufficient numbers to repel any possible assault. In thus protecting a man already sentenced to death, the Kentucky authorities were protecting law itself, a cause far more vital to progress in civilization than the life of any man. There will be not merely fewer lynchings in Kentucky because of Monday's lesson at Lexington, but less indulgence in all forms of lawless violence. It is not likely that any other community in Kentucky will soon feel disposed to invite a repetition of the lesson. The men who make up a mob may have no regard for the life of a mere prisoner, but they do have some concern for their own.

MR. MUNSEY had an opportunity to make the Herald a recorder of all currents of opinion, to build up a great clientèle by an unassailable reputation for scrupulous accuracy and fair-play, by presenting the liberal and radical point of view as well as the conservative, by printing sober facts in clear-cut, honest, and intelligent fashion.—The Nation, Feb. 7, 1920, p. 166.

The arbitrary arrests of individuals on trumped-up charges, the breaking up or surveillance of public meetings, the censorship of mail and of the press, the maintenance of an army of Government spies and secret agents, the ousting from office of persons duly elected according to law because of membership in a political party which the Government has put under the ban, the torturing of prisoners, and the wresting of justice by administrative officials and the courts, have reached a point where little more is needed to precipitate a revolution.—The Nation, Feb. 7, 1920, p. 164.

The italics are ours; beyond this, we refrain from painting the lily.

PREMIER NITTI, in addressing the Chamber of Deputies on Saturday, declared that if Italy is to emerge successfully from her present troubles her press and politicians must assume a more friendly and respectful attitude towards the outside world, and must not leave the interests of international peace out of consideration in their eagerness for the realization of Italian aspirations. He challenged the position of "nationalists" who insist that Italy has gained nothing from the war unless its entire later Adriatic programme is conceded. "We must remember," he said, "that almost all Italians who desired war asked only for Trent and Trieste. It is therefore a mistake to say that nothing was obtained, when these terms are more than satisfied." The Premier pointed out clearly that the financial aid which Italy so sorely needs from without will not come unless her people assume a friendly attitude, give up the things that militate against peace and a broader humanity in foreign relations, and convince possible investors that the money desired is to be spent in reconstruction.

IN case the Adriatic settlement should revert to the terms of the Compact of London, which would require the abandonment of the Italian claim to Fiume, he made it plain that he would consider himself in honor bound to secure the evacuation of the city by d'Annunzio, "even by force if necessary." He emphasized, however, his earnest desire to come to a friendly agreement with the Jugoslavs, and rebuked as criminal those who arouse antagonism by referring to the Adriatic as "an Italian lake." Press reports indicate that Premier Nitti had been subjected to a severe fire of newspaper criticism for some days before this speech, and that his enemies were rather gleefully expecting to demand a vote on his foreign policy and secure his downfall. His plea for an attitude of moderation, however, in the interest of peace and material reconstruction, had so visibly favorable an effect on the Chamber that no opponent dared to risk defeat by asking a vote.

THE fact that the Central Union of Coöperatives of Russia has come entirely under control of the Soviet Government and is now but a branch of their system of nationalized distribution, was made clear in the columns of the Review a fortnight ago. The Supreme Council of Paris has just ascertained this with apparent surprise, and finds that the proposal contained in its earlier announcement concerning the blockade is nullified by the necessity of dealing with the Soviet Government. This raises the question whether, in ignorance of what was patent to other observers, they were taken in by Alexander Berkenheim and his associates, claiming to represent the Coöperatives, or whether the policy that was recently announced had a less ingenuous origin and motive.

SIR VINCENT MEREDITH, BART., President of the Bank of Montreal, advised a liberal immigration policy in his recent address at the annual meeting of the shareholders of the Bank. He has no fear of another war in this generation, and therefore sees no necessity that the combing of applicants be made too fine. With a good influx of farmers, domestic servants, artisans, and laborers he foresees substantial improvement in economic conditions as affected by the war. The western provinces, he thinks, will draw many farmers from the United States, "attracted by the superior productivity of the soil and its comparative cheapness." The Allied nations of Europe, and the Scandinavian countries, will add materially to the number. But to immigration must be added harder work, greater efficiency, increased production and thrift, if the desired results are to come. He gives emphatic warning that unless Canada shall speedily reduce or abandon penalizing taxes on what are called excess business profits, she will not be able to meet trade competition not similarly encumbered. He favors government assistance in arranging long-term credits for export sales, but would not throw the whole burden upon the public. The exporters who reap the profits must as a matter of course assume a due proportion of the risks.

SIR VINCENT closed his address with a handsome tribute to the Prince of Wales, whose visit to Canada had "rendered a great and memorable service to the Empire in strengthening the Throne in the affection and confidence of the people, and by drawing still closer the ties which bind the commonwealth of nations over which he is destined to reign." There is food in this sentence for a class of Americans who can not understand why the British people do not cast royalty out of their Constitution altogether and substitute an executive head elected by the people. The fact that any close approximation to democratic freedom is now secure anywhere is largely due to those ties of affection and confidence which bind together the "commonwealth of nations" (note carefully Sir Vincent's term) over which the Prince of Wales is destined one day to "reign," not as a monarch, with vast powers of possible oppression in his hand, but more than anything else as just that connecting tie which made the great "commonwealth of nations" called the British Empire a whole-hearted unit against German ambitions inimical to world freedom.

CRAWLING about among drifts that leave the snows of yesteryear simply nowhere, one must perforce content oneself by scanning the papers for what assurances there may be that spring is not far behind. In the vocal forests of newsprint—haunt, once, of the breezes and the nesting bird—is there no stir, no hint of promise? Yes, here it is. "Baseball practice at Columbia begins this week." All this, and even more: "Baseball magnates assemble at Chicago." But what is there that overcasts the fair face of hope? More repression? More prohibition? "Freak pitching must go. The spitball, the emery ball, the shine ball, the licorice ball—pitchers who are addicted to their use must be registered and may be granted a year to taper off—no longer—while those who are not officially recognized 'addicts' will be subjected to a thumping penalty for the first offense." Must it always be so? Has the pitcher always "got" a little something more than the batter can manage? Our throwers of the intellectual spitball, our heavers of the economic emery ball, our tossers of the artistic shine ball, isn't the poor old world at bat capable of knocking them over the fence and out of the box? A plague on these harnessing restraints, imposed with a view to fattening the poor old world's intellectual batting average! What the world needs is better batting ability at the intellectual plate. When that comes about it will be spring indeed.

Article X

THE question of Article X has been central throughout all these months of dreary controversy. Many weeks ago it seemed as though nothing further that could be said about it was capable of being either interesting or instructive to the public. But within the last week or two, as the struggle over the Treaty has seemed again to be approaching a possible decision, the subject has acquired renewed interest for a peculiar reason. The merits of the various proposed reservations relating to Article X have all along turned partly on the question of language and tone, and partly on the question of substance; the new development has been a tendency on the part of the President's supporters to take the view that language and tone are the only thing involved, the substance being practically negligible. Nothing could be more gratifying than this to the Review, in so far as it indicates willingness to come to a practicable agreement; nevertheless, in the interest of truth and clear thinking, it seems desirable at this juncture to point out the degree in which such a view is true and in which it is false.

The view we refer to may be found stated in its most extreme form in the New York Evening Post of February 7:

> We have read the article and the Lodge reservation and the numerous proposed substitutes, and the differences between the original text and all the proposed modifications are differences in language and manners, and not in the essential meaning. The Lodge reservation cannot knife the heart of Article X. Under the League of Nations this country is bound to be interested in territorial changes in Europe. When such changes shock the conscience of this country it will take the matter under advisement. When Congress finds there is sufficient cause for active intervention, it will so vote. President Wilson meant this in the original article, and Lodge means this in his reservation, and the substitute proposals mean this. The difference is that Mr. Wilson phrased his meaning generously and Lodge prefers to be surly and spiteful.

If this were a correct statement of the case, it would be even more shocking than it is to think of the prolonged delay which has kept the settlement in abeyance while all the world has been suffering for want of it. But the difference between the unreserved acceptance of Article X and its acceptance with the Lodge reservation is much more than a difference "in language and manners." Between the Lodge reservation and that proposed many months ago by the Republican "mild reservationists" the difference is indeed only one "in language and manners." Even this difference, to be sure, is important. It is a thousand pities that that reservation was not accepted at the time by the President and his party, for there is good reason to believe that such acceptance would have resulted, while the interest of the public was fresh, in speedy ratification. There was nothing bad about the "language and manners" of that proposed reservation; and if no question of substance enters into the matter at all, it is difficult to see any respectable excuse for the Democrats' failure to agree to it. But there is a question of substance; whichever side was right or wrong, it is at least true of both parties to the contest that they were fighting over something and not over nothing.

In point of fact, there are two quite distinct purposes served by the reservation relating to Article X, whether worded in the objectionable way which Senator Lodge has preferred, or in the excellent form proposed by the mild reservationists. It has become fashionable of late to speak of it as merely drawing pointed attention to the dual character of our Government, the separation of legislative and executive powers. This in itself is a substantial thing; for, though it might be said to be what everyone might easily infer for himself from a knowledge of the United States Constitution, the express statement of it constitutes a caveat which our associates in the treaty could not be expected to take into adequate account by such mere inference. But there is much more to the matter than this.

What the reservation does, above all else, is to place the moral obligation of the engagement in Article X upon a different footing. When Mr. Wilson declared that the reservation "cut the heart out of the Covenant" he doubtless meant that it destroyed the moral obligation of Article X. In his colloquy at the White House with the Foreign Relations Committee, he endeavored to make the most of the difference between a legal obligation and a moral obligation, but he did not attempt to deny the binding force of the obligation as a moral one. Now the very thing which honest advocates of the reservation, of all shades, sincerely desire is to lessen the force of the moral obligation. They believe that the duty which Article X in its terms imposes upon the country is one that ought not to be accepted without qualification. They want to make it impossible for our country to be charged with bad faith in case it refuses to do, in any given instance, what Article X contemplates shall be done for the preservation of the "territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the League." So far from making no substantial difference, it transforms what on its face is an unqualified obligation into what on its face is no obligation; for an engagement which does not come into force in any given case until, or unless, Congress decides that it is one that the country desires to assume is not, in any ordinary sense of the word, an engagement at all.

In spite of all this, however, the reservation is not to be regarded as wiping out the moral obligation altogether. If we wished to do that, the only honest course would be to reject Article X outright, or at least that part of it which involves the possibility of war. What remains of the obligation, under the reservation, is difficult to define; but something does remain. We continue to be a party to the arrangement, and therefore may justly be regarded as intending to carry out its essential purpose. In any case which may arise, there will be a strong presumption that we ought to do our share with the rest. The burden of proof will be upon those who oppose such action. If the League of Nations becomes an effective reality, our membership in it will come to imply more and more strongly the assuming of any duties or burdens it calls for, unless fair and convincing reasons can be adduced against our doing so. In a word, Article X, as qualified by the reservation, will leave Congress a free agent—that is, not only free to exercise its Constitutional powers, which is a matter of course, but free in a moral sense—and yet will commit the nation to the carrying out of the Article's purpose unless a sound case to the contrary can be established.

The nature of this effect of the reservation may perhaps be best brought out by a comparison with the situation of other Governments. In regard to the character of an obligation like that of Article X, no such absolute difference exists between our country and others as is frequently asserted. Whatever may be true in regard to a declaration of war, the power to carry on war is dependent in any parliamentary country upon the voting of supplies by the parliament. But if the British House of Commons, for example, were to refuse to vote supplies in pursuance of the obligation of a treaty, it would be guilty of a breach of faith and a violation of the national honor. If Britain desired to retain the same degree of freedom in regard to Article X as the reservation contemplates for this country, she would have to make a reservation of similar character. America, in making it, differentiates herself from the other countries not merely to the extent necessary under her Constitution, but to the extent she thinks justified by her wholly different position in the world—her wholly different relation to European complexities—and by the character of her national tradition. We believe that it is wise for her to do so. The most weighty consideration which in the early days of the controversy was urged against such a course has been removed. There is no longer any practical doubt that our ratification of the treaty, with the reservation, will be accepted without remonstrance by the other Powers. To accomplish that ratification speedily—with the language of the reservation improved if possible, but with its substance preserved—is now more clearly than ever the thing supremely to be desired.

A B C of the Exchange Question

THE violent fall in sterling exchange has not only produced a profound effect in Wall Street but has intensely stirred the interest of the public at large. The question of why this particular fall took place and why it took place at this particular time involves a thousand complexities and doubts. But on the essential character of the situation there is no reason why the general public should not have a fairly clear understanding, and indeed it is of great importance that the vital elements of it be clearly grasped by all intelligent persons.

The first thing to be apprehended is that there is not in the nature of things any reason why, under existing conditions, the value of the pound sterling—what may be called its normal value, the value it may be expected to have in the absence of any particular condition as regards exports and imports, debits and credits—should be anything like the par value of the pound as it stood before the war. The name pound sterling means to-day a totally different thing from what it did then. It then signified either a gold coin containing 4.86 times as much gold as is contained in a United States gold dollar, or paper currency exchangeable on demand at London for that amount of gold. It now means simply paper money to which the old name continues to be attached, but which has no present relation to any specified quantity of gold. If the inflation of the British currency, and of banking credits which serve to swell the British monetary medium, had gone to a sufficiently high point, the command which a unit of that currency possessed over gold, or over any commodity, would have gone down to as low a point as you may choose to name. The difference between the depreciation of the pound sterling and the depreciation of the mark is a difference only in degree, not in kind.

Obvious as this is, it is necessary to insist upon it in order to clear up misapprehensions which are widely current, even in some very important quarters. That an increase of exports from, or a diminution of imports into, a country against which exchange is far below what is called par has a tendency to raise that exchange is true enough; but it is a mistake to suppose that this process has any power to restore that so-called par, when the currency in question is paper not redeemable in gold. There is not in any true sense any assignable par of exchange between the present so-called pound sterling and the United States dollar. When the pound and the dollar each meant a certain definite amount of gold, the ratio between these two amounts was a true par of exchange between them. Fluctuations in the rate of exchange on the market were caused by the immediate demand for the one or the other being greater or less than the immediate supply on the market. If payments due from New York to London exceeded those due from London to New York, the pound stood above par; in the reverse case it stood below par. The reason for this was that these opposing credits and debits could be exchanged against each other here in New York so far as the lesser of the two quantities went, but to cover the remainder an actual shipment of gold was, on the face of things, required, and this involved an appreciable amount of expense and delay. The difference necessary, however, to cover this disadvantage was small, and accordingly the deviation from par never went beyond a small margin one way or the other. The extreme quotations thus normally possible were known as the gold-export and gold-import points. When, either through the transfer of gold or through the export or import of commodities or securities, a sufficient readjustment had taken place, exchange was restored to par.

In existing conditions it continues true that an increase of current obligations due from America to England, or a diminution of current obligations due from England to America, tends to raise sterling exchange, and vice versa. But the point of equilibrium is no longer 4.86. There is no reason why it should be. Nor is there any definite figure that takes the place of the old par. There is, however, a ratio between the paper pound and the dollar which, although it can not be definitely evaluated, should be regarded as representing in fact a point of equilibrium or parity. The simplicity of the old comparison—so many grains of gold in the pound, so many grains of gold in the dollar—is gone; but comparisons of a substantial, though irregular, nature are still possible. The index-number, recording as it does the average price-level of a large number of representative commodities, might be supposed to be a satisfactory way of making this comparison. If it were, something like the old simplicity would be reintroduced into the question. But unfortunately it is not.

Apart from any question of the trustworthiness of the index-number as a measure of the general purchasing power of the currency unit in a given country, another consideration, far more important, interferes with its application to the present purpose. It is only those commodities which are capable of playing an important part in international trade that enter effectively into the determination of the relative values of the monetary unit of two different countries. Iron, or copper, or zinc, or wool, or cotton, and manufactures of many kinds can play a part in that determination roughly similar to that which gold itself plays when both the countries are on the gold standard. Obviously, however, no clear rule can be given for merging the prices of these things into a single figure which would take the place of the gold unit. Some kind of index-number might be constructed out of them, but in doing so account would have to be taken of highly complex considerations in regard to freights, tariffs, and other circumstances; and at best it would be a very uncertain guide.

In spite of all this, however, the currency units of any two countries, for example the pound and the dollar, do each of them represent a certain amount of purchasing power over commodities that can be exported and imported on a large scale. And the ratio of these two amounts of purchasing power (allowance made for freights, tariffs, etc.) should be regarded as constituting a theoretical par of exchange between them. The figure is indeterminable, and, indeed, in a great measure indefinite. Yet in a substantial sense it exists; and it tends to be realized in practice in the same manner, though infinitely less accurately and effectively, as does the regular par of exchange between currencies both embodying the gold standard. Deviations from it tend to be corrected by exports and imports of commodities—much more slowly and irregularly and uncertainly, yet in principle after the same fashion as deviations from the regular par of exchange are corrected by the export or import of gold. It is possible, for example, that the pound sterling to-day has, roughly speaking, in this way the same purchasing power as three and a half dollars; if so, 3.50 should be regarded as the theoretical par of exchange to-day, and any deviation from it, up or down, as a fluctuation, though the fluctuations may be very wide and be a long time in getting corrected. In a word, and waiving all complexities, the point is that if the fall in sterling exchange is greater than is justified by the fall in the purchasing power of the pound, as compared with that of the dollar, over commodities of international importance, this will stimulate exports from England, or restrict exports from the United States, and thus tend to restore equilibrium at the theoretical ratio. Anybody can see that if pig-iron could be bought in England at a price which, with freight and tariff added, would make it cost here five pounds sterling a ton, and if the American price was twenty-five dollars a ton, this state of things could not long continue with sterling exchange at 3.30.

In a country in which there is an open market for gold, as there is now at London, one might be tempted to dispose of the question by referring simply to the premium on gold —or, what is the same thing, the discount on paper—as the true determinant of the par of exchange. But this would be, essentially, to mistake effect for cause. The premium on gold, though to some extent affected by other factors, is in the main determined by the state of foreign exchange, and not vice versa. Obviously, it would be impossible, except by way of temporary fluctuation, that a paper pound should be worth much more or much less gold in London than in New York at any given time, provided there is a free market for gold at London; and the gold it is worth in New York is only another name for the rate of exchange.

We must content ourselves with just one more remark on these elementary matters. Nothing is more common than to hear it said that a low rate of exchange on a given country stimulates exports. Understood as it usually is, the statement is extremely misleading. It is not the absolute level of exchange, but its relative level as compared with the effective level of prices (of which we have been speaking above) that operates upon exports either as a stimulus or as a check. Exchange on Germany, for example, is depressed far more than prices in Germany have risen; and so long as this continues to be the case, it operates as a great stimulus to exports. But the mere fact that mark exchange is vastly below what mark exchange used to be when the mark meant a certain amount of gold has nothing whatever to do with the case. In that sense, mark exchange might continue low for a hundred years without affecting exports or imports in the slightest degree. If the level of prices in Germany were as high as the rate of exchange was low, her international trade would go on exactly the same as though there had never been any monetary disturbance—exactly the same, that is, except for the damaging effect that uncertainty and fluctuations always exert upon trade, which effect, however, is just as likely to cut one way as the other.

We have made no attempt to touch upon the question of remedies, a question which will long exercise the highest powers of the best minds in this country and in Europe. The one remark upon which we shall venture in this direction is that, while every possible stress should be laid upon the need of increased production and frugality, it would be mere blindness to imagine that these, of themselves, are capable of restoring normal conditions in the currencies of the world. The gold standard has ceased to exist in all the leading countries of Europe. In some of them—most important of all, Germany—the departure has been so great that return by any normal process is impossible. But even in the countries whose condition in this regard is best, restoration will be possible only through the firm and consistent direction of governmental and banking policy toward that end. Deflation is not only a painful, but unfortunately also a dangerous process. But it has to be effected; perhaps very slowly, yet certainly through the pursuance of a definite public policy, over and above any efforts that may be made by individuals. That this fact is becoming more and more thoroughly recognized is the one encouraging feature of the situation.

Labor in Politics

THE policy of organized labor in the United States has hitherto been steadily opposed to the formation of a distinct labor party. In this it has stood in sharp contrast with that of organized labor in England. For this difference thoughtful Americans have generally felt that there was a fundamental reason. The American workingman, the typical American workingman, does not habitually think of himself as a member of a distinctly separate class in the community. That there are class distinctions in our country, it would be idle to deny; but the psychology of them is radically different from that of class distinctions in the Old World. Not only has democracy been so real and pervasive an element in American life and American ways of thinking as to preclude a deep-rooted class feeling, but the actual advance of thousands from the ranks of the manual toilers to positions of importance or affluence has been so familiar a phenomenon as to make the possibility a real thing in every man's thoughts. Accordingly, it has not been merely a calculation of expediency, but the operation of instinctive and habitual feelings, that has militated against the segregation of American workingmen into a class party.

The proclamation issued this week by the American Federation of Labor does not ostensibly abandon this position. It does not abandon it at all so far as the form of organization is concerned. Not only does it not propose the formation of a labor party, or the adhesion of the Federation to any labor party already formed, but it maps out a course irreconcilable with any such programme. Nevertheless, if the proclamation means all that it seems to portend, it marks a departure in the direction of class segregation quite as radical, and quite as momentous, as would be the creation of a new party. If the programme it lays down is to be systematically and consistently carried out, that great body of workingmen which constitutes the Federation of Labor will henceforth play, in American politics, the part not of individual American citizens, but of a consolidated class.

That programme is tersely summed up in this sentence in the proclamation:

> The American Federation of Labor announces its determination to apply every legitimate means and all of the power at its command to accomplish the defeat of labor's enemies who aspire for public office, whether they be candidates for President, for Congress, for State Legislatures or any other office.

"Every legitimate means" may, to be sure, signify little or much; but, interpreted in the light of other statements in the proclamation, it has an ominous sound. It is at least conceivable that what the Federation leaders have in mind is to take a leaf out of the Anti-Saloon League's book. The systematic blacklisting which was the heart of that organization's activities sufficed to give the League the balance of power in a sufficient number of Legislative and Congressional districts to bring about its astonishing and revolutionary victory. And it is to balance of power that the Federation's proclamation explicitly points. Whether it will be able, or even whether it desires, to wield the possible voting power of the Federation's members in the ruthless and effective way which the Anti-Saloon League found so successful, it may be premature to discuss. But that this possibility has to be considered is evident. The absence of any such determined effort in the past, and the failure of such efforts as have been made in this direction, throw little light upon the possibilities that lie before us now.

It is none too early to warn both the public and the labor people of the profound and far-reaching consequences which the adoption of such a policy would entail. It would mean a class situation not less serious, but far more serious, than that which would be brought about by the marshaling of organized labor into a separate political party. With a separate party, unfortunate as might be its identification with a class, the other parties could reckon on fair and manly terms. It would be a question of matching one set of forces, one aggregation of citizens, against another. But the balance-of-power programme, in its fulness, means systematic intimidation. It means, unless counteracted by a corresponding combination of opposing purpose, that no man in either of the great parties could call his soul his own except at the risk of political annihilation.

This condition of things would be intolerable; and although it would undoubtedly lead to the adoption of a remedy, the remedy would be almost as bad as the disease. If the Federation's announcement means the worst that it is apparently capable of meaning, we are about to enter upon one of the most sinister chapters of our political history. Let us hope that, whatever may be at present in the minds of the Federation's officers, the true significance of any programme of organized intimidation by a class—the disaster which it portends, in the first instance to us all, but finally and most heavily to the very class that undertakes it—will be brought home to the labor leaders in time to prevent the launching of any such rash and ill-omened enterprise.

America and the English Tradition

THE recently established chair in the history, literature, and institutions of the United States which is to be shared among the several universities of Great Britain, is quite different from the exchange professorships of sometimes unhappy memory. It is not at all the idea to carry over one of our professors each year and indoctrinate him with the true culture at its source. The occupant of the chair will be, if the announced intention is carried out, quite as often British as American, and quite as likely a public man as a professor. The chief object is to bring to England a better knowledge of the United States, and a purpose more laudable can scarcely be imagined. Peace and prosperity will endure in the world in some very precise relation to the extent to which England succeeds in understanding us.

It is not an illusion to suppose that our understanding of the British is on the whole better than theirs of us. The British Empire is a large and comparatively simple fact, now conspicuously before the world for a long time. The United States was, in British eyes, until recently, a comparatively insignificant fact, yet vastly more complicated than they imagined. Each, of course, perfectly knew the faults of the other, assessed with an unerring cousinly eye. The American bragged in a nasal whine, the Briton patronized in a throaty burble. Whoever among the struggling nations of the world might win, England saw to it that she never lost; your Yankee was content with the more ignoble triumphs of merchandising, willing to cheapen life if he could only add to his dollars. But the excellence of English political institutions and methods, the charm of English life, the tremendous power of the Empire for promoting freedom and civilization in the world, these are things which Americans have long recognized and in a way understood. Anything like an equivalent British appreciation of America in the large seems confined to a very few honorable exceptions among them. Admiration for Niagara, which is half British anyway, or enthusiasm for the "Wild West"—your better-class Englishman always thrills to the frontier—is no step at all toward rightly appreciating America.

To no inconsiderable extent this is America's own fault. She does not present to the world a record that is easily read. It is obvious, for instance—and so obvious that it is not often enough stated—that America has and will continue to have a fundamentally English civilization. English law is the basis of her law. English speech is her speech, and if with a difference, it is a difference that the philologist, all things considered, finds amazingly small. English literature is her literature—Chaucer and Shakespeare hers because her blood then coursed indistinguishably through the English heart they knew so well; Milton, Dryden, and the Queen Anne men hers, because she was still a part of England; the later men hers by virtue of affectionate acquaintanceship and a generous and not inconsiderable rivalry. English history, in short, is her history. The struggles of the thirteenth century through which law and parliament came into being, the struggles of the seventeenth century through which law and parliament came to rule, are America's struggles upon which she can look back with the satisfaction that some things that have been done in the world need never be undone or done over again, whatever the room for improvement may still be. Americans, no less than British, recognize that independence was largely an accidental result of a war which sprang out of a false theory of economics, but whose conclusion carried with it a lesson in the management of empire which subsequent history shows the British to have learned thoroughly and for the benefit of all concerned. American independence, however, once established, pointed a way to democratic freedom which England hastened to follow. This we know. And yet—

And yet we allow these obvious and fundamental considerations to become marvellously obscured. We allow England's failure to solve an insoluble Irish problem to arouse in us an attitude of mind possibly excusable in some Irishmen, but wholly inexcusable in any American. We allow a sentimental regard for some immigrant from Eastern Europe, who comes to us with a philosophy born of conditions that in English-speaking lands ceased to be centuries ago, to make us pretend to see in him the true expression of America's traditional ideals. We allow ourselves to be far too easy with the phrase, "He is not pro-German, he is merely anti-British." Why are they anti-British? Why should they be permitted to make it falsely appear that recognition of the English basis of America involves approval of everything that England in her long history may or may not have done? Why should they be allowed to pretend that disapproval of some particular act of England justifies repudiation of most of the things by virtue of which we are what we are? America from the first has been part of the great English experiment—great because it is capable of learning from experience.

The world has put a big investment in blood and treasure, and all that they imply, into the education of England. It is satisfied—the world's response to Germany's insolent challenge is the proof of it—that its pains have been well bestowed. England is more nearly fit than any other nation to wield the power that is hers. That is not to deny the peculiar virtues of other nations; indeed, these virtues have largely contributed to the result. Italy has educated her; France has educated her; we have done something; and Germany. In result, she is not perfect—the English would perhaps least of all assert that—but she has learned a great deal and held herself steady while she learned it. It is a bigger job than the world cares to undertake to teach any other nation so much. Nor would it be at all likely to succeed so well. For what England has to offer the world in return is not simply her institutions; it is not merely a formula for the effective discharge of police duty throughout the world; it is the English freeman, whether he hail from Canada, Australia, Africa, or the uttermost isles of the sea.

A most adaptable fellow, this freeman, doing all sorts of work everywhere, and with tremendous powers of assimilation. Consider him in his origins. He began by assimilating fully his own weight in Danes, while remaining an English freeman. He then perforce accepted a Norman king, as he had accepted a Danish one, hoping, as always, that the king would not trouble him too much. But when Norman William, who was very ill-informed about the breed, killed off most of his natural leaders and harried the rest into villeiny, how did he manage in a small matter of two hundred years or so to make an English gentleman not only of himself but of all the rag-tag of adventurers who had come over with William and since? How did he contrive, out of a band of exiles fleeing from an Egypt of ecclesiastical tyranny, broken younger sons, artisans out of a job, speculators, bondmen, Swedes, Dutchmen, and what not, to make America? Is he one likely to lose his bearings when in his America the age-old problem again heaves in view? This is a job he has been working at pretty successfully for more than a thousand years. Grant him a moment to realize himself afresh in the face of it. Don't expect him to stop and give a coherent explanation of what he is doing. He wouldn't be the true son of the English tradition that he is if he could do that. Perhaps the occupants of the new chair can do something of the sort for him.

THE REVIEW

A weekly journal of political and general discussion

Published by
The National Weekly Corporation
140 Nassau Street, New York
Fabian Franklin, President
Harold de Wolf Fuller, Treasurer

Subscription price, five dollars a year in advance. Fifteen cents a copy. Foreign postage, one dollar extra; Canadian postage, fifty cents extra. Foreign subscriptions may be sent to Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons, Ltd., 24, Bedford St., Strand, London, W. C. 2, England.
Copyright, 1920, in the United States of America
Editors
FABIAN FRANKLIN
HAROLD de WOLF FULLER

Associate Editors
Harry Morgan Ayres O. W. Firkins
A. J. Barnouw W. H. Johnson
Jerome Landfield

President Wilson's Japan

JAPANESE statesmen, on the many occasions when the purpose of the Mikado's land is under scrutiny, are fond of declaring: "So desu ka!"—to the accompaniment of that succulent intake of the breath we all know—"Our country is so misunderstood."

With Mr. Wilson's pax Japonica now well under way, one can not but wonder what President Wilson's Japan really was when the triumvirate at Paris underwrote a Japanese primacy in the East. Mr. Wilson would, doubtless, agree with me that, now that he is finally grappling with the situation in the Pacific, the State Department, his Minister at Peking, even the Ambassador in Tokio, are showing an irritating blindness to the picture he has so carefully drawn for himself.

His decision at Paris was not at bottom dictated by those disconcerting secret agreements made between Japan and the Allies in 1917 for the purpose, as the President remarked several times, of bringing that Eastern Power into the European struggle—Japan having as a matter of fact quite voluntarily declared war on Germany August 23, 1914. It was not prompted by a desire to abet an injustice to China. Even the pressure of Fiume was but a contributing incident. If the President had not visualized a Japan through the kindly light furnished by the suave Marquis Saionji, the candid Viscount Chinda, and colored by the pleasant memories at Washington of Ambassador Ishii, the thing could not possibly have happened. In the settlement of the Far Eastern imbroglio, he moved with a sureness which so baffled many of us that we never grasped the main consideration in the case: just what kind of Japan President Wilson's was.

Behind all President Wilson's idealism lies a curtain of Calvinistic doctrine against which he projects his every act. To international relations he brings the relentless austerity of the Covenanter. For him the state is an aggregation of individuals actuated by a sifting of good and evil, and predestined to be convinced in the end by an appeal to their virtuous instincts. The President sought in the legalities of the Covenant a deity who should hold up before the nations a vivid picture of the Judgment Day. And, as a picture, it is not without inspiration for the high-minded. Practical European statesmen, however, looked to the League of Nations mainly for a way in which to settle in chancery international difficulties; and it was they who really held the scales.

During President Wilson's first administration, I had a long, frank talk with his newly appointed Ambassador to Japan, in which I seemed to be hearing the President himself lay down the why and the wherefore of his Far Eastern purposes. Ambassador Morris, like the President, knew little about the intricacies of the situation; but that seemed of slight importance. The Ambassador was a personal emissary of the White House, one felt, a missionary of the new diplomacy. He was the exponent of a formula which would resolve the tangled skein of Sino-Japanese relations just as readily as harmonize our purposes on the Pacific, or open the closing door in China, or settle difficulties with Mexico. It had the fascination which benevolent intentions in foreign fields always possess for Americans. On our side, it was a plan of action which eschewed suspicion of the other party. It freely imputed to all sincerity of purpose. It reflected an abiding faith in the necessity of demonstrating our own disinterestedness at any cost. Japan—if she had ever infringed our interests, or contemplated such a thing—would turn over a new leaf if we took no stand which could alienate her friendship.

Many things have happened since then. Ambassador Morris, one takes it after seeing him in Tokio, is no longer under any illusions as to the prevailing tendency of the real Japan in China or in Siberia. But the force of these initial convictions remains with the White House. The President's Japan is a nation whose eyes have been opened to the futility of military challenge and which therefore has magnanimously abandoned a vision of empire in the East; not a Japan reaching for the trappings of world-power on the continent of East Asia by devious roads, covering, under their properly worded phrases, the same old rail-and-iron policies. Yet there was that Paul Page Whitham report on the neutralization of China's railways—I was in Peking when it was being prepared—which the Senate Foreign Relations Committee could not see, showing another Japan; a Japan which needed only "the economic rights" in Shantung awarded her at the Peace Conference to menace the security of China, as this expert survey pointed out. It must also have pointed out to the President, by word, by picture, and by maps, that his Consortium scheme should include the communications Japan held so jealously in North China if this great plan of coöperative action to eliminate international competition and preserve China's integrity is to have a chance of success.

Then, there was a masterly memorandum of the American Minister to China, remarkable for its lucid brevity, the most penetrating exposition of the Far Eastern crisis which has been written. With great skill, it is understood, President Wilson's own spokesman in China bared for him the structure of Japan's purposes, laid down the lines of effective settlement, and measured the danger impending from the wrong solution of the difficulties. Yet another report which the President ought to have seen was an intimate investigation of Japan as she really conducted herself from the beginning of her occupation of Shantung. From an unimpeachable source, it, too, was a picture not appropriate to the President's Japan; hence it fared badly in the Presidential councils when in due time it came against the phantasmagoric Japan with which the White House preferred to deal. These are over and above the deluge of illuminating dispatches and reports of the same tenor coming in as department routine—from our shrewd representative at Tsingtao, the Peking Legation, our intelligence services. Indeed, one wonders if there does not exist a kind of censorship among the officials closest to the President, whose concern it is to see that he is not antagonized by the obtruding realities so counter to his own views of the situation.

In any case, Viscount Ishii's statements of what his Government hoped to do impressed the President more than the State Department reports of what Japan was doing. He preferred to build up his policy on the Hara Ministry's professions of liberalism rather than confront Japan's actual government of minority rule and star-chamber politics—attempts to enfranchise more than 5 per cent. of the population thwarted by the political interests; the popular house of the Diet a chamber of protest having no effectual control over the purse; the House of Peers packed in the interest of the old régime; the mainspring of administration vested in an irresponsible Cabinet designated by the Mikado, behind which stands an extra-legal council of advisors holding the final decisions of Japan and really exercising the imperial prerogatives. Admittedly, in Japan there is the fabric of a true liberalism, as Premier Hara and his fellow Ministers have taken care to impress upon President Wilson, but events have shown that the White House has come face to face with only the vested interests which are dictating Japan's moves.

It was President Wilson's misfortune to come to the Paris Conference with his own Japan in mind. It was by such a picture that he was actuated when he talked over Japan's terms of settlement with Saionji and his associates; and, for reasons which need not be gone into here, the Japanese delegation did not disillusion him. Even the Consortium so ably broached in Peking by the American Minister—at the time of the armistice Japan was quite willing to come in—was already settled as to principle in those May days of last year. But, to-day, the White House policy has failed—failed because President Wilson's Japan was a wraith. The Consortium, which was to have pooled the international danger points in China's development, equitably protecting the legitimate interests of every Power, has been deadlocked by the firm hand of the controlling elements in Japan; it has been vetoed by the forces that brought Japan the prestige of the Chinese War in 1894, the diplomatic assaults on China since 1915, the undermining of her allies in Siberia to-day. The real Japan has contemptuously called a halt to the merry game its marionettes played at the Peace Conference when they assented to the Consortium scheme to facilitate the President's approval of the Shantung settlement.

The test of President Wilson's Japan was not the Peace Conference, but the aftermath. The actual makers of Japan's master-policy are far-sighted military leaders who see things as they are, calculating statesmen of the old order, and the heads of the great business enterprises which came to have a vested interest in the governance of Japan since the Meiji restoration. There is nothing visionary about them; they have merely weighed the new diplomacy of President Wilson and found it wanting. The rejection of the Consortium was the first manifestation of their conviction that the old diplomacy might still dominate the world—at all events in the East.

CHARLES HODGES

The "New Republic's" Exhilaration

THE New Republic feels that the announcement of the Supreme Economic Council concerning the blockade of Soviet Russia is the most exhilarating piece of news which has come out of Europe since the signing of the armistice. Judging by the article in its columns inspired by this news, it may be conceded that the degree of exhilaration was unlimited. Exhilaration indeed has carried the New Republic far beyond the bounds of reality and fact.

So, for example, under the influence of this exhilaration, the New Republic considers the blockade an atrocity, "the last abominable remnant of the policy of economic terrorism, with which the Allied Governments have made the peoples of Eastern Europe pay in hunger, sickness, depression, and actual starvation for the sins of their rulers." According to the pious hope of the New Republic, the distracted souls of the democratic nations can now "resume contact with the spiritual impulses of genuine democracy."

One need not be a defender of the expediency or effectiveness of the Russian blockade as a military measure of defense, at a time when the German-led hordes of the Red armies threatened to engulf the new states of Eastern Europe, in order to point out that the blockade did not starve Russia. Russia is one of the greatest food-producing countries in the world, and its isolation during the war tended to accumulate rather than disperse food supplies. Furthermore, the blockade in reality affected only a small corner of Russia, namely, the region of Petrograd.

In order to reveal the entire falsity of the assumption made above, it is worth while to reiterate the causes of the starvation which is decimating the larger Russian cities and industrial centres. The main and all-inclusive cause is the incompetence of the Bolshevik authorities — their stupidly impractical programme, their terrorism and graft, and their inability to organize production. In the first place, as a political dodge, they told the peasants to seize the land. Next, they proceeded to socialize the land and attempted to tell the peasant that he was merely a tenant of the state, and that anything he produced above a limited amount for his own consumption belonged to the state. In this way, they successfully alienated the peasant population and cut down food production. Then, they attempted to make the peasant accept worthless paper money in payment for food, and this failed. Had they been able to produce any of the simple articles of which the peasant stood in need, he would have gladly furnished food in exchange, but instead they sent detachments of Red Guards into the country districts to requisition grain by force. This not only did not succeed, but it aroused a hatred so great that to-day a Commissar or a Red Guard dare not go among the peasants without military protection. Transportation was, of course, in a bad state as a result of war conditions, but instead of improving it and making the necessary repairs, the Bolsheviks completed its disorganization and ruin. The life of the cities depends upon transportation, and they could not be supplied even if food were forthcoming from the country districts. All this is not due to the blockade. To be sure, the Bolsheviks, in return for stolen gold and confiscated property, might have obtained a certain amount of machinery, tools, and manufactured goods if there had been no blockade; but these would have been of little use, as they were unable to employ what they already had or to utilize their own abundant resources for repairing or creating equipment.

Thus, the charge that the blockade was an atrocity whereby the Russian people were starved falls to the ground as the baseless falsehood of Bolshevist sympathizers. The real blockade of Petrograd was Bolshevik incompetence, Bolshevik food control, and Bolshevik graft.

When the New Republic turns to a consideration of the political aspects of the Russian Revolution, it proceeds on still weaker hypotheses. It parades before us again the old theory that all would have been well if the Allies had satisfied the "Revolutionary democracy" by a joint definition of war aims as a necessary preliminary condition of a general settlement. There is no question that the Russian people were terribly war-weary, and above all things wished peace. It was the promise of making peace, more than anything else, that gave the Bolsheviks their victory. But to talk about the interest of the Russians in "war aims" is the merest drivel. A few thousand of the revolutionary intelligentsia in Petrograd and Moscow talked about war aims and split into a dozen parties in their discussion. But 99 per cent. of the Russian people knew nothing whatever of the subject. To the few of them that caught up the slogan "no annexations and no indemnities," its words signified anneksia i kontributsia, which they believed to be two provinces that France and Germany were fighting over. When the agitators told the crowds that Miliukov was striving for the Straits (Prolivi), they were led to believe that this was a demand to pour out (prolivat) their blood! The idea that the failure of the Allies to announce their war aims had any effect on Russian public opinion and its support of the war, assumes that the inchoate millions of Russian peasants had a public opinion or that it could be informed on these points.

The article in question is so replete with misstatements and false insinuations that space does not suffice to take them up in detail, but some of them are so glaring that they ought not to be overlooked even in this period of loose assertion and glib generalization. Here is an example: "As a consequence of their [the Allies'] persistent hostility to the needs, the scruples, the interests and the feelings of the Russian people, they finally convinced the Revolutionary democracy that its safety depended on the seizure of all power by the Soviets." We have heard many explanations of the Bolsheviks' rise to power, and we know something of the methods employed by Lenin and Trotsky and their collaborators, but this is a new one. Considering the struggle which the Mensheviks and the Socialist Revolutionaries carried on, and are still carrying on, against the Bolshevik autocracy, this explanation seems far-fetched, even for the Revolutionary democracy of the New Republic.

The New Republic is surprised that, because the Soviet Government signed the peace of Brest-Litovsk, the Allies subsequently treated Soviet Russia as the military associate of Germany. Apparently, the fact that from this time von Mirbach played a predominant part in the Bolshevik policies, and that German officers organized and led the Red forces, is overlooked as of no importance. Cunningly devised is the following distortion of seeming fact: "They continued to propagate the myth that the vast mass of the Russian people were opposed to peace, and would welcome the intervention of a rescuing Japanese or American army." Of course, the vast mass of the Russian people were not opposed to peace, but on the other hand the abortive risings against the Bolshevik tyranny, and the piteous calls for help, showed clearly enough how welcome active assistance would have been in their struggle against their oppressors. When that help did not come, or came only in driblets, the people lost faith in the promises of their rescuers. The terrible fate of Yaroslavl, whose inhabitants, having trusted in promises, rose en masse when they heard of the landing at Archangel, was enough to blast the hopes which the Russian people placed in their allies.

Here is another gem of sinuous misstatement: "The Omsk Government was established under protection of the Czecho-Slovaks and the Allied army, and in the south of Russia Denikin organized with a larger measure of native Russian assistance another center of anti-Bolshevist military and political power." The Omsk Government under Admiral Kolchak was established, not under the protection of the Czecho-Slovaks, but as a means of saving Siberia from the Bolsheviks at the very moment when the Czecho-Slovaks, learning of the armistice, decided to withdraw. This is merely another of the persistent lies concerning the Czecho-Slovaks which have from time to time received publicity. As a matter of fact, the revolution which placed Kolchak in power took place on November 18, 1918, and from the 1st of December, no Czecho-Slovaks took part in the fighting against the Bolsheviks. As for Denikin, his organization of the Volunteer Army in South Russia took place entirely without Allied aid, and assistance was given him only after he had won through to the Black Sea subsequent to the armistice. In neither case was there the slightest basis for the assertion made by the New Republic that these movements implied the "dictatorship of their former rulers." But if the New Republic really believed this, how could it view with approval the proposal that would have permitted these anti-Bolshevik factions to keep control of "practically the whole of Siberia and a large part of Southern Russia?" The fact is that no proposal of any kind could be so hateful to the Russian people as one that would mean the dismemberment of Russia in this way. The slanders against Kolchak and Denikin would seem to have been sufficiently exposed already to prevent, at this late date, such a statement as that "they were unable with the weapons of terrorism and starvation to crush out the invincible refusal of the Russian people to take back their former rulers at the bidding of foreign statesmen." The real tragedy of all this mass of falsehood and twaddle is that self-styled "liberals" should have exerted their great efforts, in the name of self-determination, in behalf of a system that is crushing all democracy out of the Russian people and which they are helpless to resist, and that these "liberals" are thereby promoting reaction in its most tyrannical form.

JEROME LANDFIELD

Correspondence

Government by Subterfuge

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

Occasionally a Federal judge speaks the truth in such direct and forcible language that it ought to reach others than those who read the reports. An instance in point is the opinion of Judge George M. Bourquin (United States District Judge, District of Montana) in United States v. Parsons, 261 Fed. 223, a decision rendered on October 16, 1919. Referring to the "Harrison Drug Act" (38 Stat., 785) he said:

> The act is ostensibly a revenue measure, and within limits the courts must recognize it as such. At the same time any one with sense enough to be at large without a keeper knows the revenue feature, which possibly returns cents for dollars spent in administration, is but a fiction and device to enable Congress, otherwise disabled, to suppress opium traffic and use, to hinder and obstruct such traffic and use so far as may be done incidental to exercise of revenue power. It is one of many like and regrettable devices to evade constitutional limitations, to impose duties of the States upon the United States, and to vest the latter with non-delegated and reserved police power of the former.

To the writer, the foregoing seems sound and encouraging. Either the people desire that the police power shall be exercised by the Federal Government or they do not; if they do, there should be no difficulty in obtaining a Constitutional amendment to that effect.

H. T. NEWCOMB

New York, February 3

Freedom of Opinion

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

I am glad that you will not let the New Republic have the last word on Freedom of Opinion. But I regret that the fashion in journals of opinion seems to encourage length rather than conciseness in discussing such a capital matter. Yet on such a topic, a careful summary worthy of good old-fashioned italics might be worth more, possibly, than even your brilliant lengthiness. I modestly propose this:

Expression of opinion in America is and should be free in criticism and suggestion up to the point of remarks (which includes propaganda) subversive of our national idea of government and our constituted form of government.

Americans have always recognized that our Government is an experiment. We are dedicated to an idea, which is hedged about with the majesty of the law and the courts, and articulated by the machinery of a truly representative government. Opinions amounting to destructive criticism of evils grown up within it, or to constructive fashioning of it to meet new conditions, are wanted; they are a sign of health in the body politic. Mr. Palmer, at one extreme, devises poorly when he would legislate to ostracize the critic of a law; without criticism how can laws be bettered? The New Republic and the Nation at the other extreme seem to divorce a man, while expressing opinion, from any sense of loyalty to the Government, or even to its fundamental idea. They may be dedicated solely to the truth, and very good if they are, but being by the Government protected physically, mentally, and morally (I can hear them hoot at that) they ought to see that loyalty, not to every detail but to the fundamentals of our Government must be preliminary to expressing their free opinion. That is all we ask of the citizen who earns his living in business. A devoted follower of their pages recently told me that nothing in our form of government was worth preserving. I do not blame either journal for that opinion. But to my mind that is treasonable utterance—am I benighted to think so? And that is just where, in any social organism, opinion need not expect freedom to circulate in print or get a license to hold meetings.

MERRILL F. CLARKE

New York City, January 9

More and Better Reading

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

I have just been informed by a representative of the Review of the publisher's campaign to encourage, through their "Mid-Winter Book Season," more and better reading. May I express my hearty approval?

Never has our country more needed to remember the warning of the Chinese sage that to read without thinking is futile, but to think without reading is dangerous. To encourage reading and thinking is a task in which editors, publishers, and librarians may well work together, and the American Library Association, at present engaged in a campaign to promote the use of libraries and to encourage thoughtful reading, is delighted that you, too, are contributing to the same end.

CARL H. MILAM

Director American Library Association

New York, December 26, 1919

Germans in Disguise

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

We see much in certain publications in reference to the alleged growth of "liberal sentiment" in this country. The reëlection of Victor Berger, after his conviction for violation of our sedition laws, is often spoken of as showing the growth of "liberal" views. It does not seem to be generally known that the district that cast 24,000 votes for Berger is largely German in its population, and that rampant pro-Germanism was only held in check there during the war by the well-known determination of both State and National authorities to suppress treason at all costs.

James Mann, who appears to be Berger's best friend in the House, also comes from a district where the Germans are very numerous. Nearly every member of the House that voted to seat Berger comes from a district where Germans, still unreconciled to the participation of this country in the war, are numerous.

I am fully aware that a large proportion of the German population of the United States was loyal during the war, and many of them active in war work. These proved themselves real Americans, and to them is due our heartiest approval for the manner in which they stood by their adopted country. But, in certain sections, there were and are large numbers of Germans who have used every means possible (without endangering their carcasses) to work against American institutions, since the country failed to respond to the German demand for an embargo on arms and munitions to the Allies. To this origin may be traced their support of any and all sorts of radical and socialistic movements, and activities of other sorts.

Men who were known to have not the smallest sympathy for socialistic ideas until this country seemed likely to war with Germany, have lately supported the Socialist and Communist parties. It was the same way with the growth of the pacifist movement. The most active and aggressive pacifists the writer came in contact with during the war were men who had no leaning toward such ideas prior to the talk of America going into the war. Not a few of them have quickly forgotten their abhorrence of all war within the last fifteen months, and would willingly have this country go to war with Japan or England over some technicality that could be handled much better by diplomatic negotiations. Were they pacifists, or unprincipled fakers?

Where do our so-called intellectual publications, which are now so violently condemning every effort to rid our country of radical plotters and alleged workers who never work, get their supporters? One can now see them at newsstands in certain North Chicago districts where hardly a copy was displayed prior to about three years ago. Wherever you see them you may look for numerous German patrons. I have been observing this for more than a year. Many of the buyers are among the wealthy classes who have no sympathy with socialism or radicalism, except as they may serve the purpose of trouble-makers for the country of their adoption.

EDW. CORMAN

Secretary St. Paul Typothetae

St. Paul, Minn., January 31

Intangible Advantages

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

Your "Defense of Property" in the issue of January 3 is a fine statement of truth, and an aid to clear thinking. The intangible advantages of various arrangements are often too little considered. I hope you will continue the discussion of such, and carry it into somewhat narrower fields, also. To cite but one instance, you might discuss the intangible advantages, if there be any, of public or private ownership and operation of road services, including those of pipes and wires. It seems certain that continued competition is impracticable there—in gas and telephones to say the least. Maybe we should obtain a greater aggregate of adventure, of responsibility, of self-reliance, and of education by the consequences of our own mistakes, by conducting telephones and gas plants through our Governments than by having regulated corporations as scapegoats for real or imaginary faults. Maybe the election of governments to conduct these services is the nearest available counterpart, in the field of monopoly, of the citizen's private choice in the field of competition—his choice of his own carpenter, grocer, and shoe manufacturer. I am not arguing for immediate, or even ultimate, public ownership and operation, I am only suggesting a question for your able pen.

J. DE L. VERPLANCK

Walbrook, Md., January 23

How the Soviet Came to a Russian Village

ALTHOUGH the story of the origin of the Soviet in Russia as a governmental institution has been frequently set forth, there still remains considerable confusion in America in regard to it. In some quarters, especially in those which have swallowed without question the tales of Col. Raymond Robins and other purveyors of misinformation, there still persists the false idea that the Soviet is a natural Russian political institution that had its origin in the peasant commune. Upon this baseless assumption there has been built up the whole fiction of the Soviet system as a democratic representative form of government, for the time being in possession of the Bolsheviki, a political party.

So many false conclusions with reference to the Russian problems have been drawn from this erroneous assumption that it is important to make clear, first, that the Soviet, in the present use of the term, originated in 1905 in the self-appointed workingmen's committees that ran the affairs of Petrograd and Moscow during the short period of proletariat control; secondly, that following this example, in the Revolution of March, 1917, Soviets were again instituted by the workingmen and similarly by the soldiers, but that these were not regarded at that time as governing bodies but as councils to protect the interests of their clients before the Provisional Government; and thirdly, that the Soviets were later extended to the peasants, who had never before known of such an institution.

Kerensky and his Government fostered this extension of the Soviet system among the peasants to a certain extent as a means of "deepening the Revolution," that is, with the idea of preventing counter-revolution, and also for the purpose of creating through the peasants a counterpoise to the workingmen's and soldiers' Soviets. But the manner in which the Bolsheviks completed this work of bringing the Soviets to the peasant villages throws still greater light upon the character of this institution and its relation to Russian life. A view of this is sufficient to show how unjustifiable is the assumption that the Soviet is a natural democratic peasant institution, the assumption from which so many false conclusions have been drawn. An eyewitness account of a typical example of the institution of a Soviet in a Russian village will give a clearer picture of conditions in Russia than volumes of discussion based upon the so-called Soviet Constitution and the tales of Bolshevist apologists. The following is such an authentic description with reference to a village in the Province of Perm:

The village of Karagai is situated in the Okhansk district of the Province of Perm. Like most North Russian villages, Karagai consists of a few very wide streets, unpaved, and never cleaned, frightfully muddy in wet weather and horribly dusty in dry weather. It consists of 140 such homesteads, besides a few shops, a smithy, a carpenter's workshop, a church, a school, and a little hospital that served a tract of country nearly as big as Wales.

In the middle of June, 1918, a company of about 150 of the Workmen's and Peasants' Red Army came to this village. The company was composed of Russians, Moldavians, Austrians, and Chinamen; in its ranks were sailors and soldiers who, after attempting to "fraternize" with the Germans, had sought safety in flight; prisoners-of-war who did not wish to return to their native countries; workingmen who had found looting more to their taste than working, and foreign adventurers who had joined in hopes of getting something for nothing. Every man was armed with rifle, bayonet, revolver, and bombs; some carried swords in addition, and the company possessed a machine-gun.

This motley company streamed into the village in requisitioned country carts or mounted upon requisitioned peasants' horses, and billeted themselves upon the inhabitants.

They then sent out into all the neighboring hamlets a verbal notice to all adult males to attend a mass-meeting at Karagai on the following day, after which they ate and drank—especially the latter—most liberally at the expense of the villagers; and, having posted sentries, went to sleep.

Early the next morning they set up their machine-gun on a bit of rising ground that dominated the village green, and posted themselves round the green, in the middle of which was a modest little monument commemorating the liberation of the serfs by the Emperor Alexander II. This they demolished. When the men of the village and surrounding hamlets had assembled to the number of 1,000 or perhaps 1,500, the meeting was opened. The three Commissars, who were the leaders of this company of the Workmen's and Peasants' Red Army, made speeches. These were followed by others of the company, each of whom repeated what his predecessor had said, though he used the high-sounding and stereotyped phrases in a different order, or laid more emphasis than another had done upon some particular catchword. If any of the peasants attempted to speak, he was promptly cautioned to hold his tongue, to listen and learn.

As soon as these speeches were ended, voting was ordered. Every free citizen of the "Russian Federated Soviet Republic" was to record his vote. whether he wished to or not. A line of soldiers was formed across the village green. The peasants were told that to go to this side of the line was to vote for Bolshevism, while to go to that side of it was to vote against Bolshevism.

Two peasants promptly moved to that side of the line, declaring they would not vote for those who denied them the right of expressing their opinions.

At this a halt was called, and these two men were at once arrested as enemies of the People and shot. Their yet quivering bodies were tumbled into a hastily-dug shallow hole, and then "voting" was resumed, with the result that the whole adult male population of the district recorded a unanimous vote for the Bolshevists, as was some time later duly made known in Bolshevist newspapers, both in the capital of that province and in Petrograd.

Bolshevist rule and authority having been established at Karagai in such tragic manner, the now thoroughly cowed peasants were ordered to elect certain committees for the proper control of all local affairs. The elections took place under the supervision of the Provincial Committee, as the three Commissars called themselves, and under the rifles of the rabble that supported it. There was no pretense of anything like free expression of opinion nor of ballot.

In moody silence the peasants cast their votes for whoever seemed to find most favor in the eyes of the gang of armed ruffians who stood around them on the village green, where the two luckless anti-Bolshevists had been so summarily shot and buried.

If the Bolshevists disapproved of a candidate they simply disallowed his candidature. If any elected man failed to meet with their approbation they cancelled his return and ordered a new "election." In this way was secured a return of the most disreputable and unprincipled men of the neighborhood.

The committees thus elected were many in number and various in function. There was the Committee of War, the Committee of Public Education, the Committee of Sanitation and Public Health, the Committee of the Poor, the Committee of Land, the Committee of Forests and Natural Resources, and many others. Their name was legion, so to speak, and wherever one turned or whatever one wished to do one was confronted by some committee.

Supreme power was vested in the Executive Committee, or "Ispolkom," whose business it was to examine the decisions of all other committees and to allow or disallow their measures. The "Ispolkom" was vested with the power of life and death over all persons residing within, or traveling through, its district. Its powers were boundless within its district, and, as the result showed, were most arbitrarily wielded. Its members always went about armed.

If at any time a committeeman became obnoxious to the "Ispolkom," he was at once removed and another man was appointed in his place. Thus in the course of a few weeks all these committees became highly paid tools in the hands of the "Ispolkom." The money for the salaries was raised by "contributions."

Committeemen, who were perfectly illiterate, received 250 and 300 rubles a month. The village postmaster, who had formerly been an elementary school teacher, became president and secretary of several committees and drew no less than 3,000 rubles per month. The president of the Committee of Public Education was utterly illiterate, unacquainted even with the letters of the alphabet. Committeemen received, in addition to salary, a monthly allowance for traveling expenses. This allowance they pocketed, with the knowledge and approval of the "Ispolkom," and compelled those of their fellow-villagers who were not members of the committee to drive them about the country free of charge.

As soon as all these committees had been elected and their powers and duties explained to them a local Soviet, consisting of representatives of all the committees, was formed.

From this it will be readily seen why the mass of the Russian peasants hate and detest Bolshevik rule, while at the same time they are unable to throw it off. Hundreds of insurrections have taken place all over Russia, only to end in ruthless repression and fearful torture and bloodshed. It is under this tyranny that the Russian people are still crouching and it is no wonder that there has resulted an animosity between the country districts and cities.

The Unreconstructed Professor

A GREAT deal has been said and written of late on the professor, not a little of it professor-contributed. We read of his meagre salary in these days of luxurious spenders, of labor barons, and factory ritters. We read of ice-wagon drivers in Chicago who purchase sables and diamonds, and contrast with them the sad fate of those whose sole traffic is in learning. So far has this plea for financial justice to the professor gone that many who once gloried in the robe of dignity of the learned profession which sent out no monthly statements now feel that it is no more than a shred upon which the veriest of muckraking journalists may wipe their pens.

And not a little, too, has been said and written concerning the duty of the professor in the present crisis to inculcate in his classes the proper tenets of "Americanism," whatever that term may denote; to promote "patriotism," though it would be difficult to find fifty senators who could give fewer than fifty answers as to the demands patriotism now makes upon us; and to combat the threatened orgies of militant soviets, though, here again, just what form this danger is now assuming is not a little matter of doubt—at least to some college professors.

Indeed and of a truth the college professor, like the dog, has his day; and it has come to him in the press, in the forum, and even on the street. He is pitied for his unpretentious income, he is exhorted to play the man right valiantly, for upon him, he is assured, rests the future of the country. But all this unaccustomed publicity has made him nervous and self-conscious; for the first time in his life he is playing in the spotlight, and like an unschooled girl he shrinks from the glare.

There is something paradoxical in the position of the average college professor. The new position in which he is finding himself causes not a little searching of soul. He envies his colleague in the technical and professional schools, whose work is so clearly cut out for him that a wayfaring man, though a fool, can not err therein. The efficiency of a professor of surgery may be gauged to a nicety by even a layman by the skill with which his students amputate a limb or perform a delicate laparotomy; the professor of engineering can be judged at a glance by the bridges or aqueducts of his classes; even a professor of law may be seen winning immortality for himself by the successful pleading of his horde of young lawyers. "By their fruits shall ye know them," for here the sequence of seed and fruit is close and unmistakable. But how shall we judge the efficiency of a professor of Ancient Languages or of History? People are demanding that the graduates of our colleges be trained for their less easily gauged efficiency as citizens; and the professor of Latin and the public, too, are asking, What connection is there between a mastery of the classics and "one hundred per cent. Americanism," or how can a careful study of Mediæval History so bulwark the country that in these days of peace and during the next war the eyes of the Government will not need the club of the act restraining malcontents and Red Radicals or the spectacles of an Espionage Act? There is a pertinency in these questions; but this very pertinency does not make the college professor any the more confident or his state of mind any less paradoxical.

Nor is his confidence in himself or his profession restored by the blare of drums and trumpets now accompanying the "drives" the country over to raise millions of dollars to cushion the hard academic chairs. The fact that the public is gladly contributing to the cause is to him an argument, either that people still blindly trust in the efficacy of an academic training to citizenship, or that they have so acquired the "drive" habit that they would pour out their money for any cause from simplified spelling to starched linen for the South Sea Islanders. While on general principles he believes that his salary should enable him to buy an automobile, like his brick-laying or coal-mining neighbor, he yet wonders if, like his neighbor, he has an adequate and tangible quid pro quo to offer in exchange.

Nor is he helped in the hours of his agonized musings by the attitude of his classes toward him or toward his work. It might have been expected, after the nervous tension of the war and the cry of increasing efficiency, that young collegians would take up the cry and apply their hearts with more energy to acquiring wisdom. Even the professor of Greek would not have been disappointed if his class had at least discovered a positive content in Xenophon or Plato and have agonized a little over the Greek aorist. But as a whole the collegian still remains much as he was before war was declared. There is the same whole-souled abandon to athletics and the social amenities of "college life," and a tacit understanding, in which the professor has almost come to participate, that studies, at least of an untechnical kind, are more or less an irrelevant reason for bringing so many congenial young souls together. They take up some time, are a source of occasional annoyances, to be sure, but parents and public must be propitiated by a small sacrifice on the altar of learning.

For the young of our colleges are only to the slightest degree moved by the forces that are aroused to-day. It is a curious phenomenon that in democratic America the young men and young women of our colleges and universities should be the last to feel the potency of the influences that so charge our social and political atmosphere. Though in Europe the ideas that are threatening a general revolution, that have accomplished more than one revolution, originated with the youth of the universities; here it is the very youth of the universities who are practically immune to the contagion. They at least accept life as it was, or as it is, confident and unthinking, optimists without a philosophical creed. How can a college professor take his work seriously when even his classes can not regard his work except as an irrelevant eddy on life's swiftly moving stream?

It might seem to serve to restore the slipping confidence of college professors, to quote for them Milton's famous sonnet, "They also serve who only stand and wait." But it is a little paradoxical to be told to wait, and in the same breath to have added that the nation looks to these same professors for a new race of citizens "one hundred per cent. American."

* * * * * *

The old ideals of learning perhaps were never more succinctly worded than by Ben Jonson—"learning, well used, can instruct to good life, inform manners, and no less persuade and lead men." And this he wrote in times not so different from our own, a day of reconstruction, when political and religious radicalism and anarchy were threatening the foundations of established society. Then, as now, there was alternate trust in and revolt from the established universities; witness Milton's effort to start a practical school wherein everything was to be taught from Syriac to horsemanship and farming, in order that all graduates might have "an universal insight into things." It is curious that then, as now, the chief emphasis was laid upon a study of political institutions, "to know the beginning, end, and reasons of political societies, that they may not, in a dangerous fit of the commonwealth, be such poor, shaken, uncertain reeds, of such a tottering conscience as many of our great councillors have lately shown themselves, but steadfast pillars of the state." This was not written of our Senate after the political fiascos of 1919, but in 1644; and it is in the same pamphlet that Milton describes the usual curriculum for students in even universities as an "asinine feast of sow-thistles and brambles which is commonly set before them as all the food and entertainment of their tenderest and most docile age."

The truth is that the state of mind of the average college professor to-day has abundant analogies in the history of every social and political crisis. The moment men's minds are brought sharply against serious problems of reconstruction, with the threat of possible revolution in the offing, they turn at once to education as the sovereign remedy or inoculation against disaster. And it is because he feels the insistent demand of the many that such liberal education as is saved to-day be turned to the practical uses of citizenship and "Americanization," that the professor's heart is heavy with misgiving; for his realm is all knowledge, and his heart recoils at the difficulty, nay, the impossibility of turning the imparting of knowledge, the instruction to good life, and the enforcing of manners, into a propaganda.

Not that the college professor, in his desire to distinguish between the service of God and the service of Mammon, would classify the attempt to twist courses in History or Political Science into courses in Patriotism as a species of devil worship—far from it; but any such attempt at best would perform only a left-hand service to truth. Scientific accuracy, truth, right, and logical judgments based upon correctly drawn inferences, these are the goals of all real scholarship. If in the study of history and political institutions there comes to the student a pride in the stability, the justice, the adaptability of the American Constitution and the American people, it is well and good, and a certain rational basis for a scholarly patriotism has been soundly laid. And it is undoubtedly true that many instructors have, by thoroughly scientific approaches, drawn classes to appreciate to the utmost the virtues and responsibilities of American citizenship. But the results have been achieved as a by-product. One is not inspired to patriotism merely by studying constitutional law or the economics of American industry, though both are essential to a scholarly appreciation of the duties of American citizenship. The truth is that patriotism, Americanization, citizenship, are delicate terms with a thousand of emotional connotations. Though potent, they are as undefinable as the laws of filial affection and filial dutifulness. And it is precisely because into the rational process of imparting knowledge and grounding judgment there have been thrust these emotional and poetic aims that the average professor stands before his task amazed and mightily perplexed.

The easiest and, perhaps, after all, the most logical way out of the difficulty is to "saw wood," to keep the old and traditional ideals of a liberal culture well to the front. For even the Greek aorist, though now sadly neglected, has its use in unlocking the human nature in Sophocles and Plato; and this, rightly handled, will throw floods of light upon our problems of political and social unrest to-day. It will be folly in these treacherous times to forget that the study of the past is significant only as a light for the study of the present—to this extent all liberal culture in the humanities is essentially of the utmost practical value. And if the college professor, through his liberal studies, can see and understand the present, the problem of reconstruction in education ought once for all to be solved; or perhaps, better, there would be no problem of reconstruction in education to solve. Perhaps in this last sentence lies the hint for the solution of all the college professors' perplexities. Perhaps by this hint we may come to that education which is "complete and generous," and will "fit a man to perform justly, skillfully, and magnanimously all the offices, both private and public, of peace and war." We have been tested successfully in war—the harder test is now upon us.

PHILO M. BUCK, JR.

Book Reviews

A Carthaginian Peace?

THE ECONOMIC CONSEQUENCES OF THE PEACE. By J. M. Keynes. New York: Harcourt, Brace and Howe.

NO book since the armistice has produced an effect comparable to that which has resulted from the publication of Mr. Keynes's volume. Many, and among them persons high in authority in the political and economic world, regard it as dealing a staggering blow to the Treaty of Versailles, and confidently predict that the author's searching analysis and clear-cut deductions will force a thorough and basic revision of that all-important document.

The experience and position of Mr. Keynes give weight to his analysis and deductions. He is a comparatively young man, only thirty-seven years of age. He is a Fellow of King's College, Cambridge, and a C. B. For the past fourteen years he has been connected with the British civil service, first in the India Office and later in the Treasury. During the war he was in charge of the British financial relations with the Allied Powers, and in this connection accompanied Lord Reading to Washington in 1917 as financial adviser. At the Peace Conference, he was the chief representative of the British Treasury and a member of the Supreme Economic Council. While his name has not hitherto been well known to the general public, he is not a stranger to the leading financiers, nor to those who follow current writings on economic subjects.

In estimating the value of the present sensational arraignment of the work of the Peace Council, it must be borne in mind that Mr. Keynes is a left-wing Liberal, and by nature has a little of that slant of mind which we are accustomed in America to associate with the theoretical humanitarianism and internationalism of the New Republic school. It is not to be inferred that this influences the technical accuracy of his expert work in the field of economics. Here he has his feet firmly on the ground, even though the conclusions he draws from the figures that he presents may be questionable. On the other hand, when he deals with political and social problems, he is less certain of his ground and displays an attitude of mind indicative of the slant above referred to.

By way of introduction he makes a rapid survey of the general economic situation of Europe before the war, and lays especial emphasis upon the delicate balancing of the economic interdependence upon which the existence of Europe's millions depended. In most of this he travels well-beaten paths, for few people have failed to realize the significance of the industrial development that changed whole peoples from self-contained units, able to feed themselves from their own agricultural production, into cogs in a complicated machine that absorbed imported raw materials and in turn distributed manufactured articles at a margin that provided foodstuffs from abroad. To this he adds some interesting comments as to the relation of the psychology of society to the accumulation of immense amounts of fixed capital, that capital which played a predominant part in the organization and operation of the economic machine itself. He is not alone in calling attention to the fact that it was the inequality of the distribution of wealth and the tendency of the rich to save the acquisitions of their new wealth, instead of spending them on their own enjoyments, that made possible the building up of the great accumulations of capital which distinguish our present age. It is his conclusion, however, that the war has disclosed to all the possibility of consumption and to many the vanity of abstinence. From this he deduces further the inevitability of revolutionary changes in the capitalistic system and that the war settlement must take these into account if civilization is to preserve its gains. From this standpoint he finds that the Treaty of Versailles is not only immoral, in that it violated the conditions upon which the armistice was entered into, but destructive, in that its execution would preclude the restoration of healthy economic life.

Mr. Keynes's account of the interplay of ideas and personalities in the Peace Conference is full of interest, and, on the whole it only tends to confirm judgments already formed on this side of the Atlantic. He pictures M. Clemenceau as the disillusioned and even cynical realist who devoted all the force of his strong personality to safeguarding the future of France by the crippling of her perennial adversary. Bismarckian in his estimate of men and national interests, he had no faith in the possibility of the moral reformation of the Germans or in a new and altruistic world order. Even on this basis, however, his vision was limited by his ignorance of European affairs outside his own country. A similar ignorance handicapped Lloyd George, who furthermore placed the exigencies of domestic politics ahead of considerations of international welfare. Indeed, the author attributes what he terms the unjustifiable reparation exactions, as well as the demands for the punishment of those responsible for atrocities, to the necessity of putting more "ginger" into Lloyd George's Parliamentary campaign in December, 1918. Unwarranted promises had to be made to stimulate support for the Coalition party.

The author's estimate of President Wilson and his part in the Peace Conference is an illuminating feature of the book. To begin with, he lays emphasis upon the prestige of moral leadership with which the President came to Europe, a leadership, however, concerning which Mr. Keynes was somewhat disillusioned after coming into personal contact with Mr. Wilson. He sized up the President as a man who was not a hero or a prophet, not even a philosopher, but generously intentioned, with many of the weaknesses of human beings, and lacking that dominating intellectual equipment which would have been necessary to cope with the subtle and strong personalities that he had to face in the Council. He analyzed him at first glance as a man whose temperament was not that of the student or the scholar and who had not much even of that culture of the world which marked Clemenceau and Balfour. He found the President insensitive to his surroundings even in the external sense; incapable of judging character, motive, and subconscious impulse in the men with whom he was dealing. The clue to his character Mr. Keynes discovered in a temperament and habit of thought which were theological rather than intellectual, and which were further handicapped by a surprising lack of information in regard to European conditions, and in a mind that was slow and unadaptable. His adversaries, on the other hand, realized that their chief problem was to convince the President that all the settlements they desired, no matter how selfish and brutal, were in accord with the President's sentimental and moral concepts as expressed in his Fourteen Points and his subsequent addresses. How well they succeeded in this was shown by the difficulty which they found in changing the President on some of the points on which they had previously convinced him. As Mr. Keynes expresses it:

> To his horror, Mr. Lloyd George, desiring at the last moment all the moderation he dared, discovered that he could not in five days persuade the President in error in what it had taken five months to prove to him to be just and right. After all, it was harder to de-bamboozle this old Presbyterian than it had been to bamboozle him; for the former involved his belief in and respect for himself. Thus, in the last act the President stood for stubbornness and a refusal of conciliations.

The author feels that the Treaty of Versailles in its exactions is dishonorable in that it fails to conform with the conditions undertaken with Germany at the signing of the Armistice, namely, that it should be based upon the Fourteen Points and the subsequent addresses of the President. For this point of view Mr. Keynes has much to justify him, though it should also be pointed out that he fails to take account of the vagueness and the manifest inapplicability of the code embodied in Mr. Wilson's generalizations. After all, no statesman versed in the practical affairs concerned in a general European settlement could take these sweeping enouncements of purpose as a definitive practical formula.

The heaviest artillery of the book bears on the subject of reparations. This is discussed in almost every possible aspect, and the presentation is undeniably powerful. Upon one point, which involves no intricacy, the author's emphasis, however great, is no greater than the case demands. He brings out with startling impressiveness what every man of sense must recognize, even without the aid of the specific arguments he marshals, the absolute necessity of giving Germany a genuine chance to restore her producing power and her commercial activity. It is preposterous to ask her to pay heavy indemnities, in addition to shouldering the inevitably heavy burden of recreating normal conditions, and at the same time cut her off from the requisite access to raw materials and to the opportunities of international trade. On this point at least, all reasonable men should be in agreement.

It is on the subject of the amount of the reparations that there is grave reason to doubt the soundness of Mr. Keynes's view. The subject naturally raises three questions. The first of these is, What is the total amount of Germany's obligation under the terms of the Treaty, (a) as actually drawn, (b) as it should have been drawn according to the armistice agreement? In Mr. Keynes's judgment the amount assessed against Germany in the actual Treaty will prove to be about 40 billions of dollars, while the extreme limit of what a proper interpretation of the armistice agreement would have allowed is 15 billions, 10 billions being his own estimate for the latter sum. The basis of his computation is, of course, too complex to enter into here; and the point is not of the first importance for practical purposes. The second question is whether a definite sum, and this a sum not greater than what Germany might reasonably be expected to pay, should not have been fixed in the Treaty as the limit of her obligation. On this point we are emphatically in agreement with Mr. Keynes's opinion. It is, however, to the third question that Mr. Keynes devotes the most elaborate and searching inquiry—the question how much Germany will find herself able to pay; and it is upon this question that, in spite of his impressive marshaling of facts and figures, we see very strong reason to doubt the correctness of his conclusion.

To justify this doubt it is not necessary to pick flaws in Mr. Keynes's figures or statements of fact, although many detailed criticisms might be advanced. The objection we have chiefly in mind is a very simple one. However great the force of the particular items adduced by Mr. Keynes—the apparent limitations of Germany's producing power, the gravity of the new difficulties under which she labors, the diminution of her man-power through the casualties of the war, the obstacles which her rivals are likely to put in the way of the extension of her trade, etc.—however impressive these items are, the sharpest test of his argument relates to what he says about the limits of Germany's "surplus productivity"; which he estimates on the basis of what it was before the war, and brings down to the small sum of $500,000,000 by various considerations into whose validity we need not inquire. In regard to those other items, shrewd men will recognize that there are all sorts of unknown possibilities of development in a great number of particular industries which may upset the figures; but most men feel that there is a kind of fatal finality about "surplus productivity." But by "surplus productivity" is meant the annual excess of production over consumption; and this can be increased by reduction in the amount consumed as well as by increase in the amount produced. Mr. Keynes does not overlook this point altogether; but he gives it merely a sidelong glance, and the few words he devotes to it involve a fundamental error. He assumes that any encroachment beyond the line of "surplus productivity" would necessarily mean a "lowering of the standard of life and comfort." But in normal times this is by no means the case. The surplus productivity of Germany before the war, estimated at upwards of two billions of dollars, was a surplus of production over an amount of consumption which included a vast quantity of luxuries; and the surplus could have been increased very much by diminishing the consumption of those luxuries. The same thing will presumably be true in Germany again, not many years hence. And under present-day practice in taxation, hundreds of millions of dollars might annually be taken for the payment of indemnities with no other effect than the cutting down of expenditure on luxuries, and, therefore, with no appreciable lowering of the standard of living for the masses. In fact, the "surplus productivity" argument, when examined, has very little force. Accordingly, while Mr. Keynes is unquestionably right in saying that the 30 or 40 billion dollars which constitutes the total of Germany's obligations contemplated in the treaty is beyond her ability to pay, we do not find that he has made out a case as to her inability to meet the requirements of interest and sinking fund on the 15 billion dollars which is all that is definitely imposed upon her.

Before leaving this part of the book, we can not forbear to draw attention to a point which seems to us to have an important bearing upon the trustworthiness of Mr. Keynes as a guide in these high matters. The settlement which he thinks ought to have been made, and which he formally proposes as a substitute for the actual one is as follows (p. 260):

(1) The amount of the payment to be made by Germany in respect of reparation and the cost of the armies of occupation might be fixed at $10,000,000,000.

(2) The surrender of merchant ships and submarine cables under the Treaty, of war material under the armistice, of State property in ceded territory, of claims against such territory in respect of public debt, and of Germany's claims against her former Allies should be reckoned as worth the lump sum of $2,500,000,000 without any attempt being made to evaluate them item by item.

(3) The balance of $7,500,000,000 should not carry interest pending its payment, and should be paid by Germany in thirty annual instalments of $250,000,000, beginning in 1923.

We have no quarrel with Mr. Keynes for thinking—whether he be right or wrong—that this would, for one reason or another, be a wise settlement. But we do not see how it is possible for any man of training, not to speak of an expert economist such as he is, to represent $2,500,000,000 in ships, etc., plus thirty annual payments of $250,000,000 each, as constituting a total of $10,000,000,000. This is not the first place where he mentions this total. At page 135, for example, he says that "it would have been a wise and just act to have asked the German Government at the peace negotiations to agree to a sum of $10,000,000,000 in final settlement without further examination of particulars." Thirty annual payments of $250,000,000 have a present value, not of $7,500,000,000, but of $3,850,000,000 (interest being reckoned at five per cent.). If it is legitimate to spread the total over thirty years, it is legitimate to spread it over a hundred; but the present value of those hundred payments would be only a shade more than $1,500,000,000. Of course no one knows this better than Mr. Keynes; and only an extreme bias in favor of the result he desired could possibly have led him to make a statement which, while misleading no competent person, was calculated to make a superficial impression that the figure he was proposing ran high into the billions.

When Mr. Keynes concludes his arraignment of the injustice and impracticability of the Treaty in its reparation exactions, and his warning as to the menace which it presents for the future of European civilization, he turns in a final chapter to the subject of remedies. His suggestions are four: The revision of the Treaty; the cancellation of inter-Ally indebtedness; an international loan and the reform of the currency; and the opening of new relations with Russia. There can be little doubt that changes and revisions in the Treaty will be necessary and that they will be made with greater ease as war passions are mollified by time, and the desperate economic situation in Central Europe insistently demands treatment. The proposal to cancel inter-Allied war indebtedness, desirable as that might be, seems scarcely within the bounds of practical politics in this imperfect world of ours. One can scarcely see members of Congress in Washington proposing to abrogate ten billions of war loans. A great international loan will probably be found necessary, and may be engineered if the leading financiers and statesmen of the world can agree upon the conditions of making it and of utilizing it. The manner in which he proposes the fourth of his remedies, the opening of Russia, shows again the slant of mind earlier referred to. That the resources in food and raw materials which Russia can furnish to Europe are indispensable to European reconstruction is too well known to require discussion. But such production and exportation, in the presence of the existing Bolshevik régime in Russia, are not within the bounds of possibility. Forces are working within Russia towards the overthrow of this impossible system. How soon they will achieve success we do not know, but it is out of the question to base any hopes upon the solution of the difficulties of Europe from the direction of Russia until this eventuates. That Germans must have an opportunity to participate in the development of Russian resources goes without saying. This is a matter which is beyond the control of the Allied Powers or the Reparation Commission. In fact, the restoration of normal conditions in Europe waits on the solution of the Russian problem, and Mr. Keynes's inclusion of this in his list of remedies is based on fact, even though his interpretation may be subject to serious criticism.

Education in a Democracy

A Lover of the Chair. By Sherlock Bronson Gass. Boston: Marshall Jones Company.

MR. GASS turns over from many angles the leading problems of education in a democracy, and the wider problem of democracy itself. The matter is generally cast in dialogues, with the disillusioned scholar described in the title as arbitrator. Despite a certain crabbedness and inflexibility of literary form, the book is a notable one. It is thought through, and has flights of grave eloquence. As a survey and estimate of modern society, as offering a tenacious criticism which is ever tinged with human sympathy, the book is a true landmark. On the side of education the author has no difficulty in showing that the present lurch towards vocational training in the public schools is really not democratic at all. It assumes that a child is to be fitted for a place in which he shall stay—an aristocratic assumption. Democratic training would look towards stimulating the individual to wisdom and magnanimity, and thus towards producing an ever more enlightened and generous majority opinion. Democracy can remain valid only on condition of an unsparing criticism of its ideas and processes, and withal on condition that something of private convenience and prosperity shall be sacrificed to the right conduct of public interests. Without willingness to forego obvious utilities, democracy perishes, for "Democracy is at bottom only a faith in the nobility of the people."

At this point enter the economic humanitarian. Mr. Gass hits him off in his numerous species with telling humor. Your humanitarian preaches not sacrifice, but material prosperity for the unfortunate. The common denominator is social sympathy. Assure people that they are abused, impute merit to them for this cause, promise them what they want—such is the nearest approach to a programme. This sort of socialism is merely an inverted form of aristocracy. There is no faith in the people, and no method of training them politically. Somebody is to know what is good for them, and these somebodies, having no common idea, all differ. Moreover, social compunction is often really a tribute to Mammon.

Every age has its own way of feeling the raw edge of life, and this is our way. It's a matter of reactions. When tyranny's the thing the poets climb down and are shocked and join the revolution. There's the Eighteenth Century in France. When it's hardened tradition and sophistication, when convention, title, and rank are in the saddle, it's neglected individuality and merit that cry out: "There's the Eighteenth Century in England." And now wealth's the thing, and poverty fills us with horror.

The book closes with an autobiographical fragment which is its best literary feature and has the advantage of bringing the various problems involved to a moral focus. We recall nothing that reveals so fully the aimlessness of the modern college, caught between vocationalism and fading ideals of humane education, as the record of the author's college days. His life, ironically that of a college professor, soon resolves itself into the old but ever urgent dilemma between the active and contemplative life. He gives the former a fair trial in settlement work, and nearly succumbs to its warm appeal. Finally, he withdraws to his chair, at last without irony. Humanitarian activity has built up no standards and furnished no ideas. He will henceforth devote himself to the great intangibles upon which, after all, civilization rests.

> For in realizing that the spiritual structure, the humanizing product of men's thought and wisdom, kept its tenuous life so precariously, and had its life at all only in men's minds, he saw how supreme was the value of those men who shut themselves—perforce, to-day, alas—aloof from the world, mastered the records of the past, wrote their new volumes, taught, or perhaps merely preserved by their example the tradition of the love of learning.

Amid a thousand hustling and professionally hopeful books on education and politics this one, with its quiet and whimsical seriousness, is rather likely to be overlooked. To overlook it, however, is a serious reader's loss.

Between Worlds

Michael Forth. By Mary Johnston. New York: Harper and Brothers.

Outland. By Mary Austin. New York: Boni and Liveright.

WHAT is "the truth about" Miss Johnston? Is she too deep for us, or has she a showy opalescence of surface that baffles the eye? Her work appears to have three chief phases. There were her early costume romances, "To Have and To Hold," "Audrey," and so on which launched her on the way to what looked like a safe popularity. They had the right blend of colorful phrase, hectic emotion, and red-blooded action (perhaps that label was still to appear); and their none too unconscious "literary" touch of style did them no harm with the audience of that day, which had not yet learned on the highest authority, as we have, to despise style. Miss Johnston seemed to have a sure thing, and perhaps some critics, after the notorious habit of their envious tribe, twitted her on the fact. At all events, she soon withdrew from it into regions where she was safe enough from the approval of the vulgar populace. Her second phase was the heavy-historical, in which she entreated with indubitable zeal and ingenuity, but quite dubitable effect, certain dramatic world-episodes. Why, when they were so earnestly conceived and zealously executed, did not these books get hold of us more? Why, especially, did the two Civil War novels, "The Long Roll" and "Cease Firing," fall so dull and flat upon our consciousness? Here, surely, in these responsible and dignified efforts to interpret the unforgotten tragedy, the writer's serious and somewhat portentous manner might justify itself. A Southerner, the kinswoman of a great Southern general, she might reveal the 'sixties as they had not been revealed before. But these books were heavy, turgid, overstrained—dull. One wearied of their insistent pressure upon the nerves and the emotions. At best, one "waded" through these carefully, even prayerfully written records. There was no pleasure in them to atone for their interminable high flown yet melancholy drone.

The third phase set in some years since, and is still "on": a mystical rhapsodic phase which interprets the world in terms of some circumambient and fluid superworld which knows not time or space or stability, but unites all men and all things in a kind of golden sempiternal flux. Life is continuous; the soul of our grandam has more or less its will of us. We live many lives in the flesh; we toddle, in each new existence, down a predestined and vaguely familiar path. If the hopeful reader delve patiently enough in "Michael Forth" he may unearth the not very satisfactory love-story of two young Southerners of our own day, a Michael and his Miriam. They are ancient mates, we gather, and seem a good deal more excited in chasing back their intimations of a joint immortality than in living and loving through the incidental present. We savor a sort of psychical joke when Miriam dies—it matters so little to their real union. A joke on death or, perhaps, on the misguided myriads who are so dull as to be depressed by death. Michael does admit that her departure has done something to him: "The 'I' posited itself in a realm somewhat nearer to the all. It tented there." The old campground! . . . "Miriam was there, profoundly, deeply, truly there." Not only profoundly, but deeply. . . . I have no wish to mock at this evidently earnest dreamer. But it is fair and friendly to caution her that there is an accent of psychic hysteria about all of her recent work. Perhaps the only safe way to be a Swami is to keep one's tongue firmly in one's cheek, or at least to be able to laugh at those who overdo the ecstatic. If Miss Johnston is capable of laughter, there is nothing in her books to show it: the utmost one might postulate would be a pale and trembling smile, directed patiently yet encouragingly towards the eternal heavens. Page after page here, chapter after chapter of supra-liminal prophecy, dim and continuous: yes, a word of warning is in order that this way lies, if not madness, at least a form of mental disintegration. One paragraph may be quoted as a fair sample of the oracle's utterance:

> The sea ran round the world. The fluid air was not here nor there, it flowed far and near. . . . I sat upon the deck of the Zeus and listened to Ransome the traveler—but also I was away from this—all around and all through. . . . Flowing mind that was also Ransome's mind, as it was Miriam's mind, and others and others in incalculable numbers—the host of mind. . . . Strong was the rapture! Thought there had great voice—God voice. It sank away, but its shadow, its echo, lingering, clothed itself in words from an ancient dialogue between man and man—between the individual and the Generic Consciousness.

One may confess an unregenerate impulse, when people talk or write like this, to make the specification "the Virginian" did on a famous occasion:

"When you say that, smile!"

Mrs. Austin's "Outland" is a less pretentious and more intelligible adventure between worlds: a fantasy vividly conceived and gracefully and consistently developed. The idea seems familiar enough, yet we are able to recall nothing quite like it. Algernon Blackwood and others have told tales of contact between modern men and the living gods of nature, Pan or some lesser one. Another British novelist (John Buchan, was it?) has recently told a striking story of the survival of a mysterious race among the far mountains of Scotland who are supposed to be a remnant of the ancient Picts, living in remote fastnesses of the hills and now and then wreaking their malice upon the luckless shepherds or travelers through that ill-omened region. This is in a way analogous to Mrs. Austin's idea, since her "Outliers" also represent the survival of a primitive race; but in her narrative the element of horror, usually dominant in this general order of fiction, has almost no place. And her primal folk are given no historic name or habitat. The scene happens to be California, in a stretch of wooded country, not many hours' journey from city or sea or fashionable resort. The man is a literal-minded professor in a nearby university; the woman a teacher who has retired to her lodge in the chosen (and accessible) wilderness in order to be an author at leisure. The man is the woman's staid and unimpassioned suitor. He thinks they ought to marry because they are good companions and because they are not in love. She can not marry him on those terms; nor can she be happy without him. She can not write, he will not woo, and matters are at a deadlock when a dim trail into the wood leads the woman among a strange, though not unfriendly, folk. The man blunders after her, and the rest of the story, which shall not be butchered in any sentence or two of abstract, deals with their adventures among this people of primitive and endearing character; and with what they learn of themselves through that experience. It is the kind of story which can not be told with any amount of merely mechanical ingenuity and be anything less than offensive; Mrs. Austin has felt and conveyed the charm of a delicate and original fancy.

H. W. BOYNTON

The Art of the Greek Ceramists

A HANDBOOK OF GREEK VASE PAINTING. By Mary A. B. Herford. Manchester University Press. New York: Longmans, Green & Co.

MISS HERFORD tells us that in this brief account of the Greek ceramists and their art she aimed to produce a book primarily for "non-specialist" readers, and also one that might prove useful to students as an introduction to more technical works or to the study of other branches of Greek art. A double purpose of this kind is admittedly difficult to carry out. There is always danger of falling between two stools and satisfying neither group of readers; and this danger Miss Herford has not entirely escaped. Her earlier chapters, on the potter and his craft, the shapes and the uses of Greek vases, will hardly make a strong appeal to the general reader, especially the decidedly technical distinctions between the different varieties of amphoræ, hydriæ, and other forms. The "non-specialist" is likely to be somewhat upset when, after working through this dry material, he finds in later pages references to a number of less common shapes which are not included in the chapter on forms, and are either not described at all or only inadequately described in the connections in which they appear. One wonders, too, whether the general reader will readily catch the meaning of various undefined technical terms, such as "Kleinmeister," "matt" colors, and "Phaleron ware," and whether it would not be well to explain, when the word first appears (p. 14), that the "Karameikos" was the potters' quarter in ancient Athens, rather than on its second appearance (p. 18). It is true that the definition is given in the Index, but as the Index, in general, is not treated as a glossary, the reader can hardly be blamed if he fails to find this means of answering his question.

On the other hand, the student of art and archæology, trained, presumably, to demand exactness in the use of terms, may well be puzzled to find the aryballos described as similar to "small pear-shaped vases without foot" (p. 41), after it has been described and pictured (pp. 30 and 31) as a sub-class of the lekythos, with a "low ring-foot." It may irritate him, after he has been told that vases with the name Leagros should be assigned to the decade beginning about 510 (p. 78), to read three pages later that Leagros is "the hero of the last decade of the fifth century"; and if he is familiar with his classics, the numerous small errors in the accentuation of Greek words may weaken his confidence in the writer's accuracy in other matters.

In this respect, our assumed student reader would do Miss Herford an injustice. In general, her statements of fact are accurate, and show, especially in the second, or historical, part of the book, that she is conversant with recent discussions and theories. She writes pleasantly and vividly of the vase-painter's craft, and enlivens her text with frequent and appropriate references to Greek literature and to ancient and modern works of art. Some of these allusions, such as the comparison of the work of Assteas to that of Blake, are decidedly original and interesting. The illustrations—made, for the most part, from photographs—are well chosen and excellently reproduced. The book, therefore, may confidently be expected to make the Greek vases more generally appreciated than they now are. But one leaves it with the feeling that a better popular account could be written, that the writing of such livres de vulgarisation is still among the things which "they order better in France."

The Run of the Shelves

THE claims of James Whitcomb Riley are recalled to mind by Mr. Marcus Dickey's new book, the "Youth of James Whitcomb Riley" (Bobbs-Merrill Company), in which four hundred pages of record and rhapsody are lavished on the poet's youth alone. The Review will not re-try the case. At most, it may venture a word on the principles that should govern the award. In the homeliness of Riley's dialect there is neither accusation nor amnesty. It fixes nothing. So far as the court of criticism goes, the dispensation from standard English, which is cheerfully granted in the Riley case, is not a dispensation from literature; it is not a dispensation from sense or art or style. There are various ways of being rough as of being smooth, and literature in both forms recognizes only the best ways. What posterity may wish in regard to Riley, if it makes him the subject of a wish, is not that he had been less of a ploughman and more of a cavalier, but that he had been more of a ploughman and less of a loafer. Even in his own furrow Riley is an uneven workman, an inconstant toiler. In the very same poem, between firmnesses he is flabby; between tensions he is nerveless. He was doubtless zealous in his art after a fashion, but it is easier to be zealous than to be steady. It is easier in a way to give one's life to art than to give half-an-hour to the subjugation of a rebellious line. Riley's half-hours were too precious to be thrown away upon niceties; he had six volumes to write.

Men are sometimes vindicated by the quality of their detractors; they are sometimes arraigned by the nature of their eulogists. Mr. Dickey's book is a sincere, generous, loyal book; its good-nature is so sunny, and so unlike in its comprehensiveness, that it exhorts a sort of unwilling return from the doubting or contentious reader. Nevertheless, it is little short of a menace to Riley's fame. It is prolix and vacuous; in nature, by the by, the greatest amplitudes are voids. It is gushing and florid; around springs one expects to find blossoms. Mr. Dickey quotes very freely from Riley. He quotes indiscriminately, or rather he seems to be guided by a perverse dexterity to the wrong quotation. If he quotes from Longfellow's "Morituri Salutamus," for example, he is guided past the imaginative line, "So many ghosts are in the wooded plain," past the glowing metaphor,

> How far the gulf-stream of our youth may flow
> Into the arctic regions of our lives, to settle down upon perhaps the two most arid and lustreless lines in the whole poem,

> Study yourself; and most of all note well
> Wherein kind nature meant you to excel.

The effect of the application of a talent so fatally inspired as this to a faculty so portentously unsure as Riley's may readily be guessed.

This is not all. The havoc which Mr. Dickey's adoration is to work in the reputation of his idol is still incomplete. This book is curious, and in its way valuable, in its picture of a bygone literary taste, a taste juvenile from the outset and juvenile to-day in its very senility, like Mrs. Skewton in "Dombey and Son." The cult was showy, facile, smartish, not so bad in its avowedly ornamental and sentimental passages, though these were bad enough, as in the plasters of ornament and sentiment which it was pleased to apply to passages which were in substance plain and practical. Riley undoubtedly had close affiliations with this cult, and the unwilling and unconscious wrong which this book does to its idolized subject is to present Riley almost exclusively in the clutch of these affiliations. If a man is half, and only half, a fop, he is lost if he allows himself to be decoyed into a group-picture in which the other participants are fops. Riley was half a twaddler; the neighborhood of twaddlers is his bane. Mr. Dickey's book scarcely permits him a moment's release from that compromising fellowship. A manlier taste in his biographer would have acted as summons and incentive to the manlier Riley to emerge from his retirement. Riley found his vocation in the portrayal of humble life in his native Indiana. One can not help fancying that part of the virtue of this step lay in the fact that the return to his people was the exodus from his class. That exodus is in a sense revoked in Mr. Dickey.

Dr. Trevor H. Davies' "Spiritual Voices in Modern Literature" (George H. Doran Company) is a book the contents of which transpire in the very title. The reader infers that Dr. Davies is a clergyman of the English Church in Canada; that the point remains to the last an inference is a just indication of some breadth in his theology. He is a well-bred and (comparatively speaking) well-read clergyman, writing a colorless, but limpid and fluid English, not a close reasoner, but so partial to order and classification that his book is almost tiled with subdivisions. He wishes to find in modern literature a reënforcement to modern Christianity, and the original feature in an unoriginal book is his addition of the names of John Masefield and of Ibsen (in "Peer Gynt") to a list in which the appearance of Tennyson, Browning, Wordsworth, Ruskin, and James Smetham, is entirely normal and intelligible. The appropriation of Mr. Masefield by the church is hardly spoliation, though it is interesting as a mark of the effacement of the last echo of the hue and cry which greeted the appearance of the "Everlasting Mercy" not so very many years ago. That poem was essentially Christian, and if its blasphemies and ribaldries were meant to ward off the pietists, it is interesting to note that the period of their efficiency is past. The case of Ibsen is very different. It is undoubtedly true that "Peer Gynt" is a condemnation of half-heartedness, and that half-heartedness is the bane of modern Christianity. But it must be remembered that Ibsen, through the mouth of Brand, represented the God of orthodox Norway as a bald old man with skullcap and glasses, and it is unlikely that he would have been cordially responsive to the distinction that Dr. Davies might draw, possibly with justice, between orthodox Canada and orthodox Norway. Dr. Davies, at variance with Ibsen on the main point, desires to profit by Ibsen's authority on a secondary question on which their agreement is decided. Of course, any side is quite right in availing itself of a friendly particular in the testimony of a generally unfriendly witness. But in the special case where that witness is cited as an authority, a distinct problem arises. His general unfriendliness becomes a fact which it is unfair to withhold and impolitic to confess.

The Harvard art department have put their heads together and produced an admirable catalogue raisonné entitled "Collection of Mediæval and Renaissance Paintings," and the Harvard University Press has given the handsome quarto every advantage of fine presswork and illustration. Over sixty pictures are reproduced, most of them being of the primitive Italian schools. These pictures have been collected with the end of illustrating the courses in the history of art. The pictures are so representative that the editors have been able to build a succinct history of primitive European painting around the nucleus afforded by the Fogg Art Museum. The brief chapters on the several schools are competently done. That on Byzantine painting is the best short account available in English. Especially good also are the color descriptions, which are clear without tediousness or over-elaboration. The editors record such pictures by artists represented in this catalogue as are in other American collections. Bibliographical features are pretty full and sensibly presented. Where the editors deserve high praise is in their correct and scrupulous conception of their task. The business of a catalogue is to present the actual state of knowledge about the objects catalogued, and not the floating mass of conjecture. A cataloguer should not make new attributions for disputed pictures, but arbitrate existing attributions, and he should accept none that can not measurably be proved. So evident a counsel of probity should not need to be urged, but when one recalls such wild work as was made in the official catalogue of the Jarves Collection at Yale, the scholarly conservatism of the Harvard editors appears in a very favorable light. They know how to reject flattering attributions even when offered by incautious distinguished experts, they query attributions which most gallery officials would welcome with open arms. In short, the catalogue is a remarkable exhibit of the New England conscience, and withal taste, as applied to the often charlatanistic field of connoisseurship. Such a work will not soon go out of date. This catalogue should be immensely valuable as an adjunct to instruction at Harvard, and it should serve widely as an example. It is a fitting crown to the remarkable work of building the Fogg Museum up from almost nothing—and in only about fifteen years—to its present estate of importance. The interest of the collection may be judged from a mere enumeration of some of the Sienese masters on the walls. There are fine and certain examples of Simone Martini, Ambrogio Lorenzetti, Andrea Vanni, Taddeo Bartoli, Sassetta, Matteo di Giovanni, Benvenuto da Siena, and Girolamo di Benvenuto. These may not be on household lists of the world's ten greatest painters, but they offer so many pure delights to such as know how to love aright the pictorial poetry of the City of the Virgin.

"Father Duffy's Story" (Doran) is the regimental history of the 69th New York Regiment, which bore its official designation, the 165th Infantry, impatiently as an alias. The book begins with the return of the regiment from the Mexican Border, and ends with its return after service overseas with the Rainbow Division bearing nine new furls on the regimental flagstaff for actions from Lunéville to the Argonne, followed by a period of comparative rest with the Army of Occupation on the Rhine. It follows one thread faithfully through the intricate pattern of the war. It is not so much history as one of the sources of history, a first-hand document by one who had and used well every opportunity to see and know what was going on not only in trenches and dugouts, but at headquarters, and in the minds of the men. Father Duffy is priest, soldier, scholar, man of the world, and man of action; he is quite as at home in French city, French village, front line trench, headquarters mess, or observation post as in his own parish in the Bronx. Indeed, wherever he is he is in his own parish; colonels came and went, but Father Duffy took his parish to war and brought it back. He is always in the very heart of it, and to every man in the regiment he is father, mentor, and friend —we see it half the time as a militarized parish, and half as parochial regiment. We see it, its members, and all its actions, in all human and all humorous aspects no less than heroic and historical. The regiment stands out as against a white screen, without background of the war as a whole, and without visualization of scene. But the tale does not profess to be a work of art. A glimpse of what we might have had if Joyce Kilmer had written it we get in the appendix. Father Duffy wisely did not attempt to continue Kilmer's narrative; his work stands sturdily on its own feet, and deeply as we may regret Kilmer's relinquishment of the task, we may be grateful for Father Duffy's assumption of it. The book holds interest in every page; even those which in the author's phrase "bristle with names" have the same interest that every town and camp in France had a few months ago; you are likely to come upon someone you know in any one of them.

Drama

Jacinto Benavente: Theatre and Library

BENAVENTE'S "La Malquerida," or the "Passion Flower," as it is ornamentally and inexactly named in the current presentation at the Greenwich Village Theatre, is a play which bears perusal with difficulty and reperusal even less. Dramas abound in disguises; in the "Passion Flower," we have drama itself in disguise, one play masking as another. The result is unlucky in two ways; the initial, or covering play has no room to culminate; the final and actual play has no time to unfold. The first play is the tale of a young man, shot on the eve of his marriage, and of a former rival who is accused of the crime, acquitted, and pursued after his acquittal by the unslaked vengeance of the victim's fiery kinsfolk. This drama, exciting, traditional, and superficial, is drawn aside like an Elizabethan traverse to reveal a drama of quite another kind, brooding, internal, sinister, deadly. Its persons are three, stepfather, stepdaughter, and mother, and the element which makes this simple grouping dynamic—I had almost written dynamitic—is the reciprocal, though up to the last moment unconfessed, passion, of stepfather and stepdaughter for each other. The link between the nominal and the actual play is simple; the stepfather in the second is, through jealousy of the girl's betrothed, the prompter of the assassination in the first.

Let us turn now to the conduct of the major play. I will dwell no more on the fact that this play spends an act and a half in haunting its own outskirts. Nor will I enlarge on the uncomeliness of the theme. Tragedy is tragedy; no one expects an earthquake to be polite. What is Benavente's handling of these materials? My answer is emphatic. I can scarcely name another play by a tried and deft hand in which the disposition of the materials is so inept. The situation is not developed; it is scarcely even revealed. I might almost say that the real drama is compressed—not to say crushed—into five terminal minutes. The march of events in these minutes is of a dizzying, a blinding, rapidity. A drama's business is to make us see. "Why did the man (the stepfather) kill his wife?," I was asked by my companion in the theatre. I had read the play not ten hours before; I had seen the act not ten minutes before; yet the question halted, almost thwarted, me. The last few minutes are revolutionary, but to make the confusion still worse—the last few seconds undo the work of the last few minutes.

The fault lies largely in the nullity of the characters. The girl Acacia, hating her mother because she loves her stepfather, and at the same time hating her stepfather because she loves her mother, is a conception astonishing enough; but in the execution she dwindles into little more than an average rebel and vixen. With the stepfather the failure is no less clear. He is a good man who commits a murder. In our country this would call for explanations; Benavente offers none. For him, apparently, a little murder now and then is only human; Americans are too inquisitive. The mother, though fairly comprehensible, is unindividual and uninteresting. The trouble with all three persons is that they are half-savages; yet, since they are likewise half-commonplace, their interest as savages is incomplete.

These objections occurred to me in the reading of the play. My experience at the Greenwich Village Theatre the other night was a very curious mixture of indorsement and refutation of these views. Nearly every objection was confirmed by the testimony of the boards, yet the despair of the play which those objections had bred was almost entirely reversed. The play itself as a work of art, as the rationalization of a train of events, was utterly defenseless; it was blind and lurching; it reeled from point to point. Yet the play held the audience; it held the critics; and the final curtain fell upon the vivid general sense that the night was memorable in the present theatrical season in New York. This was partly due to the unusual merit of the acting, but it sprang likewise from the atmosphere of tense expectation—the atmosphere of a powder-mill—which was generated by the play itself.

Miss Nance O'Neil seems predestined to parts in which something passionate and savage finds sudden issue through a rift in the ordered circumstance of a subdued and peaceful life. Her Raimunda is a sister of her Odette in the "Lily," of her penetrating and unforgettable Monna Vanna. Raimunda as an individual is far less salient than Monna Vanna, and it is partly for this reason that Miss O'Neil's acting of the part, fine as it is, may be classified as superb melodrama. Her voice alone is an endowment. There is a brocade in its texture which can give distinction to commonplaces, can exalt them without inflating them. But its efficacy goes much further. Its depth and gravity supplies to those moments of passionate abandonment in which she delights precisely the chastening and corrective background which midnight furnishes to conflagration. The part is extensive and exacting, but it leaves no dent or mark on the amplitude of her resources. Her Raimunda is something of a wilderness, but a wilderness is the place for novelty and fascination.

Mr. Charles Waldron as Esteban, while rather too human and manly for his part, gave a clear and touching picture of the man whose nature has been cleft in twain and of the effort of the broken pieces to rejoin and re-annex each other. Mr. Robert Fischer's Tio Eusebio was perhaps the most finely imagined of all the parts, and Mr. Edwin Beryl fitted snugly into the tiny part of Faustino. The Angelus was tolled in Act I, and in Acts II and III there was a lovely and benign setting that impressed me like an unceasing tolling of the Angelus.

I take this opportunity to say a word or two on a recent translation of four of Benavente's plays by Mr. John Garrett Underhill (Charles Scribner's Sons). "No Smoking" is a one-act play, in which moderation is apparent in the merit of the anecdote and the skill of the telling. "Autumnal Roses" is a loosely woven story of family and fashionable life in which the autumnal roses represent the belated domestic peace which unlimited patience and forgiveness secure to exemplary wives. The trouble with these roses is that they are stemless, the play offers them neither root nor stalk. The "Governor's Wife," in three acts, is a comprehensive and particolored satire on town life in a Spanish province. Its detail and its changefulness give one the sense of running up and down any number of twisting lanes and alleys in some unswept Spanish town in the distant hope of final emergence into a spacious and practicable thoroughfare. The only play in the volume that interests me is "Princess Bébé," a study of the errant and peccant offshoots of modern royalty in that stringency of conditions which makes life vacuous within the palace and desolate without. The psychic insight and the force of the reasoning in this work are truly remarkable, but the drama slumbers while the characters talk, and auditors might slumber with the drama.

Mr. Underhill is bent on clarity and disapproves the "interlinear" translation. He usually understands the text, but in the interest of an imaginary clearness, he abounds in verbal alterations, which, to say the least, are fussy and meddlesome. I refer the curious reader to the comparison of Princess Helena's last speech on page 119, and the whole dialogue between Gonzalo and Isabel, on pages 221-229, with their respective originals in the "Teatro" (v. 10, p. 165; v. 11, pp. 9-23). Mr. Underhill wants to write between the lines; the reader would be grateful for the opportunity to read between them.

O. W. FIRKINS

Music

Mary Garden and "Louise" —The Concert Season

I WONDER who conceived that "Music Week." The same bright mind, perhaps, which devised the "Blue Bird Week." The ideà, in each case, seemed so "pretty, pretty," that we must surely have owed it to a woman's brain. But did we need to intensify our music production? It pleased some thousands to get opera gratis, just for a change, at the Manhattan. It might have delighted more to have Caruso sing to them, on the same terms. Apart from that one free performance at the Manhattan, though, what good came of the "Music Week" campaign? The dealers may have sold a few more pianos, or pianolas, and gramophones. And then? What then?

The critics (who are in a class apart) have long been praying for less music, not for more. And they are doing the same thing, I read, in London. They have found it hard to cope with two big opera houses, three symphony orchestras, and recitals beyond counting. They did not clamor for more shows and concerts, even heralded by silvery carillons. If we could weed out half the recitals of each season, the higher cause of music might not suffer.

For art, you see, implies a wise selection. And art is poorly served by poor recitals, nor is it greatly helped by spurts of interest. If the dear people who conceived that "Music Week" had been really in earnest, they would have turned their attention to more permanent things. They would have joined the ranks of those who for years past have tried to induce Congress to give us a National Conservatory, and, as a corollary, at least one National opera house. Without them, we shall never build up music. Without them, we shall concontinue to be what we are—vassals of foreigners in music, in our concert rooms, and especially in our opera houses.

We should have music in our homes and public schools. We should eventually have not only a great National Conservatory (preferably in New York or Chicago, not in Washington) but also allied State conservatories. As an example, we should have a National opera house. But this should be but one of fifty houses for the production of American lyric drama, in which the operas of the world, including our world, should be interpreted in English, by Americans.

The reception given to "Cleopatra's Night," at the Metropolitan, proves, if we needed proof, that operatically we are moving, slowly but surely. The performance of Frederick Converse's First Symphony, by the Boston orchestra, gave hope, and more than hope, in other ways. And now I hear that the First Symphony of Louis Gruenberg—an American, like Mr. Converse and Mr. Hadley—has been accepted by three symphony societies. A few more facts like these might turn our composers from the "comic" opera field, and prompt them to create good, honest music.

There is a tendency to sneer at our composers, to discourage their young gropings after art. And against this tendency it is high time to fight. French opera was not made in a day, nor was the Wagnerian form of art named music-drama invented without many searchings. Our composers are just shaking cff their swaddling clothes. They should be encouraged in their struggles, not discouraged. Some day we shall yet have good American operas, American symphonies, and American tone-poems. But not unless we stimulate their creation.

La critique est facile, et l'art est difficile. It is very easy to point out the plagiarisms of Mr. Hadley. We might do better to extol the ingenuity, of which, in his "Cleopatra's Night" and other works, he has given evidence, the intelligence with which he has mastered the principles of opera, the art with which he has, to be sure, not invented a new orchestration, but assimilated and at times developed the inventions of his forerunners.

Some day we may have an equivalent, not merely imitative, of the "Louise" which was revived, to our great joy, last week at the Lexington. It is quite possible to find a theme on our East Side no less dramatic in its way, and no less poignant, than the one used by Charpentier. New York is full of "heroines" like Louise—weak, wayward girls, rebellious against fathers, scornful of mothers and intent on pleasure. The voice of our great city calls to them as beguilingly as that of Paris called to Louise. The end is often here as in Montmartre, a domestic tragedy. We have not, heaven be praised, such men as Julien. But we have Bolshevists and other kinds of rebels, as potent in their appeal to the young Grand Street dressmakers as that French phrase-monger and fifth-rate poet.

In the character of Louise, Mary Garden, who is nothing if not "personal," again fascinated us by the intensity, even if she grieved the sensitive by the perversity, of her interpretation of Charpentier's work girl. Miss Garden sang the only air ("Depuis le jour") allowed her by the composer, with a beauty of expression, a flawlessness of intonation, and a warmth of feeling, which should have dismayed those critics who persist in telling us that "she can not sing." Her rendering of that song was full of ecstasy, the outpouring of a woman drunk with love. The episode at the opening of Charpentier's third act in "Louise," beginning with that wonderful air and continued in the later scene for Louise and Julien, to my mind at least is the most untrammeled, the most masterly, the most beautiful love rhapsody since "Tristan and Isolde."

But why, when from that scene, as in the first act of Charpentier's love romance, we learn that Louise was intended by the composer-librettists to be an echo, not an inspirer, of her lover, does Miss Garden more or less distort the significance of the character by making it so dominant? The centre of the opera is the father of Louise and not the daughter, a father modelled on Charpentier's father. Perhaps because she can not help herself. She is swayed and run away with by her temperament.

The Mother in "Louise" of Maria Claessens restored the right meaning of that part. You must know France and the traditions of the French to understand (as few here do) that, in this mother, we should not seek a virago, or an unfeeling woman, but a good, honest, although rather narrow soul, hampered by conventions if you will, yet really striving to protect a willful child against a lover whom she believes to be a peril to her. Mme. Claessens sang her music with fine taste and, at the close of the third act, was most pathetic. The Father of that excellent bass-baritone, Hector Dufranne, was, as it has always been, impeccable in its sincerity. And the orchestra, under the leadership of Mr. Charlier, almost redeemed itself from the distressing faults which shamed it when it attempted Verdi's "Falstaff."

It was a mistake for the Chicago Opera Company to revive that masterpiece with a baritone so utterly unsuited to the title-part as Giacomo Rimini, a soprano—an admirable soprano—like Rosa Raisa, barely recovered from an illness, as Mrs. Ford, and inadequate artists in some other rôles. Above all, it was wrong to expose so fine and eloquent a work to absolute shipwreck by performing it without long and close rehearsal. The one singer in the cast who achieved success was Désiré Defrêre, whose interpretation of the part of Ford surprised the disheartened audience by its artistry. What Mr. Rimini did not know of the fat Knight would have filled volumes.

The reappearance of that master of the sweet art of song, Alessandro Bonci, gave joy to thousands who attended the revivals of "Un Ballo in Maschera" and even more antiquated works at the Lexington. There is still room here for the old "hurdy gurdy" operas when they are dignified by singers such as Bonci.

(Continued on page 164)

Stamina!

Crocker-Wheeler Form W Rolling Mill Motors, in sizes from 6½ to 200 H.P., possess the bull strength and high overload capacity to meet the very severe service encountered in rolling mill operation.

Mill engineers admit that these motors were of greatest value in helping America through the vital period of superproduction of steel.

S. S. Wheeler
President

Crocker-Wheeler Co.

Ampere, N. J.

New York
Boston
Syracuse
Chicago
Cleveland
Binghamton

Pittsburgh
Newark
New Haven
Philadelphia
Baltimore
San Francisco

TIFFANY & CO.

DIAMOND AND GEM MERCHANTS

PEARLS DIAMONDS JEWELRY
SILVERWARE WATCHES CLOCKS
CHINA AND STATIONERY

EFFICIENT SERVICE BY MAIL

FIFTH AVENUE & 37TH STREET
NEW YORK

THEODORE ROOSEVELT'S AUTOBIOGRAPHY

This is a new edition of the immortal autobiography of the great man—perhaps the best source of all to turn to for an understanding of his remarkable qualities and his amazing career. Illustrated. $5.00

Foch: The Winner of the War

By CAPTAIN RAYMOND RECOULY

So many facts, so many striking revelations indispensable to understanding Foch, the man, Foch, the general, and the mental background of the Allied victory are contained in it that it is sure to become an essential document to all intelligent readers who would go below the surface in a survey of the war. Here is a first-hand knowledge of the immortal general and his methods given by a man who worked with him from day to day in the great crises. Illustrated. $3.00

Modes and Morals

By KATHARINE FULLERTON GEROULD

Here Mrs. Gerould presents a volume of extremely clever essays, including "The New Simplicity," "The Extirpation of Culture," "Tabu and Temperament," "Dress and the Woman," "The Remarkable Rightness of Rudyard Kipling," and her decidedly vivacious review of "British Novelists, Ltd." $1.75

War in the Garden of Eden

By KERMIT ROOSEVELT

A narrative which has the same vividness and power that made his father's books so popular . . . a book that won't grow old.

"Full of anecdotes and written with rare descriptive skill, Captain Roosevelt's work may well take rank as one of the most enjoyable war books of the year."—New York Tribune.

Illustrated. $1.60

CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS
FIFTH AVE. AT 48TH ST. NEW YORK

Attractive offerings are made during the Midwinter Book Season.

(Continued from page 162)

And now a word about the concert season, with its three local and its visiting symphony orchestras, its countless recitals and its choral societies. It has been crowded—far too crowded for the critics, who have had on many days to attend a recital and a concert in one afternoon, and round out their day by listening to two operas.

The New York Symphony, the Philharmonic, and the New Symphony Societies have, in the main. kept very closely to safe lines. The "Eroica" and the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven have had due honor. The admired "Unfinished" of Schubert, the "Pathétique" of Tschaikowsky, and other stand-bys have not been neglected. One work of promise, a symphony by John Alden Carpenter, of Chicago, has had a hearing. The "Pagan Poem" of Charles Martin Loeffler (by adoption a New Englander, though born an Alsatian) has been revised, besides the "Salome" of that versatile New Yorker, Henry Hadley, and other efforts by less-known Americans.

Of the last three works I have named, "Pagan Poem" seems by far the best. If the composer of that beautiful tone poem had checked himself when he had told his tale, he would have given us an uncommonly fine example of orchestral music; not possibly at all points quite original (for Loeffler is impressed by French and German influences, and more especially by the Debussy spell), but really vital and informed with poetry. It is amazing that the imaginative works of Loeffler are so seldom played here by the societies of which Mr. Walter Damrosch, W. Stransky, and Mr. Bodanzky are the directing minds. In France and elsewhere they are valued highly.

At the first concert of the well-drilled Schola Cantorum, under the conductorship of that industrious student of the old and new in art, W. Kurt Schindler, Mozart's "Requiem" and Handel's "Ode to St. Cecilia" were, sometime ago, at last restored to us. They had been slighted, as they never should have been, in favor of "The Messiah" and "Elijah," which even those to whom they seem most precious would not much miss, for at least a year or so.

Of recitals there has been no end. Violinists, pianists, 'cellists, singers, harpists, of all merits and demerits, have insisted on their right to self-possession. They have sung to us and played and gone their ways. And some, not many, have left memories in their trail, enchanting memories. For example, Kreisler, who to-day stands at the head of the great fiddlers of the world, the worthy successor of Ysaye and Wilhelmj, unequaled as to the purity of his tone, his breadth and feeling by anyone just now before the public. His performance of the Beethoven concerts a few weeks ago gave the full measure of his satisfying artistry. His rendering of one marvelous cadenza almost won pardon from the despisers of cadenzas, among whom I count myself.

Then came the pianist, Guiomar Novaes, who, by the beauty of her art, her romantic fervor, and her impeccable technique, reminds one strangely of that flaming light of music, the once, to some of us, incomparable Carreño.

We have heard other gifted pianists this season—Gabrilowitch, Profiew, Moiseiwitch, Rachmaninoff, and more. We have heard violinists of unquestioned gifts. But, of them all, two have shone as the stars: Fritz Kreisler and that siren, Guiomar Novaes.

CHARLES HENRY MELTZER

Books and the News

Health

The books written for laymen on the subject of health are of two kinds: handbooks of specific information, and the more general discussions which include such allied subjects as the mental attitude towards bodily welfare.

Among the former, the "American Red Cross Textbook on Elementary Hygiene and Home Care of the Sick" (Blakiston, 1917), by Jane N. Delano, is brief and gives references to further reading; "How to Live; Rules for Healthful Living" (Funk, 1916), by Irving Fisher and Eugene Lyman Fisk, M.D., is a publication of the Life Extension Institute; "Good Health; How to Get it and How to Keep it" (Appleton, 1917), by Alvah H. Doty, is another brief book; there is also "How to Prevent Sickness" (Harper, 1918), by G. L. Howe. More specific in their subjects are "The Cause and Cure of Colds" (McClurg, 1910), by W. S. Sadler; "Mrs. Rorer's Diet for the Sick" (Arnold, 1914), by Sarah T. Rorer; and Dudley A. Sargent's "Health, Strength and Power" (Caldwell, 1904), which is about gymnasium exercises.

Annie Payson Call's "Nerves and Common Sense" (Little, 1916) is one of a number of books by this writer. E. M. Bishop's "Daily Ways to Health" (Huebsch, 1912) is well recommended; and so is Henry D. Chapin's "Health First" (Century, 1917). Hollis Godfrey's "The Health of the City" (Houghton, 1910) contains ten chapters on conditions which make for health or disease in the city; it is an important and interesting work, but is a study of the community rather than a manual to be used as a guide to personal health. It has references to further reading.

Woods Hutchinson's writings are so readable that he has suffered the penalty of popularity, and been suspected (unfairly, I believe) of superficiality by those who believe that only bitter medicine is valuable. His "Handbook of Health" (Houghton, 1911), "Exercise and Health" (Outing, 1911), "Instinct and Health" (Dodd, 1908) (also published as "Health and Common Sense"), and "Civilization and Health" (Houghton, 1914), contain chapters upon many topics of interest. Of those books which treat the topic generally, Luther H. Gulick's "The Efficient Life" (Doubleday, 1913) is good, and Richard C. Cabot's "What Men Live By" (Houghton, 1914) has always been in high favor.

Many experts will doubtless recall the man in Jerome's story, who reading too much on the subject, concluded that he had every disease from ague to zymosis (except housemaid's knee), and they will endorse the prescription given by his medical friend, which is still (with certain reservations in accord with our new purity) sound advice for most men: "1 lb. beefsteak with 1 pt. bitter beer every 6 hours; 1 ten-mile walk every morning; 1 bed at 11 sharp every night; and don't stuff up your head with things you don't understand."

EDMUND LESTER PEARSON

Books Received

FICTION

Baxter, Arthur Beverly. The Blower of Bubbles. Appleton. $1.75 net.

Bindloss, Harold. Wyndham's Pal. Stokes, $1.75 net.

Cournos, John. The Mask. Doran.

Holdsworth, Ethel. The Taming of Nan. Dutton. $1.90 net.

Howard, Keble. The Peculiar Major. Doran.

Merrick, Leonard. The Worldlings. Dutton. $1.75 net.

Oppenheim, E. P. The Great Impersonation. Little, Brown. $1.75 net.

DRAMA AND MUSIC

Hornblow, Arthur. A History of the Theatre in America. 2 volumes. Lippincott. $10.00 net.

Tassin, Algernon. The Craft of the Tortoise. Boni & Liveright. $1.50 net.

POETRY

Allen, W. F. Monographs. Boston: Four Seas. $1.25 net.

Roth, Samuel. Europe: A Book for America. Boni & Liveright. $1.25.

Whitin, C. B. Wounded Words. Boston: Four Seas. $1.00 net.

SCIENCE

Bishop, E. S. The Narcotic Drug Problem. Macmillan. $1.50.

Hill, H. W. Sanitation for Public Health Nurses. Macmillan. $1.35.

Hopkins, U. M. The Outlook for Research and Invention. D. Van Nostrand Co.

Walsh, James J. Health Through Will Power. Little, Brown. $1.50 net.

Wood, Frederic J. The Turnpikes of New England. Marshall Jones.

LITERATURE

Foster, B. O. Livy, 13 volumes: Books 1 and 2. Loeb Classical Library. Putnams.

Ker, Walter C. A. Martial's Epigrams. Two volumes. Book 1. Loeb Classical Library. Putnams.

THE REVIEW

Vol. 2, No. 41 New York, Saturday, February 21, 1920 FIFTEEN CENTS

Contents

Brief Comment 165

Editorial Articles:

The President 168

Prices and the Gold Standard 169

Limitation of the Right to Strike 170

The Church and the World's Need 172

The Problem of Fiume. By Geographer 173

Aliens and the Political Party System. By John Spargo 175

Poetry:

"Louvain Is a Dull, Uninteresting Town . . ." By Robert Withington 177

The President's Secretary. By Spectator 177

Correspondence 179

Book Reviews:

An American Inquiry into British Labor Conditions 180

Blake Outdone 181

"Appassionata" 182

Doubles and Such 183

The Run of the Shelves 183

Old King's. By Archibald MacMechan 185

Drama:

Eugene O'Neill—The Théâtre Parisien. By O. W. Firkins. 185

Music:

At the Lexington—"The Blue Bird"—Caruso's Indisposition. By Charles Henry Meltzer 186

Books and the News:

Education. By Edmund Lester Pearson 188

MR. LANSING might, and probably would, have done well to resign long ago. Mr. Wilson might, and probably would, have done well to request his resignation long ago. The relation between the President and his Secretary of State was abnormal. Mr. Lansing submerged his individuality, and yet on some vital matters avowedly differed radically in opinion from his chief. That he acted, however, with scrupulous loyalty, both before and during the President's illness, is too clear for dispute. The very conduct for which the President so harshly, so unreasonably, and so ungenerously censures him—the calling of the Cabinet conferences—was evidently inspired by the desire to make possible the continuance of the President's hold on authority during an interval in which his inability actually to fulfill its responsibilities was manifest. The country has shown straight common sense in resting its rebuke of the President upon the manner of his dismissal of the Secretary, and not at all upon the mere fact of parting with him. For this last the simple fact of want of harmony would have furnished an all-sufficient reason.

LIKE the jaded epicure who finds in the long-forgotten savor of a dish of pork and beans a zest which the high-flown arts of French chefs had long ceased to purvey, the country, surfeited with idealism soufflé, listens to the old-fashioned Democrat talk of Vice President Marshall with a good deal of relish. His letter is not a masterpiece, but neither does it pretend to be a masterpiece. It has some of the customary faults of the old-time party pronouncements, but it has some virtues of its own. It winds up with an honest expression of Mr. Marshall's state of mind, which belongs to this particular time and no other, for at no previous time has there been occasion for just such an expression:

> If a faith of this kind appeals to the Democrats of Indiana, I desire to go as a delegate at large to the convention at San Francisco to advocate this kind of a platform, and to ascertain whether everything that made the Republic great was right or wrong.

SOME of the points made by Mr. Marshall are worthy of special note. In the first place, he comes out as emphatically as did Mr. Hoover the other day against the submergence of the individual—the substitution of all sorts of schemes of socialization for that self-reliance which has been the very foundation-stone of American character. "Legislative efforts," he says, "to produce justice and good order in society by listening and acceding to the demands of persons and classes will, in the hour of peace, produce failure." Secondly, he declares that "this is still a federation of States, demanding that the States discharge the duties of local self-government"; and, although the historical accuracy of this statement may be challenged, now that the Eighteenth Amendment has been sand-blasted into the Constitution, it is sound in spirit and purpose. A less fundamental but not less urgent issue is touched upon when Mr. Marshall includes in his programme the election of > an executive pledged to discharge the countless officials and innumerable agents made necessary by the war and to administer public affairs along economic lines even to the point of the veto of every bill carrying not only unnecessary and ill-advised appropriations, but appropriations for the benefit of a few citizens rather than for the common good.

All in all, though the letter is marred by some see-sawing and some padding, it bears out the idea, so well expressed at its close, that the biggest issue to-day is "whether everything that made the Republic great was right or wrong."

IN two respects the demand for the surrender of the German war criminals differed distinctly from that for the extradition of Wilhelm von Hohenzollern. It was based on an accusation of specific crimes, and the Entente's right to enforce its execution results from the ratification of the Treaty of Versailles by the German National Assembly. The legal grounds on which Queen Wilhelmina based her negative reply to the note of the Allied Powers offered, consequently, no support to the German Government for its refusal.

Nevertheless, the Allied Powers have acted with wisdom and dignity in acceding to that refusal. The concession is coupled with the requirement that the German Government shall carry out in good faith its declaration of readiness to bring to trial the men accused of high crimes against the laws of war and the established usages of civilized nations.

The difficulty is by no means at an end; it will be no easy matter to procure a genuine trial of high German officers by their own countrymen, and a judgment in accordance with the evidence. The Allied Powers distinctly reserve the right to enforce the terms of the treaty in the event of the trials proving to be a mere pretence. But it was evident that insistence on the surrender of hundreds of leading German military men, to be tried by enemy judges in an enemy country, would have meant a convulsion whose consequences threatened to be ruinous to the whole world. The solution arrived at represents the nearest approach which was possible to the reconcilement of justice with necessity.

FOUR weeks ago, when Secretary Glass, Mr. Hoover, the President, and others were urging upon Congress the provision of $150,000,000 for immediate use in rescuing the starving populations of Armenia, Austria, and other countries, the Review said: "To hesitate or delay, in the face of such harrowing need and such clear opportunity, would be a criminal failure of duty." The House Committee to which the matter was referred haggled over it a while and then cut down the proposed amount to $50,000,000. And now Washington press reports tell us that it is doubtful whether the measure thus crippled will be passed at all. We can only add that what we formerly stated would be a criminal failure of duty has now become a criminal failure of duty. The leaders of the majority in Congress should take warning in time that the next election will not turn wholly upon the political crimes and blunders of their opponents. The utter callousness of Congress to the terrible conditions which this measure aims to relieve misrepresents both the humane feeling and the sound judgment of the American people.

IF the American Legion is to become an instrument for extorting money from Congress—and the sad thing is that Congress is only too willing to be bludgeoned in this way—then it would have been better if the Legion had never come into being. The men charged with the responsibility of its organization must have been perfectly aware of how things were going. It can not be supposed that they liked the prospect. But they chose to sponsor an organization which they hoped in part to control to good ends, rather than that there should be no organization at all, or one which was openly and shamelessly devoted to the raiding of the Treasury. It is by no means certain that their choice was a wise one. Having made it, the leaders should throw all the influence they possess, as they did very effectively when the question was one of mob violence, to the diversion of the Legion's energies into other channels. If the Legion wants something to do, let it concern itself with the scandalously lagging business of re-educating disabled soldiers. Within the Legion itself there should be a fight to the finish on this question of "bonuses," and it should be made now. Not until such a fight has been made, no matter what its outcome, can the public see plainly where the Legion stands, and effectively reckon with its power both for good and evil.

OFFICIAL warning has been given that Canada takes very serious exception to the Lenroot reservation. N. W. Rowell, Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs and President of the Privy Council, states explicitly that Canada can not and will not give her assent to any impairment of her status and voting rights under the Treaty. He calls attention to the fact that Canada's contribution to the common cause in the war was not levied upon her from across the Atlantic but was the voluntary action of a self-governing Commonwealth. A due regard for the sacrifice of lives and substance thus willingly and independently made renders it inconceivable, he thinks, that any Government in Canada could be so false to both living and dead as to consent to her elimination as a voting member in the League Assembly. The clause in the League covenant which provides for such membership was, of course, a recognition of the large measure of independent self-government which has been so widely given to the outlying parts of the British Empire as rapidly as they have seemed equal to the responsibility. This privilege of independent representation in the League Assembly, as distinguished from the Council, involves no danger to the interests of the United States, as has been amply shown since the subject has been under public discussion. The Senate will make a very serious mistake if it gives just offense to Canadian self-respect and national feeling by insisting upon a reservation which is not required by any legitimate American interest.

MR. WILSON'S memorandum on the Dalmatian question chiefly raised the thought—Why of all outstanding issues is Italy's claim unfit to be compromised? The very terms of the peace treaty are constantly being readjusted. Compromise is possible with Germany—nay, with the unspeakable Turk. Why should self-determination with all its "i"s dotted and "t"s crossed be reserved for Italy? Against Mr. Wilson's oddly inflexible devotion to that principle of self-determination which elsewhere he has yielded, we have to se[illegible] certain common-sense facts. Italy has suffered frightfully through the war. Her deaths and casualties were proportionately as great as England's, her financial sacrifice fa[illegible] greater. She sees England an[illegible] France dividing Arabia and Afric[illegible] under mandates. She receives onl[illegible] what would have been allotted he[illegible] had she preserved neutrality. Perhap[illegible] Italy ought to be satisfied with th[illegible] sense of duty done, but so long a[illegible] France, England, Japan, and recent[illegible] hostile Croatia and Dalmatia, g[illegible] every hearing and every concessio[illegible] from the Supreme Council, while sh[illegible] gets none, Italy is going to be di[illegible] contented. And an alienated Ita[illegible] means a crippled League of Natio[illegible] These are facts that should ma[illegible] Italy's claim seem negotiable. Th[illegible] look more impressive than a tar[illegible] and vehement assertion of the pu[illegible] dogma of self-determination.

A STRANGE rumor has come out of Moscow concerning the death of Kalinin, one of the Bolshevik Commissars, which was reported by the Soviet wireless a fortnight ago. According to this unconfirmed rumor, Kalinin, who was considered a very energetic and capable man, and not a Bolshevik by tradition, was elected President of the Council of People's Commissars in place of Lenin, who was chosen Vice President, and thereupon the Lenin faction put Kalinin out of the way by poisoning him.

Wild as this rumor is, it can not fail to draw attention to certain almost inevitable developments within the Soviet policy. In revolutionary times, strong and vigorous men spring from obscurity to positions of responsibility and power. It is natural that these new men, conscious of their ability to administer large affairs and direct men, should become impatient of the authority of the doctrinaires in whose hands power has remained since the November Revolution. To these newly emerging men of affairs, Lenin, Bukharin, Chicherin, and the rest must seem like old fogies and doctrinaires, tied to an unworkable programme. It would not be strange, therefore, if, in view of the numerical inferiority of the convinced Communists, and the growth of new classes within the Soviet organization, there were taking place to-day a struggle the outcome of which will be great changes in the structure and principles of the Russian Government.

A SPECIFIC knowledge of the American form of Government as a requirement for a college degree is the aim of a nation-wide campaign just announced by the National Security League. Instruction in American history, including drill in the Constitution, used to be a part of the curriculum of most colleges, and if it has recently been slighted, it ought certainly to be jacked up. Method is everything in these matters. We want no more, for example, of the partisan teaching of history which for so long fostered anti-British feeling. True, American youths should still glow with pride when they read how our forefathers rebuffed a tyrannical old English king, but it is not sportsmanlike to keep picking on a bully whom you have trounced and who has made amends. Our schools and colleges ought normally to engender patriotism, but only as a by-product. Any tendency in peace times to shout "America first" would be not so different from that strident chorus, "Deutschland über Alles."

A SIR OLIVER for a "Pussyfoot" Johnson—which country is the gainer by this exchange of professors? The one peddles a substitute for what the other takes away from us. England is fortunate in having tasted of the substitute before there was nothing else to taste, and is not likely to put herself in a position to get a craving for it.

LAW as a shackle on the progress of justice, powerless or unwilling to correct its own anachronisms and inequities, is a favorite theme with the type of mind which imagines that the first condition of progress for the train of civilization is to tear up the track. Organizations of lawyers themselves, however, are busily at work trying to bring law and legal procedure into harmony with improved conceptions of human justice. The New York State Bar Association has just issued a pamphlet of extracts from the Annual Report of its Committee on Law Reform, suggesting various changes either in legislation or in rules of procedure, all intended to bring legal relief more simply, speedily, and cheaply within the reach of the citizen. As the recommendations adopted are all clearly of this beneficent type, and were made without serious opposition, one must certainly acquit the New York State Bar Association of any disposition to maintain traditional injustice merely because it is traditional, or because the shrewd lawyer can use it for his own gain. The type of lawyer who to-day dominates such organizations is neither the Bourbon nor the shyster.

IN addition to various specific reforms suggested, which we need not stop to enumerate here, the Association passed a general resolution, urging all bar associations, State or local, to exert themselves systematically to procure the elimination from the law in their respective States of any anachronistic features impeding the proper administration of justice and thwarting those rights in which the citizen should be secure. It was further recommended to all bar associations to take steps for a systematic study of actual conditions in the administration of justice, as affected by anachronistic legal institutions, rules and documents. And the New York Association set the example by immediately providing for a committee of its own membership to take up this task. The Association appeals to the press for aid in calling attention to this sensible step towards legal progress. It is a matter of vital interest to every citizen, and it is to be hoped that this interest will find such clear and general expression as to insure reasonably prompt and thorough action.

THE professors in the University of Washington have taken the trouble to prepare their case in detail. The substance of the pamphlet embodying the report of the Association of Instructors is familiar enough, but the figures are presented in a form which should command wide attention. Briefly, living costs have increased about 100 per cent., while the average increase in salaries, arriving from ordinary promotions on grounds of seniority, is less during the last five years, and less by a good deal, than the normal increase during the years preceding the war. According to the family budgets of teachers of all ranks not a single faculty family is operating without a serious deficit. If increases to the teaching staff were to be made equal to the advanced wage scales in other occupations, something like 100 per cent. would be necessary. The professors are content to ask for a modest 50 per cent. The State Legislature, when it meets in 1921, can hardly fail to see the force of the figures here presented. The average of salaries in the University of Washington is 43 per cent. below the average for 28 other institutions, and a full 30 per cent. below the average for the same institutions in 1912-13. Until the Legislature takes action, however, the Washington professors will presumably live as they can—on their expectations.

The President

IN his letters of dismissal to Mr. Lansing, President Wilson has made a glaring exhibition of the worst qualities of his mind and character. For imperious arrogance and for intellectual irresponsibility alike, they represent an attitude to which it would be difficult to find anything like a parallel in our political annals. Mr. Wilson rarely condescends to justify by specific argument any position that he chooses to take; in this instance he has assigned for his course a reason which nothing but contempt for the opinions of his fellow-citizens could possibly have led any normal man to put forward. In the painful situation which has thus arisen, there is some comfort in the thought that the country has unanimously dismissed as absurd his charge that the informal Cabinet meetings which were held during his illness constituted a usurpation of power or a violation of the spirit of our Constitutional Government. His right to call for the Secretary's resignation on general grounds is undisputed, and no fault would have been found if he had done so. As it is, a wave of indignation has swept the country with little distinction of party. The one thing lacking has been the assertion by the other members of the Cabinet, with the exception of Mr. Lane, of the position which the clear requirements of manhood and self-respect called upon them to assume.

That the President's real reason for dismissing his Secretary of State was not the one which he assigns as the determining cause of his action is doubtless true enough. Other causes are mentioned in the correspondence itself; and moreover they have been perfectly well known to the public for many months. Rumors abound also of special causes for the President's displeasure which have not come to the knowledge of the public. But to delve seriously into these things would be a process not only futile but humiliating. We have not yet reached the point where it should be regarded as incumbent upon American citizens to endeavor, like the subjects of some Oriental despot, to surmise the secret thoughts that inspire the conduct of their ruler.

It would be an injustice to Mr. Wilson to treat this particular performance as a fair example of his usual conduct. His physical condition, together with the terrible disappointments which during the past half-year he has suffered, is unquestionably responsible for the utter lack of judgment and restraint which he has in this instance exhibited. But it would be an injustice to the truth not to recognize that his attitude in this matter is merely an exaggeration of that which he has repeatedly and persistently manifested in the past. His attitude toward the United States Senate in the matter of the Treaty has shown in only less extreme form the same spirit. Had it not actually happened, it would seem incredible that any man with the clear necessity before him of gaining the good will of a body without which he was powerless to effect his great purpose, could have used the language he did in his speech of March 4, 1919, on the eve of his return to France. "Gentlemen on this side," he said, "will find the covenant not only in it, but so many threads of the treaty tied to the covenant that you can not dissect the covenant from the treaty without destroying the whole vital structure." Thus to add contemptuous defiance to persistent ignoring of his associates in the treaty-making power was to flaunt in their faces the kind of arrogance to which it is not in human nature to submit, and which has had consequences tragic to himself, to his country, and to the world.

In saying all this, we are proceeding on the assumption that the President's mind, however disturbed by his illness and by the terrific strain under which he had so long labored, is not in any definite sense impaired. This latter possibility can not, indeed, be ignored. Recent assurances of the most emphatic kind from physicians in close attendance upon the President are to the effect that his mind is absolutely sound. Opinions of the opposite kind are expressed by some others. But the country must act on the one assumption or the other. For five months, in the face of almost impenetrable secrecy as to the facts in the case, newspapers and public men of both parties have forborne to press the question. They have acted on the supposition that Mr. Wilson is still clothed with all the powers and responsibilities of his great office. Whatever was necessary to be done in order that the Government should function during his partial or complete inability to attend to the business of the Presidency has been done, and no more. If this state of things is to come to an end, well and good. But there is at present no sign of the relinquishment by Mr. Wilson of any portion of his authority. On the contrary, he has never asserted it more aggressively or more dictatorially than within the last week. No consideration for his personal feelings, or for lamentable developments which may yet take place, but which at present can be only matters of conjecture, can be allowed to stand in the way of that truthful criticism to which the acts of the head of a republic must be subjected in a time like this if the republic is to be safe.

So far as the Review is concerned, its readers need hardly be told that it has studiously refrained from all avoidable fault-finding. Not only during Mr. Wilson's illness, but in the preceding months, its anxiety to promote the possibility of a conciliatory settlement between the President and the Senate had caused it to put as little stress as possible upon the faults of either side. It has never aspersed the motives either of the President or of the great bulk of the Republican opposition. But a time comes when there must be plain speaking. In the temper and method now displayed by Mr. Wilson there is the greatest possible danger to our domestic welfare and to our international relations. If that temper and method are the manifestation of a mind in sound condition, they call for stern and unsparing rebuke; if the mind is not in sound condition, the country has a right to know it and to be relieved of the danger which it implies. The former must be assumed to be the fact until the contrary is established; and however disagreeable the necessity under all the circumstances, it is the duty of the press to speak the words which the situation demands.

Prices and the Gold Standard

DURING the campaign of 1896 advocates of the gold standard, though absolutely right in their stand for sound money, were frequently very far from right in the reasons they assigned for it. Nothing was more common than for them to attempt to settle the whole question by referring to the gold dollar as an absolute standard of value. You might as well, they said, have two different yardsticks to measure length as have two different dollars to measure value. The gold dollar was a fixed and unvarying measure of value; the silver dollar was just whatever it might happen to be, and at the time was about half of the real thing. If the price of wheat had been cut in two, that showed nothing whatever about a change of value in the gold dollar—it only showed that the value of wheat had fallen; and so on all round.

For this view there was not the slightest countenance in any accredited doctrine of political economy. The great majority of competent economists were, to be sure, opposed to bimetallism; and almost without exception they were opposed to the Bryan programme. But in neither position did they rest the case on any assumed perfection of the gold unit as an unvarying standard of value. They were opposed to international bimetallism because they did not think it would work out practically to maintain the parity of gold with silver at a fixed ratio; and they were opposed to Bryan's programme of "16 to 1 without asking the aid or consent of any foreign nation," because this would mean a debasement of the actual currency of our country—the currency upon which all business transactions, all contracts and debts, had been based for many years. But Mr. Bryan was entirely right in asserting that the value of that currency—the value of the gold dollar—had greatly risen in the course of those years, and that this rise of value had, in large part at least, been caused by the demonetization of silver in this and other countries, since that demonetization had greatly lessened the aggregate volume of the monetary medium in the chief commercial nations of the world.

We are now in precisely the opposite condition, and are accordingly witnessing precisely the opposite phenomenon. The high purchasing power of gold, a quarter of a century ago, was due to the fact that the volume of the monetary medium—the effective monetary medium, comprising gold, circulating substitutes (whether silver or paper) kept on a par with gold, and bank credits—had not kept pace with the volume of business, as measured in commodities and services; and in the same way the low purchasing power of gold in this country to-day is due to the fact that the volume of the effective monetary medium has increased vastly more than the volume of business, as measured in commodities and services. If, comparing with five years ago, twice as many dollars are available to-day to pay for other things—for wool and cotton and iron, for bread and meat and candy, for clothing and furniture and gimcracks, for skilled and unskilled labor, and professional services—and if the quantity of those things available for purchase has not increased, then on the average twice as many dollars will be paid for each of these various things; though of course, for a multitude of special reasons, there will be great deviations (up and down) from this average ratio.

A word as to the way in which this is brought about may be helpful, for some very intelligent persons experience a certain difficulty in seeing it. Merely because I have more dollars, they ask, why should I pay a higher price for what I want? But the reason is very plain. Anybody who has more dollars than he had before wishes to do something with the extra dollars; he wishes either to spend them or to save them. Now if the things to be bought for the dollars are no more abundant than they were before, then, at the old scale of prices, he would be getting more of the things than he got before, and somebody else would have to go without. Accordingly somebody—either he or somebody else—will pay a higher price rather than forgo the satisfaction of his desires; and in this competition of purchasers prices are raised. Nor is the case different if he prefers to save instead of spending. People do not in our time put their extra money into a stocking. They invest it so as to draw interest. But to invest means, directly or indirectly, to engage in some form of production or trade; and this, in turn, means to buy either commodities or labor needed for the carrying on of that production or trade. Thus the extra money is put to just the same kind of use as the old money—the purchase of commodities or services. And if the aggregate quantity of those commodities and services remains the same while the number of dollars available for the purchase of them is doubled, the average price of them will be doubled also.

But, although theory plainly indicates that this will happen, and although the fact that it has happened is not the basis of the theory but only a fresh confirmation of it, there exists in some quarters a curious disposition to deny that the high prices are caused by the superabundance of dollars. It is difficult to account for this state of mind; but we have little doubt that it is partly to be accounted for by a persistence of the delusion—not clearly acknowledged indeed, and in large part altogether unrecognized, yet operating by a sort of subconscious habit—the delusion we referred to at the beginning of this article, that gold is a fixed standard of value. These opponents of the quantity theory of money are apt to devote a great deal of energy to proving what nobody denies—that the currency of the United States to-day is, all of it, as good as gold; that, measured in gold, the dollar has not depreciated. They are quite in the right, too, in pointing out the difference—which, however, is also one that nobody denies—between our currency and that of England, or France, or Italy, where the current money is not exchangeable at its face value for gold. But after all this is admitted, we still have the fact that the monetary medium of this country is vastly greater in volume than it was before the war, and that the volume of business to be done with it—as measured in commodities and services—is but little greater than it was then; and that in this state of things the purchasing power of the dollar must of necessity go down just as it has done. And we have yet to see any argument advanced to show how any other result could follow from these data.

It may be instructive to take a glance at two recent illustrations of this attitude toward the quantity theory of money. In an article in Scribner's Magazine, Mr. A. D. Noyes says:

> Economically speaking, there is no other way to measure depreciation of a currency except by ascertaining whether and how nearly it can be exchanged, dollar for dollar, for gold coin. People who say (and one hears it said pretty frequently) that the currency is depreciated in relation to commodities, are merely juggling with words. If the simple fact of the recent advance in prices is to be accepted as meaning that our currency is depreciated, then, in case of a world-wide harvest failure in an ordinary year—a failure which had put up prices on the average, say, 5 or 10 per cent—one would be driven to the inference that the currency had even then depreciated by that percentage. The conclusion could not be escaped on such a line of reasoning, even if that currency consisted of nothing but gold coin. But this is to involve the whole discussion in meaningless absurdities. It is the kind of reasoning which would first say that prices have risen because the purchasing power of money is less, and would then turn about and say that the purchasing power of money is less because prices have risen.

But the quantity theory of money perfectly recognizes that high prices are quite as capable of being brought about by diminution of productivity (failure of a harvest, for example) as by increase of the monetary medium. In so far as productivity has diminished in these last years, it accounts for the rise of prices. How serious that diminution has been, nobody knows. But everybody knows that there has been enormous increase in the monetary medium; and all that the quantity theory says is that this increase has caused a corresponding rise of prices. As for the "meaningless absurdities," however, of which Mr. Noyes gives so curious an illustration, they exist only in his own mind. If anybody says "that prices have risen because the purchasing power of money is less" and also "that the purchasing power of money is less because prices have risen" he is not in either case speaking of causation at all. The two things are simply referred to (assuming that the volume of commodities, etc., has not changed) as different names for the same thing. It is a matter of definition, not of causation. One may, we fancy, say that strychnine is a deadly poison because swallowing a small amount of strychnine will kill a man, and also that swallowing a small amount of strychnine will kill a man because strychnine is a deadly poison, without being accused of dealing in meaningless absurdities. Neither statement, to be sure, explains anything. But neither of the statements cited by Mr. Noyes professes to explain anything. The cause of high prices, as stated by the quantity theory, is not that "the purchasing power of money is less" (which is only another name for high prices) but that the quantity of money is greater.

The other illustration we have in mind is an interview with Prof. J. Laurence Laughlin, prominently featured on the first page of a New York newspaper. "Production Costs Make H. C. of L.," says the big headline; and the article bears out the headline. Mr. Laughlin's idea is that the prices of commodities are high because, under the pressure of war need, high wages were paid to workingmen both in manufactures and agriculture in order to stimulate production, and that this had the effect of raising the prices of all commodities. But this is only another way of saying that the first thing that rose in price was labor, and that other things followed suit—which may be perfectly true, but has absolutely nothing to do with the question of the relation between prices and the supply of money. If commodities had risen first, and wages had risen afterwards in order to meet the increased cost of living, the thing that made the rise possible all round would still have been the same—the increased supply of money. As a matter of fact—and indeed of notorious fact—the events have taken place sometimes in one order and sometimes in the other. The new supply of money may flow in the first instance to any one of a hundred different points; but to insist that because it flowed first to one point rather than another, therefore the flow of money had nothing to do with the case, is suggestive of the logic of Alice in Wonderland rather than of the reasoning of political economy.

All this may sound somewhat like a kindergarten lesson in economics; but unfortunately great errors in national policy on the subject of money have again and again, in our own country and in others, been caused by failure clearly to grasp the simplest teachings of economic logic.

Limitation of the Right to Strike

A CONFERENCE of representatives of four large farmers' organizations, in session at Washington the other day, declared against the tying up of the country's transportation service by a railway strike, in the following terms:

> Those who believe that labor has an inherent right to organize a strike believe that such organizations have a right to starve the people of the cities to death, on the one hand, and to destroy the property of the farmers on the other. No such right has ever existed, and no such right exists now.

These men were dealing with a concrete situation. Their judgment, however, rests upon the belief, if they were to put it abstractly, that a possible action, not wrong in itself, may involve the probability of such disastrous results that organized society can not grant the existence of an unqualified right to commit that action. The bitter suffering caused in Kansas by the coal strike of last November led the Legislature of that State to embody such a belief in an Industrial Court law, which went into effect about three weeks ago. This law compels no man to labor against his will, but does forbid the organization and calling of strikes in industries necessary to the production and distribution of the primal requisites of life—food, fuel, and clothing. It equally forbids the arbitrary closing of such industries by the employers, as a means of enforcing their point of view in labor disputes. The court which it establishes has large power to deal with any real injustice which can be shown, either in wages or in the conditions of health, comfort, etc., under which labor must be performed. The law thus recognizes that in putting a curb upon the right to strike, the State assumes the obligation to protect labor against any harm to its legitimate interests which this curb might entail.

The incident of the Boston policemen brought home to the public mind the fact that to certain classes of public employees the right to strike can not be granted with safety to the vital interests of the people. But the multiplicity of strikes during the past year, and the circumstances surrounding some of the more conspicuous of them, have suggested to many the need of limitations in a wider field. The coal strike was called at a time when every day it lasted struck at the life of helpless thousands of invalids, aged people, women, and children, besides paralyzing industries in all parts of the land. New York City has been threatened with a strike of engineers and firemen which would have shut off the heat supply from hotels and apartment houses at the height of an epidemic of influenza and pneumonia, at the risk of hundreds, perhaps thousands, of human lives. This peculiarly brutal threat ended with the granting of the increase of wages asked. But it has had the effect of spreading and deepening the conviction that civilized society must find some way to save itself from facing the possibility, every now and then, of a slaughter of helpless citizens by wholesale as a mere incident of a difference of opinion between laborers and their employers. In other words, there must be some limitation of the right to strike, in any case where the exercise of that right recklessly endangers the life and health of the community.

There are but three possible sources of limitation to the right. The first is spontaneous self-restraint, on the part of labor leaders and the organizations which so generally follow their direction. The second is an enlightened public opinion so deeply felt and emphatically expressed that labor leaders and organizations tempted to reckless action will see at once a force against which they can not struggle with hope of success. Finally, there is the possible limitation of statute law, executed through special industrial courts or the ordinary tribunals and duly fortified with penalties.

Unquestionably the restraint springing from good sense and right feeling on the part of labor leaders themselves is the most desirable. And the conduct of the great railway Brotherhoods, through a considerable portion of their history, shows that such restraint is not an impossibility. It can be a reasonably safe reliance, however, only so far as organized labor keeps itself free from control by the lawless, destructive, and wholly un-American influences which have recently been trying to master it, and which are as regardless of the life of the innocent citizen as of the real interests of the genuine laborer himself. Of course, successful restraint along this line requires an equal display of good sense and right feeling on the part of employers too, and not of labor leaders alone.

In the absence of a positive will on the part of labor leaders to reduce strikes to the minimum, and especially a will to avoid any strike which ruthlessly endangers the life and health of innocent parties, public opinion may enforce a substantial limitation, but only if it is clear and unified in its convictions, if it makes itself audible and intelligible, and is persistent in its purpose. Both in the coal strike and the steel strike public opinion was the decisive factor in bringing them to a fairly speedy end; and if the heating strike in New York City had been allowed to get under way there is no doubt that the wrath of the suffering community would have been manifested in a sufficiently impressive way. On the whole, there is evidence that public opinion is becoming so generally enlightened and aroused that it may soon be in position, if wisely concentrated and led, to enforce a very real restraint upon the present tendency to reckless, and we may seriously add murderous, abuse of the right to strike. But to be permanently effective, it must of course be equally severe towards offenses from either side.

It will be well for society, and especially for the cause of labor, if from these voluntary sources shall come the moral restraint, rather than legal, that is needed to prevent the recurrence of such intolerable perils as have threatened the American people now several times within the past six months. The mass of the American people naturally sympathize with the laborer in his desire for an adequate wage and for proper working conditions; but with the spirit which would recklessly endanger the life and health of untold thousands, merely in order to hasten some step in this direction, no American worthy the name can have any sympathy whatsoever. Every recurrence of this peril makes the demand for effective limitation of such abuses more general and more insistent. And the demand will not finally accept denial. If reasonable limitation can not come from labor itself, either through the spontaneous stirring of humane and manly feeling in the hearts of labor leaders, or through a common-sense appreciation of the wisdom of yielding to public opinion, then the third source of relief, to which Kansas has already resorted, alone remains. Public opinion, thwarted in its desire for milder means, will at last feel obliged to put itself into the form of statute law, and to insist upon the enforcement of that law. For it has reached the point where it can no longer tolerate wholesale intimidation of the community by threats against its very life, as a mere corollary of the right of labor to accelerate the betterment of its condition.

The Church and the World's Need

THE church has been very much under fire since 1914. From the moment it acquiesced in war, even a defensive war, it was to our sentimental radicals but a broken reed. What must it do to be saved? It must use its organization to enforce a new order of humanity based on the principle, "love thy neighbor as thyself." Of any other spirituality, of the worship of God, they have nothing to say. Such mystic elements as their religion contains are to be found in the new relation which they would establish of man to man. The brotherhood of man is the heart of their desire. By means of it, not only will the less fortunately placed members of society be guaranteed equal sympathy, equal opportunity with others, but there will be a new heaven and a new earth. For this ideal they are showing a fervor, it must be admitted, not unlike that displayed by the early Christians. But how can the church help to realize it?

The church, it seems, has without protest permitted all life outside its walls to become secularized. It has withheld its authority when confronted by the authority of the vested interests, whether governmental or civil. The moral order has none of the efficiency which characterizes the physical order under the State. The church is now urged to have its say as to the status, for example, of property, which should be administered solely in the interest of society. They also urge the church to interest itself in "industrial democracy." If they meant by it only an improved relation between capital and labor, both as to the working conditions and the control of industry, the appeal would be strong to the right-minded. Unfortunately, the proponents of industrial democracy are much in the company of radical Socialists, and in the minds of these the industrial democracy hoped for is to replace our political democracy. As Mr. W. J. Ghent, one of the ablest of non-revolutionary Socialists, has recently pointed out in the Review, the Bolsheviks have had the best chance in the world to substitute industrial for political control, and yet politics is about the whole thing in the Russian régime.

The radicals of this school are careful to point out that their friendliness towards the plain people of all nations is prompted only by the Christian spirit, and that in labor unionism, Socialism, and Bolshevism it is not political creeds which interest them, but the fine democratic fellowship that has been instituted by these systems. They do not definitely say that they wish to overthrow capitalism, even though to them capitalism is not a pretty thing. They are merely suggesting apparently innocent ways by which the church can more and more put its finger on the pulse of humanity.

But the church may well hesitate when it is asked to preach, not merely principles and attitudes of mind and spirit, but a definite scheme of economic policy. It is true that the Catholic church has set up elaborate industrial bureaus, but that church has fortified itself against the danger of being swamped by too much of this activity, by means of compulsory attendance at church service, as well as by a body of doctrine utterly opposed to Socialism. For the Protestant church the risk will be much greater. The recent history of education in this country should furnish an instructive analogy. American colleges, not so long ago, used to think it proper to train the mind in channels which did not lead directly to useful pursuits in life outside. They were great intellectual reservoirs upon which we drew in preparation for little in particular but much in general. And it was supposed that this general knowledge, and the habits of thought set up, would give one a real advantage in the struggle of life. Then came the demand for the practical, by means of very special courses preparing for this, that, and the other occupation. That this system is without beneficial results, no one would say; but that it made dangerous inroads upon the essential culture of the college is evident from the sudden halt called by certain institutions. Will not the church be in similar danger if it hearkens too much to anybody who asks it to arbitrate the quarrels of industrial life and to agitate for a definite platform of public policy?

In social-welfare work most churches have all along engaged, and there is no reason why that should not be extended to meet the needs of these troublous days. But the main function of the church still remains what it has been in the past—to serve as a rallying-place and guide of the spirit. Its opportunities as such were never greater. The presence of a heightened religious feeling as an aftermath of the war is abundant the world over. It is merely waiting to be organized and directed. Let the church beware of adopting the layman's methods of molding and transmuting it. For the present danger to civilization would only be augmented by the kind of coöperation by the clergy which radical spokesmen are bidding them undertake. The clergy would be flirting with revolution in spite of themselves, and if it came, politics would, as in Russia, swallow up both industry and religion.

The problem of the clergy is that of all liberals to-day—to discover foundation-stones upon which to build up the progress of the present. And one of the solidest of these is the tradition of the church as a house of worship and of spiritual refreshment. Christ drove the money-changers out of the Temple, not because they were money-changers, but because the Temple was profaned by their transactions.

THE REVIEW

A weekly journal of political and general discussion

Published by
THE NATIONAL WEEKLY CORPORATION
140 Nassau Street, New York

FABIAN FRANKLIN, President
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER, Treasurer

Subscription price, five dollars a year in advance. Fifteen cents a copy. Foreign postage, one dollar extra; Canadian postage, fifty cents extra. Foreign subscriptions may be sent to Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons, Ltd., 24, Bedford St., Strand, London, W. C. 2, England.
Copyright, 1920, in the United States of America
Editors
FABIAN FRANKLIN
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER

Associate Editors
HARRY MORGAN AYRES O. W. FIRKINS
A. J. BARNOUW W. H. JOHNSON
JEROME LANDFIELD

The Problem of Fiume

FEW other cities on the shores of the Mediterranean occupy so strategic a position as Fiume. The possessor of this port holds the key to the economic and political development of a vast hinterland lying to the north and east, and in case of war would exercise a military control no less far reaching and effective. That this must be the case will become readily apparent if we examine the topographic features of the Adriatic coast.

Between the interior valleys of the Balkan peninsula and the Adriatic shore stand the Dinaric Alps, a broad belt of wild, mountainous land. To bring to the reader a mental picture of this region and a vivid conception of its significance in the present crisis, I can not do better than quote a description of these mountains which appeared in a book on military geography published before the Fiume controversy began to trouble Europe:

> The broad belt of mountains lying between the Morava-Vardar depression and the Adriatic shore is one of the most imposing topographic barriers in Europe. . . .
> . . . Included in the mountainous belt are ranges high enough to carry snow caps until the month of August, and the name "Albania" is believed by some to have its origin in the snowy appearance of that wild region. It is said that the "Accursed Mountains" of northern Albania and eastern Montenegro include some of the least explored lands of all of Europe. . . . Among the rocks involved in the mountain building, limestone is a conspicuous element, and its soluble nature has imposed a peculiarly forbidding aspect on the topography. Most of the rainfall passes underground through sinkholes and smaller solution cavities and then finds its way through subterranean channels to a few principal rivers, lakes, or the sea. As a consequence much of the mountain country is dry and barren, springs are far apart, and the open water courses difficult of access because deeply intrenched in rock-walled gorges. The "gaunt, naked rocks of the cruel karst country" are not only themselves of little value to mankind, but they render inaccessible and, therefore, comparatively useless, many excellent harbors on the east coast of the Adriatic.

A map representing the topography of this region shows that the mountainous belt is narrowest opposite Fiume, and broadens rapidly to the southward. This broader and more inaccessible part of the barrier, from the head of the Adriatic near Fiume to its mouth at Valona, is crossed by but two (or possibly now by three) lines of rail, all of them narrow gauge, two of them in part cogwheel mountain-climbing tracks, only one connecting directly with the central valley of Serbia, and none of them capable of serving the commercial needs of the interior. It is no mere accident that the first standard gauge railway to cross the barrier does so at the point where the mountain belt is narrowest, opposite Fiume.

The conditions which make rail traffic across the mountain barrier difficult and expensive are unchanging conditions. No standard gauge railway can ever be constructed in this region without involving steep gradients, much tunneling, great initial outlay and heavy continuing overhead expense. If constructed, every car of freight which crosses by it must pay a heavy charge, not only because of the high cost of transportation under the conditions just described, but also because there will be little local freight to help pay that cost, given the sparsely inhabited and unproductive character of the barren karst. Geographic conditions have made Fiume, situated at the head of a sea which brings cheap water transportation into the very heart of Europe and opposite the narrowest part of the mountain barrier, the inevitable economic outlet for all the northern portion of the Balkan peninsula.

If the reader will examine a map showing the railway situation, he will observe another very striking and significant fact. Almost the entire standard gauge railway system of the new Jugoslav State is concentrated in its northern part, in the latitude of Fiume. This is because the broad, fertile, and productive river plains of the country are largely limited to that region, because nearly two-thirds of the population dwells on those plains or in valleys tributary to them, and because railway construction and operation are comparatively easy and cheap, and there is a volume of both local and long distance traffic large enough easily to pay haulage costs. Thus it comes to pass that the economic life of the Jugoslav nation is in a peculiar degree concentrated in the north of the country, and that the great system of standard gauge railways upon which that economic life depends has its one and only feasible outlet to the sea at Fiume. The power which holds Fiume holds the life of a whole nation at its mercy.

But it is not only Jugoslavia which has a vital interest in the fate of Fiume. A whole vast hinterland to the north and east, including Austria and Hungary, and to some extent Czechoslovakia and parts of the newly enlarged Rumania, finds in this port a most important outlet to the sea. And all the outside world which desires to trade with central and southeastern Europe via the Mediterranean route is vitally concerned in the solution of the Fiume dispute. If the frontier between Italy and Jugoslavia be drawn as described in the President's famous public statement of last April, the two great Adriatic ports are assigned one to Italy and one to Jugoslavia. The Italian port, Trieste, could then supply the hinterland (Austria, Southern Germany, Czechoslovakia, Hungary) by a line of rail which does not have to cross the territory of Jugoslavia; and the Jugoslav port, Fiume, could supply that same great hinterland by a line of rail which does not touch on Italian territory. In other words, there would be absolute freedom of commerce resulting naturally from a choice of ports served by a choice of routes, both ports and routes being secure from possible interference or the annoying restrictions of a jealous neighbor. It would be to the interest of each country to improve its port and railway facilities, to establish the most convenient train service, and to charge the lowest tariffs compatible with a reasonable profit, in order to attract to its port the largest possible volume of business. Not only Europe, but all the world would profit enormously from such an equitable distribution of economic advantages. Conversely, not only Europe, but all the world must suffer enormously if the Adriatic settlement leaves both these ports in the hands of a single power, or establishes conditions which must ultimately result in such one-power control, or gives to a single power the control of both railways leading northward from the two ports.

What economic interest has Italy in Fiume? Even if one granted Italy's demand that a solid block of more than half a million Jugoslavs be placed under her rule in order to carry her frontier far enough eastward to take in the few thousand Italians of Fiume, who form a tiny racial island isolated in the midst of a Slavic sea, the port would remain at the most remote corner of Italian territory. Nearer the Italian peninsula would be the port of Trieste, which Italian commerce certainly would not pass by in order to reach a more remote and less serviceable port. Italy's economic interest in the trade of Fiume is negligible, whereas that of Jugoslavia and the rest of the hinterland is tremendous in quantity and vital in character.

Let us next look at the problem from the standpoint of the welfare of Fiume itself and its inhabitants. There was no natural harbor at Fiume, for the city lies at the base of a steep and straight mountain wall, and the shore slopes off rapidly to deep water. Consequently, an artificial harbor had to be constructed by building moles in water over 100 feet deep, and sometimes reaching depths of 140 feet or more. For such a costly enterprise Government support was essential, and it is estimated that between 1871 and 1913 the Hungarian Government spent 75,000,000 kr. in port improvements. Before the war the quay length was already insufficient for the actual traffic, and future plans provided for the building of a great mole farther out to sea in still deeper water. To pay for such a gigantic undertaking out of port charges would be impracticable; and the attempt to do so would raise charges so high as to drive trade to Trieste and elsewhere. More than ever must Government support be forthcoming.

What Government will furnish the capital? Will Italy, in her difficult financial situation, expend huge sums to develop an artificial port to compete with her better favored and more accessible port of Trieste? The inhabitants of Fiume know full well that Italy can not, even if she would, afford the luxury of two peripheral ports where one will serve. They know that, after struggling for months at the Peace Conference to gain additional hinterland for Trieste on the ground that it was impossible to have one of her chief ports within 12 or 15 miles of an alien frontier, Italy will not commit the folly of expending her millions in developing a port through one of the very basins of which (Port Baross) would pass, according to the Italian proposal, the selfsame alien frontier, and where an advance of a few thousand yards, instead of twelve or fifteen miles, might deliver the entire port into enemy hands. They know, further, that neither Jugoslavia nor any other hinterland country can be expected to provide capital for developing an Italian port.

One may ask: "Can not some other port serve the needs of Jugoslavia equally well?" Sebenico and Spalato have natural advantages superior to those with which Fiume was originally endowed, and are situated near the centre of the Jugoslav coast. But immediately behind these two ports lies the great mountain barrier described in the first part of this article, and presenting, as we have seen, an unchanging obstacle in the way of free commercial intercourse. The economic life of the Jugoslav people can never find an effective outlet through any of the ports south of the latitude of Fiume; for there alone is the barrier narrow and the economic life of Jugoslavia concentrated.

But there is a landlocked bay at Buccari, only a few miles from Fiume. Periodically Buccari is presented to the world as an excellent substitute for Fiume. Thus, when the American press on November 25 reported that President Wilson had rejected Italy's latest demands regarding Fiume and published at the same time an appeal from the Italian Premier urging the American people to support Italy in its controversy with the American Government, there appeared on the same day, "from a trustworthy official source," a well-timed and adroit statement to the effect that the communication presented to the American Department of State by the Italian Ambassador at Washington contained among other things, the following observation and proposal:

> As the President has shown a disposition toward the outlet to the Adriatic for Jugoslavia and desired Fiume to go to it in order to procure such an outlet for the Jugoslavs, the Italian Government proposed the following concession on its part:
>
> Italy would build a port at Buccari for Jugoslavia; while the port was being constructed and until its completion the Jugoslavs would receive special privileges and guarantees at Fiume.

Now it is difficult to believe that the terms submitted by the Italian Government contained any such proposition. The Italian Government is well aware that it could not build a port at Buccari. The bay of Buccari is admirably landlocked, but it is completely surrounded by high cliffs which descend abruptly into the water. There is no room at the shore for port installations. Road and trails must zigzag up the steep slopes to reach the outside world, and the railroad is inaccessible on the heights above. The entrance to the bay is rather dangerous, and sailing directions warn against trying to enter when the strong wind known as the Bora is blowing. In the bay itself the Bora descends from the heights with such fury that the anchorage is not considered a desirable one. The bay is entirely too small to serve the suggested purpose. The present port works at Fiume are longer and the proposed improvements are broader than the maximum length and breadth of the bay of Buccari. When Italian sources launched the Buccari propaganda at Paris, it was effectively exploded by the eminent French geographer, Emmanuel de Martonne of the Sorbonne. Cholnoky, the leading Hungarian geographer, in a scientific description of the Croatian region written before the present dispute, says: "On the coast no bays suitable for modern shipping are open. The bay of Buccari is closed like a lake, but it is very small, and it has no shores suitable for commerce. The steep cliffs descend abruptly into the green water of the little bay." If any further demonstration of the absurd character of the Buccari proposal is required, it is found in the fact that notwithstanding the location of the landlocked bay at the very doors of Fiume, and the passage of the railway within less than a mile of its shores, the Hungarian Government spent many millions in constructing a purely artificial harbor on the open coast close by.

There is no escape from the conclusion that Nature has made of Fiume the only practicable outlet for the economic life of an entire nation. If Italy can not afford to have one (Trieste) of her several important ports located within 12 or 15 miles of her frontier even when there is a mountain barrier between port and potential enemy, certainly Jugoslavia can not afford to have her one and only important port located practically within Italian territory, with only the breadth of a city street between port works and an alien neighbor. Even if open hostilities could be avoided, endless friction would be inevitable; and neither private nor Government capital could ever be induced to expend the millions necessary to develop a port so absurdly and so dangerously circumstanced.

It is clear that America, in association with France and Great Britain, has made the most sweeping concessions to Italian demands. All of the proposed new Italian boundaries lie in regions peopled by alien races. Both the natural geographic frontier and the strategic frontier have been passed in order to assure to Italy special advantages upon which she insisted. On the north a solid block of over two hundred thousand Tyrolese patriots and on the east another solid block of between three and four hundred thousand Jugoslavs have been placed under Italian rule, for reasons in which neither the principle of nationality nor the right of self-determination could play any part. Italy is assured such absolute strategic control of the Adriatic Sea that not a ship can move in its waters without her consent, for she has been offered the three keys to the naval domination of that nearly closed sea: Pola, Valona, and possession of some central group of the Dalmatian islands. Whereas the Treaty of London assigned her but a part of Albania, and that only in certain eventualities, she has now been offered a mandate over all Albania.

If, in addition to all these concessions, the American Government has been unable to concede Italy's demands concerning Fiume, it is probably because of a fear that the terms of the settlement upon which Italy insists would imperil the security of the only port of a new nation, and hence impose upon that nation a measure of economic subjection the ultimate political consequences of which would prove disastrous.

A GEOGRAPHER

Aliens and the Political Party System

[While we are happy to give to Mr. Spargo the use of our columns to make a point by which he sets much store, we do not think that the point affects the validity of the charge preferred at Albany that the present organization of the Socialist party makes possible the dictation of its policy by its alien membership.]

AMONG the several important issues raised by the trial of the Socialist legislators in Albany, none is of greater interest or importance, perhaps, than that of the relation of aliens to our political party system. It will be recalled that witnesses for the prosecution brought out the fact that the Socialist party of America, a dues-paying organization, admitted into its membership the following classes of non-citizens: (1) minors, the age qualification being set at eighteen years; (2) women, regardless of the suffrage laws; (3) aliens of every kind.

The representatives of the Socialist party made no attempt to disprove this charge; indeed, they could not do so had they so desired. Evidence was adduced to show that the local and State organizations composed, in part at least, of these three classes of non-citizens, are by party constitution given the right to control the actions of the party's elected representatives and that in practice they do so. It was clearly shown that it was entirely possible for a representative of the party in public office to be subject to the control of a majority composed in large part, or even exclusively, of non-citizens. It is possible for such control to be exercised by aliens entirely unfamiliar with the language of the country, or with its political and social institutions.

Of course, this opens up a very serious matter. Truly it is an astonishing condition that in a country based upon representative democratic government it is possible for public officials who have been elected by the votes of their fellow citizens to be subject to direction by a relatively small number of persons, a majority of whom are not themselves qualified to vote. It would be difficult to conceive of anything more anomalous than this: On the one hand, we say to certain people, "You are not qualified to share in the selection of our public officials," while on the other hand we say to them, "You are competent to share in the direction and instruction of our public officials."

As a result of the manner in which this anomalous condition has been brought to the attention of the public during the trial, a great many newspapers throughout the country have made the very natural suggestion that it should be made unlawful for a political party organization to include in its membership any class of people not entitled under our laws to exercise all the rights and prerogatives of citizenship. Various legislators have intimated their intention of introducing legislative measures to this effect, and there is undoubtedly a very large public sentiment in favor of such a proceeding. At first blush, there would seem to be no worthy objection to such a proposal. We shall do well, however, to proceed with very great caution in dealing with a problem which is far from being as simple as its first appearance indicates.

I am assuming for the purpose of this discussion that our immigration policy is to continue without any very serious fundamental change; that we shall continue to receive large masses of immigrant workers from various European countries. As in the past, these foreign workers and their families will come to us speaking languages other than our own, quite unfamiliar with our political history and institutions, each racial and national group bringing its own peculiar psychology and experience. Among those who come, there will be, as there have been in the past, aggressive, alert, and capable minorities—those who in the countries from which they come have taken part in political and economic movements. Among these will be many Socialists and labor unionists. A very serious question immediately presents itself to the thoughtful student of American problems, namely, whether such a law or rule as that contemplated would have the effect of retarding the Americanization of these groups; whether it would tend to prevent their rapid assimilation into our American political life and to prolong the period during which they remain aliens, unnaturalized and unassimilated. In other words, it is worth while asking whether the practice of the Socialist party, which is admittedly illogical and apparently indefensible, is not, pragmatically considered, really calculated to hasten the Americanization of the discontented alien worker, whose discontent may so easily prove a danger to our free institutions.

I do not want to dogmatize upon this important question in order to express a thoughtful judgment concerning it, but from my observation during many years' activity in the Socialist party I am quite certain that we must be careful to avoid hasty action along the lines now suggested in so many quarters. During the next couple of decades, tremendous issues will have to be solved in the various countries from which the bulk of our immigration comes. The strife will be very bitter and very keen, and it is quite unthinkable that the masses of immigrants coming to this country will be wholly immune and unaffected, or that they will leave behind them all their interests and feelings upon the great issues involved when they enter the United States.

I can imagine nothing more undesirable than that Socialists coming from Russia, Poland, Italy, or Hungary, for example, should be encouraged to form in this country branches of the Socialist party of the European countries from which they come. Yet that would be the almost inevitable result, I fear, of any change in our laws which forbade their admission into the organized Socialist movement of this country. They would be almost certain, I think, to continue to be members of the parties in the various countries of their origin, and would give their allegiance and their moral and material support to those parties.

From this would result evils which are by no means to be lightly set aside: In the first place, they would form, either openly or secretly, branches of parties in Russia, Poland, Italy, Hungary, and so on. Every disturbance in any one of those countries would be reflected in the organizations of that nationality here, and, as a result, our working class would be subject to unrest, having little or nothing to do with our own political and industrial conditions. Thus, in every industrial centre in the United States where there were large Polish organizations in 1915 we found the bitter controversy in the workingmen's movement of Poland seriously disturbing the Polish workingmen's organizations here.

Secondly, these organized groups of émigrés might very easily involve the nation in embarrassing difficulties with the Governments of foreign nations.

In the third place, the mere fact that they preserved organic connection with the movements abroad would form a strong bond of continued allegiance to the mother countries and would tend to defer their assimilation as Americans. Their financial support would give the officials and agents a vested interest in keeping them attached to foreign branches of the party and preventing them from turning that support to a purely American party.

In suggesting these rather serious objections, I am not guided by a priori reasoning, but by very definite and concrete facts. It is not as well known as it ought to be that the Socialist party by its free admission of aliens to membership has done much to break up just such organizations as I have described, with all their dangerous entanglements. Much has been said concerning the presence in the Socialist party of federations of foreign-speaking branches, very largely composed of aliens. There are, or were, in the party Polish, Russian, Jewish, Scandinavian, Finnish, South Slavic (Jugoslav), and Czecho-slovak federations. That some of these federations have exercised a dangerous influence on the Socialist party has been generally recognized. Nevertheless, it may be doubted whether it was anything like as great as the evil influence they would have exerted outside of the party, as component parts of European movements.

I am inclined to think that the Socialist party has, in this way, rendered the nation a very great service. It has required a long struggle, and I recall the great satisfaction with which it was accomplished in the case of Polish Socialists in America, for example. In a long conversation with Daszynski, the brilliant leader of the Socialist party of Poland, during his visit to this country a few years ago, I went over this whole matter, and found him in entire agreement. Certain Russian Socialist groups have created a similar problem.

I submit that the questions here raised are of very fundamental importance and must be seriously considered before any legislation is passed bearing upon the subject of the right of aliens to membership in a political party. Because it is a political party, and as such is under the necessity of getting votes, the Socialist party naturally uses every possible effort to compel its members to become citizens. This statement is based, not upon hearsay, but upon definite personal knowledge. The alien who is admitted to membership is urged to become naturalized as soon as possible. It is a common occurrence for applications to be rejected because the applicants have lived for a considerable time in this country without taking out "first papers." In most large cities naturalization classes have been held to prepare applicants for citizenship. It is only just and fair, when the Socialist party is being so critically examined, that the truth upon a matter of such fundamental importance should be made widely known.

JOHN SPARGO

Poetry

"Louvain Is a Dull, Uninteresting Town. . ."

"Louvain is a dull, uninteresting town . . ."
Thus Baedeker, before the War. Ay, dull!
Dull flames from burning manuscripts annul
The Past; and dull gray smoke drifts slowly down
The broad main street; and dull fat Prussians scowl
At hearing the dull moans of burghers shot,
At seeing the dull eyes of corpses, not
A moment dead . . . There, like a stupid owl,
A mother, quick with child, looks dazed about,
Nor sees the soldiers—Swaggering, rough of speech,
They spike her on their knives (one way to teach!)
And, laughing, jerk the jagged saw-teeth out,
To her dull wonder . . . Here, gray Landsturm slouch
Against the station, guarding a dull herd
Of citizens, who stare, without a word,
Agape at hell, and listen, as they crouch
In the great square—a huddled, wildered crowd—
To fire, and guns, and shrieks . . . and see their shroud.

Long since have the ashes whitened,
And the dead have long been at peace,
And the town which bore up, unfrightened,
Has witnessed the Great Release.
But the scar of her sorrow is tender,
And the light in her eyes is veiled,
Though with courage bred of the blood she shed,
And of men who never quailed,
She faces the future serenely,
No coward, and not cowed—

This "dull, uninteresting town"
Has made a nation proud!

ROBERT WITHINGTON

The President's Secretary

WHEN President Wilson fell ill, and all the news from his bedside, which had become the seat of government, had to be screened through Mr. Joseph Patrick Tumulty, the importance of the office of secretary to the President was thrown into high relief. It is a matter of public concern who fills the job. Mr. Wilson has altered during his tenure of the White House many Washington values that had come to be accepted as permanent. He has pared down the stature of many public and official figures. No figure or personality of consequence in the Washington scheme of things as it existed prior to Mr. Wilson's arrival has been so obliterated, blurred in outline, reduced in value, and decreased in functioning capacity as that of secretary to the President. No picture in the Washington gallery has offered less resistance to the effacing sponge than Mr. Tumulty. He and the President between them have made the secretaryship conform to the geometrical definition of a point: occupying a position in space but without dimensions.

At the present juncture this is an unrelieved misfortune. It has given rise to many honest apprehensions and much concern. There have been persons at Washington in office and authority, including many Senators, who have been quick to cast doubt and suspicion upon every statement or utterance or paper that has come from the White House in Mr. Wilson's name since he became ill. The personality and authority of the secretary to the President and the impression he had made upon Washington have not been such as to still these tales.

Colonel House has been the chief personal agent of the President for the past seven years. He has been entrusted with more important tasks and missions by Mr. Wilson than any other man in the United States. Now it is currently believed in Washington, and has been asserted as a fact in newspapers, champions of the administration, that Mr. Wilson does not know that Colonel House has returned from Europe and from his activities and duties on the Supreme War Council at Paris. If that important and essential piece of news has not reached the President, his secretary must take the responsibility.

Since Mr. Wilson was unable to transact public business in his office, it follows that his only channel of news of what was going on in the world that affected his responsibilities and his duties as President was through his secretary. It is equally true that the only source of news Congress, the executive officials of the Government, and the public had of Mr. Wilson's condition, his decisions, his desires, and his attitude of mind on the several immediate, pressing public problems that came to a head since last September was through Mr. Tumulty.

When Mr. Wilson collapsed on his return to Washington after his breakdown on his Western trip, the whole world was concerned and alarmed. The President had in his hands the strings of control of events in the making that affected the destinies and literally the lives of millions of people at home and abroad. It was not curiosity about an eminent figure but sheer, vital, absorbing self-interest that made a startled and apprehensive world turn to the White House for exact, truthful, trustworthy news of the patient, what ailed him, how sick he really was, and whether he would get well again.

There are officials of the Government at Washington, the Vice-President, the members of the Cabinet, who would have been charged with new and complex and difficult duties in the event of Mr. Wilson's incapacity, and who were not told in the beginning anything beyond the bulletins given out for publication in the newspapers. And these bulletins were written in such language as to give rise to the gravest forebodings. Their tone and their phraseology were such as are always reserved to give warning that hope has been given up.

A clumsy, forbidding mystery was made out of the President's illness, in which sinister rumors bred like maggots. There was lacking an articulate voice at the White House, a spokesman with enough vision and understanding to perceive his obligations, not only to the President, but to the whole people, and to tell the whole truth simply and sincerely in a way that would command respect and instant acceptance. There should be no more question about the authenticity, validity, and scrupulous accuracy of a "White House statement" than there is about a Supreme Court decision.

One great burden Mr. Wilson long ago took off Mr. Tumulty. The secretary no longer has to winnow out of an eager, pressing horde the few persons whose business is of sufficient importance to merit a personal interview with the Executive. When Mr. Wilson came to Washington, he declared that he intended to keep his office door wide open and see everybody. After a brief trial this procedure was abandoned. The office door was closed, and Mr. Wilson began to see nobody except such few persons as he sent for. It used to be that a secretary was largely measured by his tact and skill and intuition in letting in to the President only those persons whose affairs justified invasion of the Executive's time. Men have sought an appointment with the President to ask if he would allow them to test a toy motor-boat in the basin of the fountain at the rear of the White House.

One fine spring morning two Congressmen asked Mr. Taft's Secretary for an appointment to present a delegation to the President. The request was granted. On the day appointed, the two Congressmen appeared with more than two thousand men and women. They simply overran the White House offices and grounds. Mr. Taft, with great good nature, shook hands with about five hundred before giving up the job. His whole schedule of appointments for the day was hopelessly disarranged. A great many other persons suffered inconveniences. The two Congressmen could not be made to see that they had imposed upon the President or upon those others who had engagements with Mr. Taft. Of course, Mr. Tumulty never has that problem to face. There are no more White House visitors in the old sense.

The Secretary to the President can not bluff his way through. He, like the President, soon comes to be known for what he is. His value, his fibre, his quality are searchingly appraised. His relations with his chief quickly emerge. If the President trusts him, relies upon him, gives him responsibilities, or is guided by him in any degree, a good many people soon come to know it. I think a summary of the Washington verdict on the relations between Mr. Wilson and Mr. Tumulty would be, "The President is fond of Joe." But that Mr. Tumulty has ever been a counsellor, or even a trusted confidant, there is nothing to show. The relation between the two men had become fixed at Trenton, before Mr. Wilson came to Washington, and neither was prepared to make the change when it became necessary greatly to enlarge and radically increase the power and discretion enjoyed by the Secretary.

The job of secretary to the President has been made, and should be, as important as that of a Cabinet officer. A present-day secretary should be more than a mere sublimated stenographer. The office has no statutory definition. One secretary may be a good stenographer, another a politician, another a social leader, another a nonentity, another a chump. All these different varieties have flourished their brief day in Washington. The office has greatly and visibly increased in power, prestige, and importance in recent years—until the present administration—as new burdens have been thrown upon the President and as the conception of the powers of the office of the President itself has been enlarged.

There have been twenty-seven different Presidents of the United States, and all of them had one or more private secretaries, but the list of men to whom the office has proved a "stepping-stone" to further honors and an enlarged sphere of life is a short one. John Hay, John G. Nicolay, Horace Porter, Daniel Lamont, George Bruce Cortelyou, and William Loeb, Jr., are names that stand out from the list of those who have held the office. The others fell back into oblivion, or never emerged from it, even while they were in the White House, and their subsequent activities and exploits are unrecorded.

The enlarged dimensions of the office of secretary to the President were marked out by Daniel Lamont when he came to Washington as the President's secretary in the first Cleveland administration. He had been Governor Cleveland's secretary at Albany, just as Mr. Tumulty had been Governor Wilson's secretary at Trenton. Here the parallel abruptly ends. In Mr. Cleveland's second administration Mr. Lamont was Secretary of War. During his tenure of office as Secretary to the President, Mr. Lamont to some extent made it an added Cabinet position. His personal influence with Mr. Cleveland was on a par with that of any one of the seven counsellors provided by law.

After Lamont comes Cortelyou, who was confidential stenographer to Grover Cleveland, secretary to McKinley and to Roosevelt, Chairman of the Republican National Committee, Postmaster General, Secretary of Commerce and Labor, and Secretary of the Treasury in the Roosevelt Cabinet. Mr. Cortelyou was very nearly the ideal secretary to the President. He had political sagacity and experience. He knew public men, he was a competent executive, and could dispose of an enormous amount of routine business without hitch or flurry. He had an intimate and detailed knowledge of the processes of government, was careful and cautious to a degree, had a manner that inspired confidence, and was always the master of himself and of circumstances. There were never "unfortunate slips" when Mr. Cortelyou was in the White House executive offices. Everything ran as smoothly as an eight-day clock.

Loeb, who succeeded Cortelyou when that efficient private secretary went into the Cabinet, left a mixed impression in Washington. While he was secretary to Roosevelt, the newspapers continually blossomed with the headlines "Loeb Takes the Blame." It would have been the same had an archangel held the post. One of the chief duties of a secretary to the President is to take the blame when the President does anything rash or unpopular. When the secretary does anything clever, he must be equally quick in seeing that the full popular credit falls to his chief. No man had a more faithful and devoted servant, or a more loyal and untiring assistant than Roosevelt had in Loeb. Though Loeb customarily figured in the newspapers as a sacrificial goat, he was a competent man in the post and did not allow the dimensions of the office to shrink during his incumbency. He had many and curious adventures.

The line of Presidential secretaries begins with Tobias Lear and Lawrence Lewis, who served under Washington. In the beginning and even down to Garfield's time, our Presidents seem to have had a fondness for bestowing the secretaryship upon young kinsmen. Lawrence Lewis was Washington's "sister Betty's son." The letter is preserved in which the young man accepted the post; it runs in quaintly formal terms:

Fauquier Co.,
July 24, 1797.

My dear Sir:

I return you my sincere thanks for the kind invitation I received when last at Mount Vernon to make it my home, and that whilst there my services would be acceptable. This invitation was the more pleasing to me from a desire of being serviceable to you and from a hope in fulfilling those duties assigned me I should derive some improvement by them.

Untutored in almost every branch of business, I can only promise a ready and willing obedience to any instruction or command you may please to give. I should have been with you ere this, but for the unavoidable detention by my servant's running away, and that at a time when I was nearly ready for my departure. I have been ever since in pursuit of him without success. The uncertainty of getting a servant or my runaway will probably detain me until 25th of August, but not a moment longer than is unavoidable.

With sincere regard for my Aunt, and family

I remain, your affectionate Nephew,
LAWRENCE LEWIS.

Gen. George Washington.

Presidents from Washington to McKinley had private secretaries. When John Addison Porter came to Washington in 1897 to serve William McKinley in that capacity, he assumed the title of secretary to the President. The next year Congress dropped the old title and appropriated money to pay the salary of a secretary to the President. The job sadly needs to be restored to its old dimensions and authority. Its rehabilitation should be one of the pleasantest tasks that will confront Mr. Wilson's successor.

But Mr. Tumulty is not to blame. He has been cast for a rôle he was not qualified to play. His previous experience had not given him the outlook or developed the capacities that a secretary to the President must have. Mr. Wilson has got along without a Cabinet, but he should have permitted himself a secretary. A really good one can do so very much indeed to make the home bright and happy.

SPECTATOR

Correspondence

Amending the Amendments

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

The legislatures of many States West and North, with apparently no more consideration than they gave to the Prohibition Amendment, have been voting to ratify the Woman Suffrage Amendment, even including States like Maine and Ohio where the voters rejected State suffrage on referendum, and other as yet non-suffrage States like Massachusetts, Kentucky, and New Hampshire.

But in the South the States of the black belt, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Mississippi, Alabama, and Louisiana, have all either negatively or affirmatively lined squarely up against the Suffrage Amendment evidently through fear that its enforcement would involve the enforcement of the Fifteenth Amendment and the return of reconstruction conditions and negro domination in the South, while Maryland, a ninth State, seems about to vote against the Suffrage Amendment in a resolution attacking its validity on States' Rights grounds similar to those alleged by Rhode Island against Constitutional Prohibition.

Among the States unrecorded, in none of which (except Tennessee where Presidential suffrage was granted) the women now vote, and which may be considered as possible negatives, are Connecticut, Vermont, Delaware, West Virginia, and Tennessee. Four of these (or three of these, plus a negative referendum in Ohio) would defeat the Amendment.

This leaves out of account Oklahoma, a suffrage State but with strong Southern connections, and Washington, a suffrage State, where the Governer refuses to call a special session and where, if he did, a referendum could be invoked under the precedent set by the State Supreme Court when they sustained the referendum there on Constitutional Prohibition. It does not necessarily follow that the electorate of a suffrage State where the women are enfranchised would certainly vote to force the people of unwilling States to do likewise. The Ohio vote by referendum on Prohibition indicated such a possibility. The principle of Home Rule under our Constitutional form of government seems to appeal more strongly to the electors than it does to the members of the State Legislatures.

In view of the above, there seems no likelihood of the Amendment's passage before the Presidential election. A working arrangement between Rhode Island, Connecticut, and New Jersey, on the one hand, and Maryland, Louisiana, and, say, Virginia, on the other hand, might yet bring the defeat of both Amendments and save the Constitution and Home Rule. Stranger things have happened in politics before this.

Incidentally the people of Ohio invoked the referendum on Constitutional Suffrage as they did on Prohibition. The case involving the legality of their action in so doing is set for argument before the Supreme Court on March 1. This case may incidentally determine the legal effect of the other nine or ten referendums invoked on Constitutional Prohibition, and the question whether, until these referendums are held, the Prohibition Amendment has in fact been ratified by the required thirty-six States. If the referendums are sustained, rescissions in Maryland, New York, Massachusetts, and other States on Constitutional Prohibition will clearly be in order.

OPTIMIST

New York, February 11

The Russian Problem

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

You may be right about the world's Russian problem, but there are two important questions about it you have not discussed:

1. If foreign nations had given substantial aid to Kolchak, would not Lenin and Trotsky have turned "patriots" and have succeeded in rousing the fury of the peasants against him as an alleged "traitor to his country," a "tool of the foreigner," a man "bought by foreign capitalists" and the like?

2. Is it not expedient for the world to let the Bolsheviki somewhere work out their system to ruin, to a reductio ad absurdum so plain that even the fools of the world will understand its folly?

J. DE LANCEY VERPLANCK

Walbrook, Md., February 5

The Noise of Worms

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

Sometimes the occupants of the back seat now reserved for the humble Hellenist are forced to sit up and take notice of what goes on upon the stage. Possibly it is difficult to imagine that an ultra-modern poem, appallingly free and new as the newest convention in auction bridge, would strike a responsive chord, but such is the case; and yet—well, I'm not very clear on the matter, at that. Perhaps I am not, after all, vibrating in exact assonance with the author.

However, to come to the point. The poem is the seventh (mystic number! sacred to the Maiden Athena, unbegotten and herself the mother of none) and last of a group contributed by Mr. E. E. Cummings to the January Dial, beginning with the address:

> O distinct
> Lady of my unkempt adoration

two lines I greatly admire; they slip so easily from the tongue. The poet implores the aforesaid Distinct Lady, in verses wholly innocent of punctuation, to accept his fragile certain song, which has the virtue of concerning itself with the "Nothing and which lives" rather than with the "many things and which die"; the song being "taken," after taking, the Distinct Lady and her unkempt adorer are to amuse themselves observing together the perfect gesticulation of the "accurate strenuous lips of incorruptible Nothing" behind the carnival of life > where to a normal > melody of probable violins dance

> the square virtues with the oblong sins

This latter is what struck my eye, for to the Neo-Pythagoreans the virtues were square and the sins oblong. Does not Nicomachus of Gerasa tell us that "the ancients of Pythagoras' group and his successors saw the Other and Otherness fundamentally in the Dyad, and the Same and Sameness in the Monad?" And, of course, the universe has a numerical pattern, with virtue falling in the same line as Sameness, and vice on the side of Otherness, Infinity, and Infiniteness (that is why it is so attractive). Now out of the Monad come the squares and out of the Dyad the oblongs; so there you have it, square virtues and oblong sins. Unfortunately, there is no mention of probable violins in any of the Pythagorean sources; the nearest thing is Pythagoras' monochord, on which he used to practise the section of the canon, but it is not related that he played jazz for the oblong sins thereon. We shall, for the present at any rate, have to waive the probable violins.

One other matter. The poet admits that he has > been true > only to the noise of worms > in the eligible day

> under the unaccountable sun

This is a serious indictment. But would a true Pythagorean call the sun unaccountable? They had some reverence for Heraclitus, and he remarked that "the sun will not exceed his measures; if he does, the Erinyes, the auxiliaries of Justice, will find him out." No; the sun was held strictly accountable, and it was no small matter to be pursued by the heavenly Department of Justice.

And the "the noise of worms." Homer, Sophocles, Plato, and the rest tell me nothing about this important matter. May they be forgiven. Moreover, a biologist friend tells me worms don't make any noise. A chemist, however, thinks it may be a reference to the common herd. Maybe so. But since it may be presumptuous in me to turn to these high matters, I will sign myself

A NOISY WORM

Ann Arbor, Mich., February 7

Book Reviews

An American Inquiry into British Labor Conditions

The Labor Situation in Great Britain and France. The Commission on Foreign Inquiry of the National Civic Federation. New York: E. P. Dutton and Company.

THE labor situation in the United States, though far from ideal, is probably more nearly so than that of any other country, yet we are continually looking abroad for light to shine upon our dark places. It is not our fault, surely, if we find foreigners groping in obscurity as dense as our own, with little illumination to spare, and that of a kind that loses its potency when transmitted. The light of reason, evidently, is best generated at home and reveals most when shining upon familiar objects. Of course, if Great Britain, France, and other countries are industrially in advance of the United States, and we are traveling the same road, their experience may be of great value by way of warning and example; but if their conditions are different and their path of progress diverges from ours, the best we can do is to compare notes and consider suggestions, while working out our problems in our own way.

Such is, in effect, the conclusion reached by the commissioners of the National Civic Federation after spending four months—February to June, 1919—in Great Britain, with a side trip of three weeks to France, during which they interviewed innumerable people. They read diligently in publications of every kind, and did their best to get, not a mass of undigested facts, but general impressions of conditions and such an insight into the trend of events as might suggest measures for the direction and control of affairs on this side of the Atlantic. The Commission was composed of representative citizens, including Charles Mayer (shipping), chairman; Charles S. Barrett (farmer); Albert F. Bemis (textile manufacturer); J. Grant Forbes (contracting engineer); James W. Sullivan (typographical trade unionist); Andrew Parker Nevin (attorney-at-law); E. A. Quarles, secretary. The report is in three parts: the first, by Mr. Nevin, from the point of view of the public; the second, by Mr. Sullivan, as a representative of the American Federation of Labor; the third, by Mr. Bemis, from an employer's point of view.

Mr. Nevin, who sketches the situation in broad lines, is much impressed by the complex network of labor organizations in Great Britain, the difficulty of ascertaining the character, scope, and purpose of the various groupings, and the elusive reactions of public opinion to their proposals and activities. Yet it is possible to distinguish two main groups: Those who favor maintaining the existing system with a minimum of state intervention, and those who would gradually substitute national control and administration of industry in place of the present capitalistic system. Although Bolshevism scarcely exists in Great Britain, and Socialism of the school of Webb, McDonald, and Snowden is at a discount, labor demands a new status, not merely improvement in regard to wages and conditions, but recognition such as it received during the war, when the "classes" felt their dependence upon the "masses" and it was generally understood that Britons of every rank and station must stand or fall together. Yet the employers point out the fact that every right involves a correlative obligation, and they insist that labor must set its face against ca'canny, sabotage, and every other restriction of production, and work for the speedy rehabilitation of industry. In this attitude they are strongly supported by the Government, and when, in last summer's coal troubles, the more radical labor leaders struck at the foundation of the nation's prosperity, they found the public dead against them, and even the "Triple Alliance," on which they had counted, could not be brought into action.

Thus radicalism induces reaction, even as reaction causes radicalism, and in trying to avoid both extremes the British are taking their usual middle ground, the Government with the Whitley Councils, and the more progressive employers with proposals for practical coöperation in industry and a new morale based upon mutuality of effort and reciprocity of benefits. Lord Leverhulme says:

> To-day's programme must go deeper than mere attempt to prevent strikes and disputes; it must include the placing of employer and employee on the footing of equal opportunities, and of sharing the profits of trade and commerce between all the three elements necessary for production, viz., Capital, Management, and Labor. The tool-user must become joint owner of the tools he wields.

Mr. Bemis, in presenting an employer's impressions, says that British employers find it hard to take the ideal middle ground because the workers frequently break their agreements and because of the tendency of the unions to fall under the leadership of men of glib tongue and extreme views. Then, too, various economic fallacies have been imposed upon society through the joint efforts of labor monopoly and idealists who have had no experience in practical affairs. Among these are the minimum wage, the eight-hour day, the limitation of profiteering to capital, and the idea that industry can dispense with the accumulation of capital. In view of such ignorance there is urgent need of the education of all classes in the principles of economics. Certainly, this is a most promising field for economists to cultivate, and their association with hard-headed business men and hard-handed laborers should be most beneficial to all concerned.

While economists and business men are getting into closer touch with the wage-earners, a number of labor leaders, like Mr. Sullivan, have acquired a considerable knowledge of economic theory and the principles of business management, and a rapprochement is taking place between the several points of view, which augurs well for the industrial relations of the future. Mr. Sullivan thinks that British trade unionism is distinctly inferior to the American system, because of the multiplicity of organizations and the lack of centralized authority. Sectionalism prevails; the unions are not coextensive with the crafts; there is little union shop solidarity, and no complete national jurisdiction. The local unions represent living districts rather than working districts, and for general proposals or appeals there is no straight line, as in the United States, from every member on through his local and national union to the supreme court—the American Federation of Labor. Great Britain has not one but four separate major organizations, differing in type and purpose: The Trade Union Congress, the General Federation of Trade Unions, the Coöperative Union, and the British Labor Party.

This lack of unity and control has given rise to certain phases of the British labor movement which some American observers have hailed as precursors of a new social order, but which Mr. Sullivan regards as symptoms of weakness that are likely to be less prominent as the British system conforms more closely to the American model. Among these are the shop-steward movement, the Whitley councils, and the leadership of politicians and Socialists. The shop stewards became prominent during the war because of the lack of shop unity of organization and the difficulty of obtaining speedy decisions through branch unions organized by living areas. These shop stewards, many of them youthful agitators imbued with Socialistic theories, drifted away from union control, but as soon as the armistice came the regular officials asserted their authority, which was confirmed by a formal agreement on May 20, 1919. Thus, the mass of the workers in the engineering trades have repudiated both their irregular leaders and their insurrectional tactics. Similarly, the Parliamentary Committee of the Trade Union Congress has declared that it can not accept the Whitley Councils as a substitute for trade union organization; and in the Parliamentary elections of December, 1918, the Socialist leaders were defeated—all of which shows, as Mr. Sullivan believes, the growing power of regular conservative unionism, and the decline of syndicalism, Socialism, and excessive governmental intervention.

The distinguished commissioners of the National Civic Federation are evidently well pleased with their investigations in Great Britain and France, inasmuch as they have confirmed the opinion with which they probably set out, to-wit, that labor conditions in the United States are comparatively satisfactory, that our country has little to learn from foreign experience, and might have something of our own to communicate, if foreigners would seek it in a humble and teachable spirit. In this respect they present a strong contrast to another group of investigators, who have painted the British labor landscape couleur de rose as they see it in the dawn of a better and brighter day. Both groups of observers are good men and true, but it is strange to find them differing so widely in regard to the facts which they select and the conclusions which they draw. Perhaps they should have a consultation, to which they might invite one or more professional economists.

J. E. Le Rossignol

Blake Outdone

William Blake, the Man. By Charles Gardner. New York: E. P. Dutton and Co.

Since Swinburne set the pace with his high-stepping, fire-snorting, apocalyptic eulogy of Blake, there has been a kind of fury among our critical folk to imitate or surpass him. It can not be said that the latest comer is entirely free from this vacuous enthusiasm; but in general his Pegasus is under some restraint; his style at least is always definite, and his reflections are sometimes wise; above all he does more than any of his predecessors, we think, to set forth the intellectual milieu in which Blake thought his thoughts and saw his visions, and this must be reckoned the peculiar merit, no small merit indeed, of the book.

This historic sense is particularly noticeable in Mr. Gardner's association of Blake with Wesley and Whitefield and the Methodist movement generally. Like those religious revivalists, Blake was seeking an escape into the sort of enthusiasm which to Paley and the typical Anglican seemed fraught with danger; as the Methodists demanded a mysterious conversion which should put the soul into immediate contact with things divine, clothing it with the garment of Christ's righteousness in place of the "filthy rags" of its own morality, so Blake desired a sudden and overwhelming illumination which should burn away the formal conventions of poetry. As Whitefield had pungent things to say of worldly respectability, so Blake thundered in the index against all those who took reason and habit for their law. It is quite in character that he should have been indignant when Samuel Foote applied the customary epithet "hypocrite" to Whitefield. Blake, of course, did not follow the doctrine of the new birth as bound up with the revivalists' peculiar theological tenets, but in a way it is true that he was, and is, the Methodist of verse, and that his special appeal is to what may be called the Methodistic state of imaginative culture—though Mr. Gardner, who starts the comparison, would revolt from its logical conclusion.

Still more clarifying is Mr. Gardner's analysis of the relation of Blake to Swedenborg. After several pages in which the influence of the Lutheran mystic on the English visionary is discussed, the point of divergence, from which proceeded the body of Blake's symbolical writings, is thus stated:

> Now Blake, being a visionary, knew that vision depended on will, and he learnt further from Swedenborg that it depended also on state, and so, as a man's state changed, his vision changed also. Blake's state was the imagination of the poetic genius (Los), Swedenborg's the dry logical faculty of the unassisted reason (Urizen), and as Blake looked at Swedenborg's heaven and hell, he saw them approaching one to the other and finally with an impetuous rush locked in a marital embrace.
>
> This is the most significant vision of modern times, after which it is easy to judge Swedenborg. He had given for life, theology; for beauty, ashes; and instead of emancipating the modern world he condemned it to the appalling tedium of an everlasting Sunday School. The doctrine of the New Jerusalem was not half so beautiful as that of the Old Jerusalem. Christ come again in Glory was stripped of that beauty that men had perceived in His first lowly coming. Blake's indictment of Swedenborg was severe. It was also an indictment of the whole of protestant theology. The magnificent fruit of Swedenborg's action and reaction, attraction and repulsion for Blake was "The Marriage of Heaven and Hell." . . .
>
> Heaven, then, consists of the passive obeyers of reason, the religious, the good; hell of the active obeyers of Energy, the irreligious, the evil. Here let it be well marked and remembered that by the religious Blake always meant those who repress their energies or passions until they become passive enough for them to obey reason.

Blake henceforth belonged definitely to the band of rebels who were bringing in a transvaluation of all values, wherein the old hell was to be converted into the new heaven. But here again Mr. Gardner keeps an eye on the differences as well as on the resemblances. "Blake," he says, "sympathized with all these rebels in their political aspirations; but whereas their watchword was reason, and their revolt was in the name of reason, he believed that reason carried one very little way, and that the elemental deeps of life and passion that lie far under reason must be stirred and aroused if the work of rebellion was to bring forth lasting fruit." For the Age of Reason, then, which was the ideal of Godwin and Paine and Holcroft and Mary Wollstonecraft, he would introduce the age of the spontaneous imagination, and for the rights of political "liberty" he would demand freedom of the passions. "What was left for Blake? The sex question had never been dragged out into the light. The subject was unclean. Sexual morality consisted in repression. Nowhere as here does repression breed such poisonous fruits. Was not sex a part of that vital fire and passion in which Blake believed with his whole heart? Was it not true that whatsoever lives is holy? Must not there be liberty for the sexual instinct if it was to be kept clean? For the next ten years Blake became the advocate of bodily liberty, indistinguishable from free-love."

Mr. Gardner deserves full credit for his skill in showing Blake's place in the currents of his age, but when it comes to Mr. Gardner's own place the account is rather mixed; in fact, a more amazingly confused thinker you will scarcely meet outside of Alice's Wonderland. Though in a perfunctory way he calls attention to Blake's surrender of free-love theories for a humdrum loyalty to his wife, as on the whole rather the decent thing as the world goes, yet it must be clear enough that the critic's keener sympathy is with the insurgence against "repression" formulated in the "Heaven and Hell," as indeed there is the true and dynamic Blake. So it was that the English visionary "anticipated much of the better side of Nietzsche's teaching"; and, although Mr. Gardner does not emit the ominous name, he presents Blake as a pretty thorough Freudian in doctrine, and exults in him as such. We let that pass; this is not the place to show that the evil consequences of the so-called Freudian "repression" are not at all the results of restraint, or repression if you choose, but of lack of restraint in the imagination, where character really begins. The astonishing thing about Mr. Gardner is not that he should have been gulled by the current theories of self-control, but that he should have fathered these upon what he regards as Catholic Christianity. He seems to see no incompatibility between the doctrines of Freud and of Jesus Christ. For him Christ is chiefly notable as a law-breaker, and the story of the woman taken in adultery is a lesson in free-love. He reads the Gospel as Blake read it, and thinks he reads it as a good Catholic. We should like to hear Cardinal Gibbons' opinion of a Freudian Savior of mankind.

But the confusion does not end here. Our reader will gasp, but it must out.

Having combined Freud and Christ, the critic proceeds to complete his trinity by adding the name of Samuel Johnson. Oh yes, he sees the differences between Johnson and Blake:

> The truth is that Blake was not a great thinker, still less a system-builder. He ought to have found the best Christian system while young and kept to it. Then he could have lived his life of vision within coherent bounds. Clear, sharp dogma, like outline in art, would have given rest to his mind, substance to his visions, and saved him from the waste of pouring out a torrent of incoherent sayings containing scraps of gnosticism, theosophy, rosicrucianism, and almost every heresy under the sun. The master-mind in his youth who could have given him a sound system was Dr. Johnson, and he would not listen to him. How should the arch-rebel pay any attention to the arch-conservator? Dr. Johnson said many foolish things about things of no great importance: he was wise in great matters.

You will say that our critic is talking very good sense. He is, and he says other very sensible things—which is another element of his strange confusedness—and then, having said them, he adds: "Eventually Blake subscribed to the same creed as Dr. Johnson!" And so we have, as the ideal which Mr. Gardner brings to his criticism of Blake, a trinity of Freud and the Christ of Rome and Dr. Johnson; "that surely is a marvelous unanimity for such diverse minds."

"Appassionata"

Impressions That Remained. Memoirs by Ethel Smyth. 2 Vols. Longmans, Green & Co.

MUSIC-LOVERS may recall the performance of "Der Wald" in the Metropolitan Opera House in March, 1903. It was the work of an Englishwoman who is recognized on the Continent, and even in her own country, as a remarkable composer of virile and imaginative music. Durham University has conferred on her the degree of Doctor of Music, honoris causâ, a most unusual mark of distinction. Her three-act opera, "The Wreckers," has met with great success at Prague, and elsewhere. Specht, the Viennese critic, ranks her as easily first among all women composers. She has been the Tyrtæus of the feminist movement in England, and has fought in the foremost ranks of the combatants for the vote.

Now she has published her memoirs, which give the key to the woman behind these activities. They read like a first-class novel in the first person singular. The setting is familiar. The heroine is one of an old-fashioned English family of eight. Her father is a typical British officer, handsome, limited, conservative, doing his "dooty" consistently in whatever state of life into which it pleased God to call him. Her mother is half French, clever, musical, temperamental. There is a strong Irish strain in the blood. The other children find their natural spheres, the girls in marriage, the boys in the army; but Ethel develops a talent for music. Her unusual gifts are recognized by a friend of the family, Colonel Ewing, composer of "Jerusalem the Golden." At the age of twelve, she makes up her mind to follow music as a career. Here she encounters the John Bull conservatism of her father, who would almost as soon see a daughter of his go on the streets as start off by herself to study her chosen profession in foreign parts. But Ethel has a will of her own; she bides her time, and in the end, by dint of suffragette tactics, she overcomes the paternal opposition to her long-cherished plan. Full of joy, hope, and youthful enthusiasm, she sets out for Leipzig in the summer of 1877.

The Germany she soon learned to know and love was the old Fatherland of little States and little cities, simple, old-fashioned, provincial in life and standards. At once she made friends with the most desirable members of an intensely musical set. Here was the atmosphere for which she pined in England. Music was the element she lived in, the air she breathed, her daily food. Her musical friends, Livia Frege, Lili Wach (Mendelssohn's youngest daughter), and Elisabeth von Herzogenberg were certainly women of unusual talent, character and charm; their portraits attest the truth of their English friend's descriptions; and they all returned her adoring devotion. For there is nothing tepid about Dr. Ethel Smyth or her memoirs, nor will they be understood by tepid people. As a child she made a list of a hundred "passions"—girls and women to whom she would have proposed had she been a man. So it was throughout her life. Extremes rule her. To her everyone is angel or devil. When her dearest woman friend, "Lisl," refuses to write to her any more, she wonders that she did not go mad. Later she hates her. She "swarms" for her friends; she blackens the character of her enemies. Now she is a "freethinker;" now she is "High Church;" now she can listen for an hour and a half to a Scottish sermon. Her physical organization corresponds to this temperament. She is the athlete of the family, a dancer, a tennis-player, a bold rider. Her German friends call her Lebensteufel; her family, "Stormy Petrel." The doctor gives her up, more than once, and she "makes one of her usual lightning recoveries."

The crisis to which this temperament works up seems borrowed from "Die Wahlverwandtschaften." Her greatest friend, "Lisl," as she calls Elisabeth von Herzogenberg, a childless woman, becomes her second mother, writes the tenderest letters, nurses her with almost more than maternal solicitude during a severe illness. For seven years the Herzogenbergs' house is practically her home. But "Lisl" has a sister, Julia, almost as beautiful in person, but very different in character. She is as "modern" and "advanced" as "Lisl" is traditional and conservative. Julia is married to Henry Brewster, who is half French, half American, handsome, attractive, a genius, "one of the Wise Men of the World," as Miss Smyth describes him, and—eleven years younger than his wife. For them "marriage is but a ceremonial toy," a superstitious performance in a church which they comply with humorously for the sake of their friends. They regard their relation as a "friendship," dissoluble by consent at any time, when either partner meets a more magnetic affinity. Ethel visits the pair in their "ivory tower" in Florence, and proves to be the foreordained mate of "H. B." The conventional triangle is now complete. On discovering their feelings, these three remarkable persons face the situation frankly and discuss the relations involved. The wife believes the feelings of the other two to be imaginary; the man in the case remains neutral, apparently; but Ethel cuts the knot by going away. Then, although she confides the whole story to "Lisl" at once, and is not blamed by her bosom friend for her part in the tangled relations, "Lisl" soon ceases to write. When Ethel implores her to give the reasons for her silence, she gives them plainly. "The scales fell from my eyes and I suddenly saw myself not as coadjutator (sic!) in a noble reading of Destiny, but simply as the thief of some one else's goods." These two friends never saw each other again. The silence remained unbroken. No jilted lover could suffer more than this woman because another woman broke off intercourse with her. She names the period of their estrangement "In the Desert."

These confessions, put forth without the usual canting excuses, will be very differently judged by different natures. Mrs. Candid, Mrs. Grundy, Mr. Worldly Wiseman, Sir Benjamin Backbite will do after their kind. Lovers of gossip and scandal will fasten on the indiscretions of the book. Readers of finer mould, while regretting the cruel necessity which drove the writer to do public penance in the market place, will believe and condone. No one can fail to be drawn by the record of that vanished Germany, the writer's spiritual home, and the unconscious delineation of her own character by a woman of genius. The psychologist will study these fascinating pages for data of the artistic temperament, its force, its egotism, its limitations, of which it is not itself aware. But no one who begins the book can lay it aside until he reaches the end.

Doubles and Such

THE WORLDLINGS. By Leonard Merrick. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.
THE CARRINGTON'S OF HIGH HILL. By Marion Harland. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.

THE writer of the introduction of this newest volume in the limited edition of Merrick's works does his best not to be left altogether behind by his distinguished colleagues in the rather odd business of introducing one of their most distinguished colleagues to the world. Mr. Neil Munro has done his best, one may be sure, to persuade himself that "The Worldings" is a fine sample of Merrick. "It has in it," he says, "almost every element of Merrick's attractiveness as a tale-teller, save perhaps his humour, here kept severely in restraint as a quality out of key in a story founded on 'one of the passionate cruces of life, where duty and inclination come nobly to the grapple.'" But the truth is, a Merrick without his humor would be like a colorless sunset or an odorless onion—you might as well call it something else. Merrick may have taken demure satisfaction in turning out a romantic shocker without betraying by the quiver of an eyelid that the author was conscious of its limitations. But for a few opening bits of description of life at the South African diamond fields, which are said to be remarkably realistic, the story is melodramatic stuff and nonsense.

But this is to say that it deals in the less perishable materials of deliberate make-believe. The pauper suddenly enriched, the peasant whose physical double is a prince and who is destined to play the princely part, the long-lost son, the criminal nobly (if vainly) offering himself to justice—what older or better matter for romance can be found—romance, at least, of the mechanical sort? Our hero-villain's second intention, of course, is sufficient. It proves him to be the fine fellow he has seemed, and altogether worthy of the heroine (he has already married her, to be sure, in this instance) —the heroine who doesn't care whether his name is Philip or Maurice so long as He remains Him. . . . "The Worldlings" was written, it appears, soon after "Cynthia" and "The Actor-Manager," wherein Merrick kept as close to reality as might be without imperiling his status as a story-teller—which, unlike many of his contemporaries, he never permits himself to forget. Mechanical romance offered a restful field for the moment. His own romantic field he was to discover later on, in company with the questing Conrad and the sportive Tricotrin. On the whole, we miss the feeling that most of these collected volumes have given us —of having been in contact with something very nearly perfect in its kind. The mechanism is not sufficiently concealed; and the suspicion persists that for once this skillful and little rewarded artist may have let himself down to a pot-boiler and have put no more effort into it than he felt such work demanded. The Maurice-Philip person is a good enough puppet, the action is strung upon a good enough plot. It is all good enough, and barely good enough, for its purpose.

To the better sort of mechanical romance belongs also "The Carrington's of High Hill." As a tale of the South of Mrs. Terhune's own girlhood, it is full of what may as well be called realism, the honest portrayal, however colored by memory and temperament, of a vanished social and political estate. The author retains an inherited reverence for the "old-school" manners and standards with whose outward appearance, fiction, and the stage have made us overfamiliar as with something quaint, that is, both lovable and more or less absurd. Therefore her types have life, recognizable as they are; the Southern aristocrat in his stately home; the great lady of the old régime who is absolute ruler of her little world; the faithful retainers, and so on. And therefore her plot, with all its elaboration, stands up as well as a plot may which is so patently worked out according to formula. The pride of the Carrington's gives a certain plausibility to the mystery which surrounds the family skeleton in its closet. Its existence is denied and its whereabouts known only to one person; but its bones may be heard faintly rattling, almost from the first moment of our setting foot on High Hill. Paul Carrington, twenty years since, has brought to his Virginian home a beautiful bride from New Orleans. She is a belle and a flirt and worse. She sets the neighborhood by the ears, openly antagonizes Madam Carrington, and flaunts off to New Orleans, where she presently dies. So, at least, it is understood at High Hill, as well it may be, since her body is supposed to have been brought back and buried there. But she has really eloped with another man. For many years Paul Carrington carries the burden of the secret: not even his lady mother knows. A perfectly fitting mate for him is at hand; but of course he cannot think of her. Then comes private news of the runaway wife's death, and the way seems smoothed for happiness and peace at High Hill, after all. But this is not to be too readily permitted by the plot-maker. With the aid of a confusion of identities (turning partly upon physical likeness increased by, as it were, a forged strawberry-mark), a tense situation is brought about. Of course it is the wicked wife herself who has turned up, intending malice. But after two false alarms, death does really take her in time to prevent the worst. And now the tables are turned, for it is Madam Carrington who holds the key to the real skeleton-closet, and it is her son whose later happiness she resolves, must and shall be founded in a way, on false premises. Neither he nor his second bride nor the daughter of the guilty woman may ever know the depths into which she would have plunged them. "No other excepting ourselves," cries Madam Carrington, "must ever know this story. It is as unbelievable as it is monstrous and revolting. If known it would take rank with county legends for a century to come. I will not have my son's name blackened by the tale. . . ." So in a fine flurry of family pride, triumphant virtue, and impeccable manners the tale comes properly to a close.

H. W. BOYNTON

The Run of the Shelves

THE results of forty years of immersion in all branches of occult research have been given to the world by Mrs. Violet Tweedale in "Ghosts I Have Seen" (Frederick A. Stokes Company). According to the paper jacket, Mrs. Tweedale "vouches for the truth of whatever she narrates." We had long waited for the disappearance of uncertainty from this troubled theme. The evidence is plentiful almost to satiety, and Mrs. Tweedale's security and content are so inflectious that the book affects one like a picnic in the unseen world. The style, even in horrors, is cosy; Mrs. Tweedale is perhaps the first writer on record to handle themes of this kind purringly. Hers is a mind which colloquies with Browning, the production of several novels, acquaintance with countesses and duchesses by the score, war-work, arrest in Austria have left engagingly, or—if one's temper be morose—enragingly infantine. Spiritualism is a field in which, ordinarily, the believer's faith is hateful to the skeptic and the skeptic's unfaith provoking to the believer. Mrs. Tweedale's faith can smile at the adversary.

Mrs. Tweedale has met scores of spirits, but the motives which give rationality to the meetings of living men, the exchange of services, of news, of sympathy, are practically never found in these encounters. The evident fondness of spirits for Mrs. Tweedale's company has not smoothed the way for even two minutes of rational intercourse. If communications be genuine, they are almost certainly fifty years old, and when we reflect that both the dead man and the living often belong to a race which has perfected in the interval the ocean-cable, the telephone, and wireless telegraphy, the backwardness in the psychic field remains remarkable. Moreover, we may suppose that a ghost, like a man, may be gauged by his power to contribute to our prosperity or pleasure, and the failure of Mrs. Tweedale's ghosts to do anything that would make a human being in their place attractive or useful is conspicuous. Indeed, a human being, behaving as they do, would be subject to arrest for trespass or vagrancy at the hands of the nearest constable. They may have reserves of rationality which differ totally from ours, and so may lunatics—a possibility which has not prevented the erection of asylums. The notion of playfulness which obtains among ghosts may be inferred from the fact that Mrs. Tweedale attributes the mysterious appearance of a swarm of gray moths on her bed to a practical joke carried out by a magician in the spirit world.

Mr. Charles Fort has, after twelve years of patient research, finished his "Book of the Damned" and Messrs. Boni and Liveright have published it. With enormous industry the author has collected accounts from newspapers, scientific reviews, books, personal statements, gossip, and traditions of all the things, commonplace or weird, which have fallen on the earth. "Things that, without the formidable mass of evidence adduced, would be incredible, support the author's argument"; thus, the publishers. Apparently there is a persistent and tremendous dropping from the sky of all sorts of animal, mineral, and vegetable things. It is Mr. Fort's purpose to prove that these missiles are hurled at us by the inhabitants of other planets who take this method of letting us know of their existence. The reader will probably suppose that the "Damned" is Mr. Fort. The "Damned," however, prove to be this "procession of data" and the author's ingenious hypothesis which Dogmatic Science has excluded from the kingdom of heaven. It is a curious collection which may tend to increase the placidity of a scholar's postprandial pipe.

It is a cosmopolitan group of artists that Martin Birnbaum passes in review in "Introductions" (Frederic Fairchild Sherman). Aubrey Beardsley, Charles Conder, Charles Ricketts, Charles H. Shannon, and John Flaxman are British, as is by recent adoption Edmund Dulac. Paul Manship, Albert Sterner, and Robert Blum are Americans. Léon Bakst and Maurice Sterne are born Russians. Jules Pascin is a Bulgarian, Kay Nielsen a Dane, Elfe Nadleman a Pole, and Alfred Stevens by birth a Belgian. These essays were originally written as leaflets for so many exhibitions conducted by Mr. Birnbaum. The task was that of æsthetic toastmastership. To be graceful, informing, and readily understood was the problem. The author has solved it with sure literary tact and offers as well a fine criticism which was not in the bond. With a few exceptions he deals with eccentric forms of art. Generally he has kept his perspective in a criticism that readily leads to loose superlatives. It seems to us that he gives Bakst, Dulac, and Pascin more than their due of praise. But in the main he keeps his proportions, writing in a valediction which is in itself a criticism of the most comprehensive kind, "We need something to liberate us from the tyranny of our more or less ugly mode in art." Perhaps the best of the brief essays is the Conder. It has the daintiness of its subject. Of most importance is the elaborate essay on John Flaxman's classical drawings. It reveals noble and very able qualities of draughtsmanship which are obscured in the familiar engravings. The essay is so good that one could wish that Mr. Birnbaum might oftener let himself out. It is a pleasure to come in touch with the newer movements under a guide who eschews jargon and keeps his head. The book is beautifully printed in a limited edition, fully illustrated, and bound in neat cartridge boards.

"Près des Combattants" (Paris: Hachette) would be an interesting war book whether or no, because of its author, M. André Chevrillon, who always adorns whatever he touches. The fact that it has to do with the western front even before we came into the struggle may militate against it at this rather late day. We refer to it mainly on account of its dedication, which runs as follows:

En pieux souvenir de l'ami qui conçut tout le sacrifice et qui l'accomplit, Raymond Aynard, engagé volontaire, tué à l'ennemi, à Renneville près Verdun, Mars, 1916.

The following extract from a private letter throws more light on the calvary of Raymond Aynard and offers another example of the greatness of soul of so many of the élite in the recent war:

My friend was a French diplomat who held an important post in Egypt, where he was Commissaire Français de la Dette Egyptienne. He was fifty years old, a married man, the father of four young children, and though the authorities at our Foreign Office insisted on his staying at his post where he was useful even in time of war, he thought that he could be easily replaced there and was not satified till he was allowed to come to France and enlist. On account of his age, he was set to the teaching and preparation of young recruits somewhere near Lyons. (He had reached a certain rank—sergeant, I believe—thirty years before when doing his military service.) This did not satisfy him, and he had no rest till he succeeded in being sent to the front as lieutenant attached to a divisionary staff. But even this was not enough for him, and finally he managed to be sent nearer Verdun at the head of a company. This was in February or March, 1916, a few days after the terrible German push, which, at first successful, had begun. He now saw what was coming for him, and on the morning of the day of his death he said to another officer who miraculously escaped the same fate: "Les Boches ne m'auront pas vivant." His idea of military duty was very stern and he didn't believe in allowing oneself to be made a prisoner. His body remained some time in "no man's land." Finally he was found by a German officer, who sent to Mme. Aynard a beautiful poem that he had found in my poor friend's pocket-book—a poem which expressed his idea of duty and his acceptance of sacrifice.

For children up to fourteen years the staff of life is not bread, but milk. Even adults can get along better without bread—especially white bread—than without milk and the other dairy products, butter and cheese. It is therefore a matter of extreme importance to check the tendency to use substitutes for milk which prevails because of its high price. High price or low, the consumption of milk should not be cut down. Mr. Frederikson, who is a graduate of the Royal Danish Agricultural College, and has had forty years of experience, frankly declares, in his Story of Milk (Macmillan), that, compared with the cost of other food, milk has remained remarkably cheap. "Milk and its products should be used to a much greater extent than heretofore," he says, "not only as a drink, but in the daily cookery," where it partly takes the place of meat, and thus justifies our outlay for it.

While the amount of milk for various uses produced in the United States in 1917 was over 84,000,000,000 pounds, this is only a fraction of what it should be. Increasing the number of cows is one way, but a better way is to improve the cows. A good Holstein yields 7,000 to 10,000 pounds of milk a year, but the best Holstein yields up to 30,000—nearly 46,000 pounds. A Jersey has been known to yield her own weight of butter—900 pounds in one year!

In less than two hundred pages Mr Frederikson tells all about dairy cattle, composition of milk, control of bacteria, pasteurization, cream and ice-cream, butter and buttermilk, condensed and evaporated milk. Fifty pages are devoted to American and European cheese-making.

Sales management, as distinct from salesmanship, is now being taught at a dozen colleges and universities, notably Dartmouth, which has a "professor of marketing," and New York University. The curricula of many high schools include the subject. For this specialized subject a text-book has just appeared under the title "Modern Salesmanship" (Appleton) by J. George Frederick, President of the Business Bourse and a Governor of the New York Sales Managers Club. The book, with its thirty-four chapters and 382 pages, is the first of its kind to appear with the imprint of a book publisher, and is already in use as a college text-book. The treatment of the subject is complete and competent and based on a wide experience of actual conditions.

Old King's

CAN New York have any concern in hearing that a little college was burnt to the ground the other day in Nova Scotia? If New York ever thinks of its past, the news should recall a vivid page in its history.

Seventeen-eighty-three was a great year for the Thirteen Colonies. The long, dragging, uncertain war for independence was won. Peace had come at last, with honor. The treaty was signed. It only remained to sweep out the odds and ends of the long campaigning from the country. King George's redcoats were gathered together in New York, and, with them, thousands of native Americans, who had fought on the losing side, or sympathized with it, undesirable citizens awaiting deportation. These were the hated Tories.

All that year the little eighteenth-century town at the foot of Manhattan island was busy despatching transports, slow, comfortless sailing vessels, loaded to the gunwale with homeless refugees. Some went to Britain, some to the West Indies, but most were bound for the nearest colony which had not joined the Thirteen in throwing off the yoke—Nova Scotia. That year, twenty-five thousand men, women, and children, whose fault was loyalty to their king, were dumped in the northern wilderness, which the jeering whig journalists nicknamed with justice "Nova Scarcity." At once those exiled Americans manifested the national energy. They split the old province in two, and carved out a separate Government of their own. They built their capital at the mouth of a great river, and organized it on the model of the city which had cast them out, as it is this day. They built another city—since vanished—of ten thousand inhabitants, wherein, on election day, King Street was so crowded that one might have walked on the heads of the multitude. They founded soon after a monthly magazine, a college, and a bishop's see. The college is the subject of my story.

On the frieze of Columbia's cathedral-like library a stately inscription proclaims orbi et urbi, that the metropolitan university springs from King's College founded "when loyalty no harm meant," in the reign of King George the Second, otherwise Dapper George, the fat little fighting German monarch (he could swear fluently in English) who charged on foot with his troops at Dettingen. The visitor to Columbia will also note the motif of the king's crown appearing frequently in the decoration of that republican seat of learning, and will not be surprised to learn that the oldest society in the university perpetuates in its name the same reminiscence of its monarchical past.

In "Nova Scarcity" those exiled New York Tories founded a second King's College, and fortified it with a royal charter under the sign manual of George the Third. They would not plant their seminary for ingenuous youth in the wicked capital, where the business of half of the town was to make rum, and the business of the other half was to drink it, where a full brigade of troops always lay in garrison, where a squadron of the King's ships was always stationed, where soldiers and sailors spent their pay and prize-money in the fearless old fashion, and Princes of the Blood led the dance. They pitched on a beautiful site in the innocent country some forty miles away, outside the pretty hamlet of Windsor. Every visitor to-day approves the wisdom of their choice. The rolling country has the look of an English shire. Here two tidal rivers join their waters; and twice a day they fill with "Fundy's orange tide." A fort stood on Blockhouse Hill, and was still a military post. About were several gentlemen's estates with their tenantry. It was a most desirable spot for a college; and there, on a hill facing south, the Tories built their Tory college, the first planted outside the British Isles in what is to-day the British Empire. That is its pride. For a century or more, it stood on the hill with its "bays" and its central pillared portico amid its tall guardian elms, in simple dignity.

As far as possible the founders made a little Oxford of it. Residence, chapel, subscription to the Thirty-Nine Articles were compulsory. The Archbishop of Canterbury was Visitor. Though it is not recorded that he ever discharged his function, Tom Moore visited it in 1804, and left a memento of his visit, a Lucian with an inscription. Kingsmen were forbidden to frequent the mass, or any dissenting meeting-house, or conventicle, lest they should imbibe irreligious or republican principles. William Cochran, who had been professor of Latin and Greek at King's College, New York, could not be made president; he was but a graduate of Trinity College, Dublin, and the Governors desired an Oxford man. Thus "old King's" came into being, the child of a still older American "King's" in order to promote "classical learning, divinity, and belles lettres." For a century and more it has kept its antique standard flying valiantly, despite many a storm.

Time enriched the little college. It educated the scions of provincial gentry. Here Haliburton studied, the creator of "Sam Slick," and Colonel Jack Inglis of the Rifles, who held Lucknow through the Great Mutiny, and Fenwick Williams, whose defense of Kars in the Crimean War was the admiration of all professional soldiers. A Gothic library was built, which also served as a hall for Convocation—Encaenia, with the proceedings in Latin. A picturesque little chapel was erected in memory of a beloved teacher. A library was gathered; and it is a library which might make the wealthiest biblomaniac's mouth water for its incunabula. Aldines and Elzevirs, examples from the presses of Plantin, Fraben, Etienne, editiones principes of Plato and Aristotle, the "Speculum Vitæ Humanæ" of 1471, the Jenson Bible of 1476 are among the treasures of "old King's."

Thus was an institution of learning planted, and thus did it grow, fulfilling into destiny as an oasis in the desert, a light in darkness. As the years passed, memory and association endeared it to many men. Its housing became sacred and venerable. The time-honored walls were a landmark on which all eyes rested with pleasure.

Now calamity has befallen "old King's"; the main building is a pile of ashes. Only the tall old chimneys remain standing.

ARCHIBALD MACMECHAN

Drama

Eugene O'Neill—The Théâtre Parisien

MR. EUGENE O'NEILL achieved a measure of reputation some months ago by a volume of rude seafaring, one-act plays in which grimness was qualified by literature. In "Beyond the Horizon," now shown to the public at the Morosco in the diffidence of special matinees, Mr. O'Neill has essayed a three-act play. The step from one act to three in playmaking is a long one, and Mr. O'Neill has slipped—has even fallen—in the undertaking. It is not merely that he views the three acts as a sum in addition, though that error would be grave enough, but that he does not tax himself to make the items in the sum dramatic. He has not only failed to give us a three-act play or three one-act plays; he has failed to give us even a one-act play with excess baggage. The main situation is time-worn, but still vigorous—two brothers and a woman. Will it be believed that from the first word of the play to the last there is not a vestige of conflict between the two brothers, and that the passion of the younger brother is completely and finally cured in the interval between the first and second acts? This removal of the combustibles at the very moment when we are prepared to kindle the fire is an act of self-denial hardly matchable in drama. Indeed, the characteristic of Mr. O'Neill's play, which does no justice to his faculty, seems less the mere absence of drama than a fear of drama, a hostility to drama, a vigilance and persistence in the closure of every loophole by which that disturbing and incendiary force might creep into his play.

It is time to be a little more particular. Of two farmer's boys, Robert and Andrew Mayo, Andrew has been destined to husbandry and to Ruth Atkins, Robert to poetry and the sea. Ruth finally chooses Robert, and a reversal of the old assignment sends Andrew to the mast and Robert to the furrows. Furrows to dreamers are but ruts, and, like ruts, they are unproductive. Labors and losses multiply. Nothing encourages love for a man of affairs like marriage with a dreamer. Ruth tells her husband that she loves Andrew. A response on Andrew's part would create a dramatic situation; Mr. O'Neill has carefully averted that response. The disclosure of Ruth's passion to Andrew would be in itself dramatic; Mr. O'Neill is vigilant to prevent that disclosure. Andrew returns in the middle of Act II to do—exactly nothing. He returns in the middle of Act III to repeat the achievement. A fortune which he has promptly and pointlessly accumulated in the interval has been promptly and pointlessly lost. Meanwhile Robert and the farm have laid each other waste. His child and his mother die; he dies himself after a long detail of symptoms, corporal and mental, in the third act, which might have instruction for an audience of medical students or nerve specialists.

It will be seen that some of this material is touching. It would have moved me strongly in a real play; even in "Beyond the Horizon" it did not leave me quite unmoved. The public, as "John Ferguson" showed, is keenly sensitive to domesticity in strong, primitive situations, defecated of the odor of flannels and of cookery. Mr. O'Neill's attitude, however, is ambiguous, or, perhaps, twofold. It is difficult to pardon the sentimental and the brutal in the same person; Mr. O'Neill subjects me to that difficulty. I call him sentimental in the old-fashioned prettiness of the relation between brother and brother and father and child, though I personally enjoyed both those relations, and I call him brutal when he allows a generous man, on almost no discoverable ground, to say "God damn you" to a widow beside her husband's body not two minutes after his death. One should be north wind and zephyr at the same time.

The actors were drawn from the casts of the "Storm" and "For the Defense," and the performance gained vastly by their evident, and to my mind, rather astonishing, sympathy with their parts. Mr. Edward Arnold won our affection as Andrew Mayo. The hesitating vacancy of Mr. Richard Bennett's smile as Robert Mayo sometimes nearly undid for me the influence of his finely sympathetic voice. He flattened Robert Mayo too much, yet the picture as a whole was not unmoving, and the pathology in Act III was adroit. Miss Helen MacKellar's Ruth Atkins impresses me more and more as sound, sound in the featheriness of Act I, sound, again, in the second act, in the small raspingness which makes frail women deadly, soundest of all in the apathy of Act III with its alternate stripes of petulance and compassion. Miss Louise Closser Hale's portrayal of the termagant was brilliant; in this subdued play its brilliancy was almost glaring. Miss Mary Jeffery as Mrs. Mayo had supernal moments in Act I.

I was actually disappointed to read the words "Farewell Week" on the programme of the Théâtre Parisien for Tuesday night, February 10. I have a pleasure in French plays and French actors which is almost independent of their merit; in being French, they have obliged the world. Not that merit has been lacking in the Théâtre Parisien. The acting, in particular, has impressed me as supple, swift, and joyous; I could hardly have asked for anything better than the rendering of "Le Coeur a ses Raisons," a one-act comedy by de Flers and Cailavet, on Tuesday night. The concurrence, or consentience, of their acting is a pleasure to Americans. Possibly the American spectator feels it even more than the French; it is the foreigner who sees a race as an ensemble.

The managers of the Théâtre Parisien should be conversant with the taste of their public. The public, however, is largely feminine in its quality as in its make-up, and remains in a fashion a mystery to the managers as a woman remains a mystery to her husband. This remark is incidental; what I am trying to say is that, if the taste of the Théâtre Parisien's public has been correctly divined by its servants, that taste is very narrow and somewhat trivial. I say nothing of tragedy or the classics, but a public for whom "Le Demi-monde" and "L'Aventurière," and "Le Flibustier," "La Princesse Lointaine" are too substantial is not a public to which we shall feel obliged to explain our own indifference to Mr. Shaw and Mr. Barker. The Théâtre Parisien presents only love-comedies in that lightest and gayest form in which love is reduced to bagatelle, almost to gimcrack.

The plays are literary in a sense, but they cling to the border of literature; they are the fringe on its skirt, not always undefiled by the dust of the pavement. Even on literary grounds some of the selections are doubtful. Is French workmanship in operettas so un-French that one must really accept, in "Le Poilu," a two-act piece in which the tie between the acts is weak by comparison with like ties in "Buddies" or "My Golden Girl"? A comedy of intrigue lives and moves in the suppleness of its articulations. What shall we say of the maladresse of M. Paul Gavault, who in "Ma Tante d'Honfleur," allows a visitor at a country house to describe herself falsely as the wife of another visitor without securing in advance either his absence or his complicity? The comedy is doubtless amusing enough, and for every kind of dramatic offense a laugh is amnesty on Broadway. We looked to the French colony in our midst to teach us something better than the power of our own example.

O. W. FIRKINS

Music

At the Lexington—"The Blue Bird"—Caruso's Indisposition

WITH Titta Ruffo, Bonci, Galeffi, Raisa, and Galli-Curci in the casts of the Chicago Opera Company, great singing has been heard lately at the Lexington. At times the singers have excelled themselves and stirred audiences as they are very rarely stirred here.

Titta Ruffo, with the "Drinking Song" in Ambroise Thomas's highly un-Shakespearean "Hamlet," amazed them by his vocal virtuosity. His power, his tones, and, more than all, his breath control—which allows him to hold notes almost indefinitely—were, in their way, as remarkable as Bonci's more delicate graces. Rosa Raisa, though less finished in her art, thrilled all who heard her.

The only novelty (or, rather, seminovelty), with the exception of a ballet by Felix Borowski, the Chicago critic, which has been added to the repertory at the Lexington, is "Hamlet," a work on which I do not care to linger. It is a futile effort to achieve the impossible and, but for the "Drinking Song" (a gross offense to Shakespeare and Ophelia's "Mad Scene") it would long years ago have been lost in forgetfulness.

Before these lines get into print, the English version of Wagner's "consecrational festival play," the revived "Parsifal," will have been presented at the Metropolitan, where, let us hope, with the new words of Mr. Krehbiel, it will have reconquered the high place to which the sublimity of its theme and the beauty of the music entitle it.

Meanwhile, may I, though late, say a word about Albert Wolff and his arrangement of "The Blue Bird"?

Of all the dramas which we owe to Maurice Maeterlinck, this "L'Oiseau Bleu" to me seems the least surely suited to the opera stage. Unless you know the work by heart (as many do), and can follow all the ins and out of Maeter-

(Continued on page 188)

Built To Last!

In 1898 a Crocker-Wheeler motor was installed on a printing press for the New York Life Insurance Company.

Although used continuously for 22 years, this C-W motor is still in use and is giving as good service as when first purchased.

Quality does pay in the long run!

President

Crocker-Wheeler Co.

Ampere, N. J.

New York
Boston
Syracuse
Chicago
Cleveland
Binghamton

Pittsburgh
Newark
New Haven
Philadelphia
Baltimore
San Francisco

Tiffany & Co.

Diamond and Gem Merchants

Pearls Diamonds Jewelry
Silverware Watches Clocks
China and Stationery

Efficient Service by Mail

Fifth Avenue & 37th Street
New York

Just Published

Modes and Morals

By Katharine Fullerton Gerould

"Katharine Fullerton Gerould is a name that will soon rank high in the hall of fame of American literature—of any literature which demands power and sincerity, which demands themes that are largely human and the ability to present them strongly."—The Bookman.

Mrs. Gerould, already well known as the author of some of the most notable short stories of the last decade, has also achieved a remarkable recognition as an essayist on conditions and questions of the day. This volume collects for the first time a number of her extremely clever papers. The contents are:

The New Simplicity
Dress and the Woman
Caviare on Principle
The Extirpation of Culture
Fashions in Men
The Newest Woman
Tabu and Temperament
The Boundaries of Truth
Miss Alcott's New England
The Sensual Ear
British Novelists, Ltd.
The Remarkable Rightness of Rudyard Kipling

"The book is as charming as it is clever, as wise as it is witty."—Brander Matthews in The New York Times. $1.75

Theodore Roosevelt's Autobiography

This is a new edition of the immortal autobiography of the great man—perhaps the best source of all to turn to for an understanding of his remarkable qualities and his amazing career. Illustrated. $5.00

CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS
FIFTH AVE. AT 48th ST. NEW YORK

Attractive offerings are made during the Midwinter Book Season.

Established 1851 Nassau and Pine Streets

The Hanover National Bank

OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK

WILLIAM WOODWARD President
E. HAYWARD FERRY Vice-President
SAMUEL WOLVERTON Vice-President
JOSEPH BYRNE Vice-President
CHARLES H. HAMPTON Vice-President
HENRY P. TURNBULL Vice-President

WILLIAM E. CABLE, Jr., Cashier
J. NIEMAN Ass't Cashier
WILLIAM DONALD Ass't Cashier
GEORGE E. LEWIS Ass't Cashier
JAMES P. GARDNER Ass't Cashier
FRED. A. THOMAS Ass't Cashier

FOREIGN DEPARTMENT

WILLLIAM H. SUYDAM Vice-President and Manager
ROBERT NEILLEY, Ass't Manager
FREDERIC A. BUCK, Ass't Manager

Capital $3,000,000 Surplus and Profits $19,000,000

(Continued from page 186)

linck's dialogue in the French original, it is bewildering to the listener and spectator. The eternal wanderings of the characters in pursuit of happiness are undramatic. There are few climaxes of interest in the story. As for the somewhat childish dialogue of the Belgian, it loses its effect when poorly sung. And of the artists who take part in the performance, only six—Flora Perini (Light), Florence Eastman (Mother Love), Léon Rothier (Father Time and Gaffer Tyl), Louise Bérat (Granny Tyl), Raymonde Delaunois (Tyltyl), and Paolo Ananian (Daddy Tyl), are clearly audible.

As for the music, although not a great achievement—for only at moments has it real originality—it gives much promise and is distinguished by unusually true scholarship. The disjointed words and vagaries of the libretto do not allow the composer honest opportunities for music—except at one point, in the "Farewell," in the last act. Mr. Wolff, who was quite conscious of this fact, has done his utmost to atone for what is lacking in the play itself by means of connecting intermezzos and introductions, of which two are masterly. But the chief beauty of his work—and the one episode which, I believe, will live long after the Bachian interlude and other passages in this "Blue Bird" have been forgotten—is the composer's setting of that "Farewell" scene. It has a poetic glow, a charm and grace which haunt me still. And, with submission to some critics who have whistled Mr. Wolff's score down the wind, it seems quite original. The man who could invent the exquisite music which accompanies that scene should have a future.

"Owing to a slight cold, Enrico Caruso was unable to appear last night at the Metropolitan."

This brief announcement in the daily newspapers set many thinking. The Italian tenor means so much to the Metropolitan that, if (which heaven forbid) he vanished even for a month or two from that institution, its prestige might (and would) be gravely compromised.

We know, of course, that, once in the history of the Metropolitan, Caruso had to take a lengthy rest. We know that, notwithstanding that sad fact, the opera house kept open. But the announcement I have quoted, none the less, meant more to some—and particularly to the rich backers of the Metropolitan—than a temporary embarrassment.

Suppose (for, after all, such things may happen) the chief "star," the very pivot of the great opera house, dropped out some day? His health is marvelous. His vitality is exceptional. But other tenors in the past have failed quite suddenly, Duprez, for instance. Could Martinelli or our own Orville Harrold step like a god from the machine to replace the "star of stars"? Would spoilt subscribers, used to hearing Caruso twice each week, accept either of those artists as permanent substitutes? And even if they did, what would it prove?

There are some of us who think, and very rightly, that a great institution like the Metropolitan should not depend too much upon one singer. They hold that there should always be another "star," of equal magnitude, as an alternative. They go so far, indeed, as to pretend that the most wealthy lyric theatre in the world should have alternatives for every "star"—that it should not be necessary to postpone a performance of "Samson et Dalila" because Caruso was ill, or to deprive us of "Carmen" because Geraldine Farrar had the "flu."

But where, you ask, shall we find the alternatives? Well, there are more than three or four who could replace Miss Farrar easily at a pinch. In Caruso's case, I admit, the case seems harder. No singer in the world has quite Caruso's voice just now. But there are singers no less fine and even finer. For example, Bonci. And there are artists vastly greater.

To name one, off-hand, there is Lucien Muratore, who has had many triumphs with the Chicago company. Though he has not Caruso's round and luscious voice, he has far more than the Italian's art and style. He is romantic to a fault, and creates illusions in such characters as Samson, Prinzevalle, Faust, and des Grieux. His merit is, some say, the only explanation of his strange ostracism by the Metropolitan. But this, of course may not be wholly true.

CHARLES HENRY MELTZER

Books and the News

Education

A CORRESPONDENT suggests that education is always a timely subject, and that there are many parents to whom it suddenly becomes a practical problem. They care nothing about the fads nor the quarrels of the schoolmen; they do wish to formulate some ideas about the theories and practice of education. What does it mean to be educated? What should the young get from school and college? What are the soundest ideas about educational methods to-day?

The books, pamphlets, and articles upon the subject are endless in number; the disagreements of its doctors acrimonious. Here are a few titles of books.

Upon the theory of education: Herbert Spencer's "Education: Intellectual, Moral and Physical" (Appleton, 1900), which, together with John Dewey's "Democracy and Education" (Macmillan, 1916) and Nicholas Murray Butler's "Meaning of Education" (Scribner, 1915), offer the

(Continued on page 189)

EDWARD T. DEVINE
Associate Editor of the Survey
Will lecture on the following subjects:
THE THREE R'S
Reaction: Revolution: Reconstruction
INDUSTRIAL AND SOCIAL UNREST
Remedies and Proposals
AMERICANIZATION
True and False
For dates and terms address Miss Brandt, Room 1204, 112 E. Nineteenth St., New York reader general comment upon the philosophy of the subject. There should also be mentioned Charles Hanford Henderson's "What is it to be Educated?" (Houghton, 1914). A recent book, Ellwood P. Cubberley's "Public Education in the United States" (Houghton, 1919), is a text-book upon present problems, but is also partly historical. For a brief history of education, Paul Monroe's "Brief Course in the History of Education" (Macmillan, 1907).

For an explanation of modern methods in elementary schools, John and Evelyn Dewey's "Schools of To-morrow" (Dutton, 1916), Mrs. Dorothy Canfield Fisher describes the Montessori methods in "A Montessori Mother" (Holt, 1912), and these methods are subjected to examination in William H. Kilpatrick's "The Montessori System Explained" (Houghton, 1914). On the subject of the kindergarten, see Susan E. Blow's "Letters to a Mother on the Philosophy of Froebel" (Appleton, 1899). Ella F. Lynch's "Educating the Child at Home" (Harper, 1914) relates to the same period in life. So do Henry S. Curtis's "Educating through Play" (Macmillan, 1915) and Barbara S. Morgan's "The Backward Child" (Putnam, 1914).

For two books about vocational education, there are Joseph S. Taylor's "Handbook of Vocational Education" (Macmillan, 1914) and J. A. Lapp and C. H. Mote's "Learning to Earn" (Bobbs, 1915). For commercial education, Joseph Kahn and J. J. Klein's "Principles and Methods in Commercial Education" (Macmillan, 1914). Of the numerous books upon health in relation to the schools, Francis W. and Jesse D. Burks have written "Health and the School" (Appleton, 1913). Upon the public schools, consult S. T. Dutton and David Snedden's "Administration of Public Education in the United States" (Macmillan, 1912). For the high school, Irving King's "High School Age" (Bobbs, 1914). For the country school, J. D. Eggleston and R. W. Bruère's "The Work of the Rural School" (Harper, 1913). For the college—for those about to go to college, Frederick P. Keppel's "The Undergraduate and his College" (Houghton, 1917) and Charles F. Thwing's "The American College" (Platt, 1914). Many of these books contain references to further reading in their special fields.

EDMUND LESTER PEARSON

Books Received

FICTION

Dane, Clemence. Legend. Macmillan. $1.50.

Ganz, Marie, and Ferber, Nat J. Rebels Into Anarchy—and Out Again. Dodd, Mead. $2.00.

MacFarlan, Alexander. The Inscrutable Lovers. Dodd, Mead.

Nathan, Robert. Peter Kindred. Duffield. $2.00 net.

Newton, Alma. A Jewel in the Sand. Duffield. $1.35.

Wade, Horace Atkisson. In the Shadow of Great Peril. Chicago: Reilly & Lee.

BIOGRAPHY AND HISTORY

Howe, M. A. DeWolfe. George von Lengerke Meyer: His Life and Public Services. Dodd, Mead.

Webster, Nesta H. The French Revolution. Dutton. $8.00 net.

EDUCATION

Immigration and Americanization. Selected Readings. Compiled and edited by Philip Davis, assisted by Bertha Schwartz. Ginn.

Studenskey, Paul. Teachers' Pension Systems in the United States. Appleton. $3.00 net.

ESSAYS AND CRITICISM

Gerould, K. F. Modes and Morals. Scribner. $1.75 net.

LITERATURE

Bazalgette, Leon. Walt Whitman. Doubleday, Page.

Hamilton, Ernest. Elizabethan Ulster. Dutton. $6.00 net.

MUSIC

Bispham, David. A Quaker Singer's Recollections. Macmillan. $4.00.

POETRY AND DRAMA

Guiterman, Arthur. Ballads of Old New York. Harper. $1.50 net.

Palmer, William Kimberly and Fanos, Ernest. American Nights. New Era Pub. Co.

Winter Sports Verse. Chosen by Haynes, W., and Harrison, J. L. Introduction by W. P. Eaton. Duffield.

STUDIES IN SPANISH AMERICAN LITERATURE

By Isaac Goldberg, Ph. D.

was commended in a New York Times editorial, as a most timely book which reveals to us the high culture of Latin America and will lead to a better understanding. This is the only book on the subject written for the student and layman. $2.50

"The Eyes of the World Are Turned on Russia."

THE COSSACKS: Their History and Country

By Captain W. P. Cresson

A most illuminating volume on the "free people of Russia" which must be read to have a comprehensive understanding of things Russian. $2.50

AT ALL BOOKSTORES

Publishers Brentano's 27th St. and 5th Ave., N.Y.

TWO NEW BOOKS ON ART

FIRST STEPS IN THE ENJOYMENT OF PICTURES

By Maude I. G. Oliver

A SIMPLE AID TO THE APPRECIATION OF THE BEST AMERICAN PAINTINGS IN PUBLIC GALLERIES. WITH FIFTY-FIVE ILLUSTRATIONS.

$1.50

MORE MAGIC PICTURES OF THE LONG AGO

By Anna O. Chandler

THIS SECOND SERIES IS BASED ON MISS CHANDLER'S STORY HOURS AT THE METROPOLITAN MUSEUM. With Fifty-one Illustrations.

$1.40

"All the tales are well told." From New York Evening Post review of Miss Chandler's "Magic Pictures."

HENRY HOLT & COMPANY
19 WEST 44th STREET, NEW YORK

Attractive offerings are made during the Midwinter Book Season.

Colophons of American Publishers

(Continued from February 14)

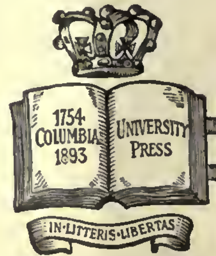
In an edition of Horace printed in Milan by Zarotto in 1474, there is a printer's note or colophon which rather quaintly approximates the use of the modern colophon as a guarantee of high purpose and quality. "All the works of Quintus Horatius Flaccus, carefully corrected, and by Antonio Zarotto elegantly and faithfully imprinted, March 16, 1474; whoever buys this will never be sorry."

In a much wider sense, the university presses of the country were founded for the purpose of publishing the kind of books whose readers would "never be sorry" for having acquired them. Most of these presses have adopted as colophons the devices and mottoes of the universities with which they are connected.

The University of Chicago Press has used since 1912 the coat of arms and the motto of the University, designed by Pierre de Chaignon la Rose. The phoenix rising from the flames is significant of the rise of Chicago from the ashes of 1871. At the time of the World's Fair it was used on banner, cornice, and tower, and the "I Will" figure of the city bears it as a crown. Above this symbol of immortality, youth, vigor, and aspiration is the Latin inscription "Crescat scientia; vita excolatur"—"Let human knowledge grow from more to more; and so be human life enriched."



The imprint used on the publications of the Columbia University Press consists of a crown, representing the crown of King's College, above an open book bearing upon its pages "Columbia University Press" and the dates "1754-1893," the dates respectively of the original charter of King's College and of the incorporation of the Press, with the motto "In litteris libertas." This imprint has been used in the books of the Press since the beginning of its activities in 1893.

A variation of the imprint is used on magazines published by the Press but with the same details.

The official seal of Harvard University with its courageous one-word motto —VERITAS—is found on the books issued by the Harvard University Press. No apology, no boasting: a simple promise, "Truth." None of the hesitancy of one old Italian printer who published an edition of Virgil containing some poems later found to be spurious works. "You ask why these poems, though obscene, are printed? Excuse them: they were writ by Virgil."

The University of Illinois Press uses an (Continued on page IV)

E. P. DUTTON & CO.

invite your attention to these recent issues

The French Revolution

A STUDY IN DEMOCRACY BY NESTA H. WEBSTER, Author of "The Chevalier de Boufflers," etc. $8.00.
The Spectator calls it: "A veritable revelation to those who know the Revolution only from Carlyle's brilliant but profoundly misleading pages.

Elizabethan Ulster

By ERNEST HAMILTON, Author of "The Soul of Ulster," etc. $6.00

A Lace Guide

By GERTRUDE WHITING. With a Comparative Sampler of 145 Bobbin Lace Grounds and fillings, and the most complete bibliography of lace in print. $15.00

War Time Financial Problems

By HARTLEY WITHERS, Author of "The Meaning of Money," "Poverty and Waste," etc., etc. $2.50

Birds in Town and Village

By W. H. HUDSON. Papers on bird friendship that are filled with the charm of that fine personality which revealed itself in "Far Away and Long Ago." $4.00

A Little Garden the Year Round

Wherein much Joy was found, Experience gained and Profit, Spiritual as well as Mundane, derived without Loss of Prestige in a Practical Neighborhood. By GARDNER TEALL. $2.50

On sale in any bookstore, or may be ordered from

E. P. DUTTON & COMPANY

681 Fifth Avenue - - - - - New York

A Literary "Find"

In the Shadow of Great Peril

By Horace A. Wade—Age 11
America's Youngest Author

With a Preface by George Ade

A Wonder of a Story for Every Man Who Has Been a Boy--and a Chortle of Delight from Beginning to End

Irvin Cobb says: "He's a genius"

Just Published—Cloth, 12mo
Price $1.25 net.

Publishers - - - REILLY & LEE - - - Chicago

Attractive offerings are made during the Midwinter Book Season.

141'

THE REVIEW

Vol. 2, No. 42 New York, Saturday, February 28, 1920 FIFTEEN CENTS

Contents

Brief Comment 191
Editorial Articles:
Hillquit on the Socialist Programme 193
Profiteer-Hunting and Political Economy 194
Agriculture, the Basic Industry 196
Outwitting Winter 196
A Lamentable Failure 197
The "Student-Hour" and College Efficiency 198
Pre-War American Diplomacy. By Lindsay Rogers 199
What Must the World Do To Be Fed? By Thomas H. Dickinson 200
The Uncult. By Weare Holbrook 201
Correspondence 202
Book Reviews:
The Interpreter of American Nationalism 204
Disentangling Socialism from Bolshevism 206
Recent Books on Mexican Problems 206
Mr. Bullard on Russia 207
Proletarian Comedy 207
Ancient Architecture 208
The Run of the Shelves 208
Winter Mist. By Robert P. Utter 210
George Soures, an Athenian Satirist. By Aristides E. Phoutrides 211
Music:
"Parsifal" in English at the Metropolitan. By Charles Henry Meltzer 212
Drama:
"Letty" and "His House in Order"—Ibsen in England. By O. W. Firkins 213
Books and the News:
Recent Books. By Edmund Lester Pearson 214

THE Esch-Cummins railroad bill reported out of Conference Committee has passed both Houses by substantial majorities, and was put through the Senate with extraordinary promptness. In the all-important matter of rate-making it is not so good a bill as the Cummins bill, but in the matter of labor disputes it is an improvement upon the latter. The much-debated Section 6 of the Cummins bill has been modified so as to widen the field within which the Interstate Commerce Commission may exercise its discretion. The return of 5½ per cent. upon aggregate property value is made contingent upon "efficient and economical" management by the companies—of which the Commission is presumably to be the judge. Thus an ample opportunity is reserved for Mr. Clifford Thorne's ingenious sophistries and for a new series of "happy thoughts" similar to those advanced in the 1913 Eastern rate case by Mr. Brandeis. Nevertheless, Senator Cummins is to be congratulated upon a notable victory in that the bill clearly recognizes the only correct principle of rate-making, namely, that based on the "regional tariff" as applied to the "regional group." This is the greatest single forward step in the history of American railroad legislation, and it is of immense value. It may indeed be considered as cheaply purchased at the cost of partial confiscation of the profits of individual railroads, indefensible as such confiscation is upon any grounds other than those of pure expediency. Let us hope that the Interstate Commerce Commission will make good use of the shelter that it affords them against popular resentment when they are obliged to do the unpopular thing.

THE provisions of the bill which deal with labor disputes in the railroad industry are not, at first sight, very imposing. Yet, whether by accident or design, they follow a principle which is perhaps the soundest and most effective that can be applied in matters of this kind. That principle is—publicity. Elaborate machinery is provided for inquiry into the facts, when disputes arise between managements and employees, and for decision by a tripartite board upon the facts. Enforcement of the decision is left to public opinion. There is no interference whatever with the right to strike, much less the right to organize, but means are provided whereby the public is informed as to the facts. Nearly thirty years ago Charles Francis Adams proposed a similar plan of dealing with all industrial disputes which were of sufficient importance to affect the public convenience or safety. He suggested that in all such cases there should be appointed by the Governor a commission of inquiry with full power to secure evidence and that a report on the facts of the case should be made as promptly as possible to the Governor, who should make it public. No more thoroughly democratic principle could be imagined, nor one more directly effective in its results, and the Esch-Cummins bill is in accord with it. It is perhaps not surprising that the representatives of organized labor do not like it, for it threatens the very foundations of the oligarchy which they have contrived to establish. Moreover, it points the way to yet further establishment of genuinely democratic control by the community over its various constituent elements. Application of the publicity principle to labor-union elections, strike votes, and so forth, suggests many important possibilities.

IT may help to clarify the controversy over Fiume and the Adriatic islands if we perceive that the Fourteen Points and their attendant idealism are in no wise involved. The issue is simply whether Jugoslavia should or should not possess a valuable and much-desired outlet to the sea. The issue is one of commercial strategy and expediency. Moreover, Fourteen-pointism has counted for almost nothing in the entire Italian settlement. Italy takes the Trentino, with a large German population, in spite of self-determination, in order to set her northern boundary on the watershed of the Alps. That is, the Supreme Council acted under the old theory of military, strategic, boundaries. We say this merely to show that the entire problem of the Italian settlement was too complicated to fit into the neat categories of the new political idealism. A strict application of the principle of racial self-determination would have allotted to Italy all the Eastern ports and islands of the Adriatic. Paradoxically, the Pact of London was more nearly in accord with the Fourteen Points than any subsequent proposal has been. It gave Italy virtually all of the Italian-speaking littoral. Mr. Wilson's inflexibility against Italy's claims to Fiume rests really on a new dogma, that an inland nation must not be bottled up. Bohemia must boast her seaports; Shakespeare was right. Mr. Wilson's stand, furthermore, is based on the assumption that a nation is bottled up unless she owns her own seaports. This strikes us as a false view and fraught with trouble-making possibilities. If every inland country is entitled to the fee simple of a corridor to the sea, the League of Nations will have its hands full.

IN common sense and morals, all that a nation which happens to be shut off from the sea can claim is that she have proper consideration from the nations whose ports she uses. In practice, Germany, with limited facilities on the North Sea, used Rotterdam as advantageously as she did her own ports. It is generally simply good business for the possessors of exceptional port facilities to share them as widely as possible. We might come near reality, and even morality, in the matter of Fiume if we judged that the City, being Italian, should belong to Italy, but that Italy should be most solemnly bound to maintain Fiume as a free port and not to discriminate against shippers from the old Austrian dominions. Such, approximately, was the proposal that Mr. Wilson has blocked. For many years to come, Fiume is a necessary outlet for the Austrian Hinterland. Hence all these interests should be scrupulously safeguarded. But to insist that because the port of Fiume is a necessary convenience for Jugoslavia it should belong to it, is really a very German argument and below Mr. Wilson's controversial form. Admiral von Tirpitz would not have argued otherwise about Rotterdam. Rightly or wrongly, Fiume has become the symbol of Irredentism. If this Italian city goes into alien hands, Italy will enter with no heart into the League. If the case were clearly covered by a moral principle, there might be a chance of persuading her to necessary self-sacrifice. But on the point of morality, her own plea under self-determination is at least as impressive as Mr. Wilson's aversion to bottling up Jugoslavia. It will be easier for Italy to satisfy the spirit of his demand by reasonable guarantees than it will be for him to convince Italy that she is wrong because in the fifteenth century her colonists got in the way of a Jugoslavia that was to be. The case is one for negotiation and compromise.

WHY worry over all sorts of new-fangled problems? Senator Penrose knows a trick worth two of that, when it comes to picking a Republican candidate for President. "The principal test," he says, "will be that the nominee be an approved Republican." Of course there are a good many "approved Republicans," and there may be a good deal of a tussle between them at Chicago; but nobody minds that. The great thing is to keep them from worrying over labor, finance, economic restoration of the world, and things like that. Stick close to the good old rule, the simple plan. Run your candidate on his Republican label!

THE Federal Reserve Board, in its annual report, deals in an earnest and yet cautious spirit with the question of "deflation." So far as regards the practical steps to be taken, the cautiousness is unqualifiedly commendable; for instance, everybody must approve this statement of policy:

> Too rapid or too drastic deflation would defeat the very purpose of a well-regulated credit system by the needless unsettlement of mind it would produce and the disastrous reaction that such unsettlement would have upon productive industry.
>
> Radical and drastic deflation is not, therefore, in contemplation, nor is a policy of further expansion. Either course would in the end lead only to disaster and must not be permitted to develop.

On the other hand, the Board would have done better service to straight thinking if it had avoided the slipperiness of such an outgiving as this:

> Deflation, however, merely for the sake of deflation and a speedy return to "normal"—deflation merely for the sake of restoring security values and commodity prices to their pre-war levels without regard to other consequences—would be an insensate proceeding in the existing posture of national and world affairs.

Deflation for the sake of deflation is an object well worthy of the most serious thought. In point of fact, we have little doubt it actually furnishes a large part of the motive for the Reserve Board's recent and prospective policy, though the Board seems anxious not to admit this motive explicitly, as it might imply a reproach on its previous record. But nobody is asking for a "speedy return" to pre-war commodity prices, or for the pursuance of a policy of deflation "without regard to other consequences." Everybody knows that this would be an "insensate proceeding." Knocking down a man of straw is usually a sign of weakness.

IN declining to serve as a delegate at large to the Republican National Convention on the ground that he should be in Europe in June, Mr. Root did not say that he should be there in the interests of the Permanent Court of International Justice, to be created by virtue of Article 14 of the Covenant. But it is a fair influence that such is his intention. And if it is true that he has accepted the invitation which was supposed to have been extended to him, to share in the establishment of the new tribunal, then the omens may be pronounced most favorable. There is no one whom the United States could depute to this task with more confidence that it was making a genuine contribution towards the realization of a hopeful project. It is no longer a question of whether there should or should not be a League; the League is in being. Its best chance of continuing in being, of gaining genuine recognition as a respectable and trustworthy agency in regulating the affairs of men, seems to lie, if we are not greatly mistaken, in the increased opportunity it offers for arbitral and judicial settlement of international disputes. Here the world is not dealing with something wholly new. It has had experience of this kind of thing before, an experience which is by no means discouraging to any one who does not expect perfection at a jump. The opportunity for advance along lines where it has already been demonstrated that advance is possible is worth the attention of the world's best brains, and if Mr. Root is to be her representative, America will feel that she has given the best she has.

ANYTHING like armed rebellion in Michigan against the enforcement of Federal Prohibition is of course unthinkable. Iron County is not out for blood. But the mere fact that a Federal Prohibition Director should ask for United States troops and for the wholesale arrest of county officials leaves an unpleasant taste. There is not enough raisin wine in all Iron County to wash it out. There is not in all Olympus unquenchable laughter sufficient to give savor to the situation.

THE two questions concerning Allied policy toward Russia asked by a correspondent in a letter published last week are searching and pertinent, but the inquirer is mistaken in assuming that the points raised have not been discussed already in these columns. The first query is whether, if foreign nations had given substantial aid to Kolchak, Lenin and Trotsky would not have turned "patriots" and succeeded in rousing the fury of the peasants against him as "a tool of the foreigner" and the like. The answer is that Lenin and Trotsky, although by profession internationalists despising patriotism, tried all this, but without success. It was only when they represented Kolchak as the head of a movement designed to take away the peasants' lands that they made any impression. Even then hundreds of villages rose in revolt against the Bolsheviks in the hope that Kolchak would come in time to save them, and workmen in the great Putilov works at Petrograd cheered openly for him. On the other hand, when the later policy of Lloyd George towards the border provinces indicated that his purpose was to dismember Russia, the patriotic anti-Bolshevik bourgeois Russians, not the peasants, swung in under the Bolshevik banner in defense of the unity and integrity of their country.

THE second question asks if it is not expedient for the world to let the Bolsheviki somewhere work out their system to ruin, to a reductio ad absurdum so plain that even the fools of the world will understand its folly. This is rather a cold-blooded vivisection proposition on a gigantic scale. The world might perhaps look on complacently, but unfortunately Russia does not live for herself alone, and the prolongation of her agony jeopardizes the very existence of European civilization. It is all very well that a child should burn himself to acquire a wholesome fear for fire, but it is scarcely wise to encourage him to set the house on fire in order to learn this important lesson. It must be borne in mind that the Bolsheviki are a very small minority of the Russian people, for the most part alien to them and maintaining their régime by force and terror; that their programme proved itself a failure within two months after they secured control, and ever since they have been making radical changes and adjustments in it in the futile effort to adapt it to actual conditions; and that they regard Russia not as a social laboratory, but as a point d'appui from which to spread the malignant poison of their propaganda of revolution throughout the world. We do not believe that it was expedient to stand idly by while a gang of cutthroats and robbers tortured and plundered the helpless Russian people, only to use their blood-stained loot to undermine and overthrow other governments. We have a lively scientific interest in social and economic experiments, but in this case the results do not justify the cost.

OLD and far-off things, but not unhappy, are brought to mind by the death of the discoverer of the pole. What would we not give to-day for a return of the boyish ardor with which we all hailed Peary's triumph, and the unstinted interest we all took in the great Doctor Cook controversy! Will such things ever be again? Shall we be able to forget the world's terrific problems, class struggles at home, the cost-of-living question, and the rest, and throw our whole hearts into something as remote from pressing trouble as was the nailing of the flag to the North Pole? Well, there is some comfort in thinking of the stir Einstein has made even in the very depth of our woes; and it is quite certain that the first man who makes a landing on the moon will create excitement even greater than that which greeted Peary's splendid exploit.

Hillquit on the Socialist Programme

LUCIDITY and directness characterized the testimony given by Mr. Hillquit before the Judiciary Committee of the New York Assembly, which covered almost every important phase of the Socialist movement in this country. He denied throughout that that programme contemplated incitement to violence. He admitted, or rather asserted, throughout that the programme was distinctly a programme of revolution. The change which the Socialists aim to bring about is a revolutionary change, and it is to Mr. Hillquit's credit that he made no attempt to disguise this fact. No intelligent person needed to be instructed upon it, but many intelligent persons take refuge in misty obscurities rather than face it.

The sharpest test to which he was put related to the possibility of a resort to force at some future time for the actual attainment of this revolutionary goal. He was confronted with an article of Victor Berger's in which the former Socialist Congressman declared that in a pinch "the ballot may not count for much," and that therefore "workingmen should make it their duty to have rifles and the necessary rounds of ammunition at their homes, and be prepared to back up their ballots with their bullets if necessary." Mr. Hillquit did not flinch from the defense of this position. He did not repudiate it; but, with great ability and ingenuity, he placed upon it an interpretation consistent with his denial that the programme of the Socialist party in this country was in any way a programme of lawlessness or violence. He admitted that the article was "somewhat unfortunately worded," and that some of the expressions in it were "altogether too strong for the meaning which they carry and intended to carry"; but he interpreted it as pointing to the use of the bullet only in defense of rights actually acquired by the ballot. The questioning brought out from him this somewhat formal statement of the Socialist party's position as he understands it:

> Our position with reference to violence is —we say we will protect the right of the majority to make or unmake the form of government. We proceed upon the assumption that we shall bring about the change by constitutional methods, and that the minority will submit when we are in the majority, as we submit now when we are the minority.
>
> While we anticipate a peaceful change, history may play one of its tricks by forcing us to defend ourselves. History has shown among other things that when the privileged minority is about to lose its privileges it becomes desperate; it tries to obstruct lawful progress, to destroy reforms. In that case it will be up to the majority to defend its rights and in a case of this kind it may come to shooting.

Now, what are we going to do about it? That is the question that is squarely before the American people. How are we going to treat men like Hillquit? What are we going to do about the representatives whom the party that he describes may succeed in sending to our State Legislatures or to Congress? What are we going to do about the spread of the opinions and sentiments which inspire that party? We had been jogging along in the presence of these men and these things, without being brought to the point of any sharp definition of policy in relation to them. Speaker Sweet's spectacular coup at Albany suddenly made a question acute which might otherwise have continued mildly chronic for a long time. It produced instantly a sharp division, not as between Socialists and conservatives, but among the conservatives themselves—meaning here by the word conservative every person who is an upholder of American institutions, or, indeed, of the historic institutions of civilization itself. Those who have opposed and those who have defended Speaker Sweet's action are not distinguished from each other by a greater or less fidelity to the principles of our Government or to the established institutions of society. They differ in their view of the conduct which is demanded for the maintenance of those principles and those institutions.

Mr. Hillquit's testimony ought to serve the purpose of still further clarifying the issue thus drawn. The real question between those who believe that the Socialist Assemblymen should be expelled and those who believe that they should be allowed to retain their seats is essentially the question whether a man holding the views expressed by Mr. Hillquit, and whether the representative of a party occupying the position that he defined, is disqualified from membership in an American representative assembly. A score of odds and ends, some fantastic, some trivial, some of a certain degree of real importance, were brought out in the earlier part of the inquiry, but they have failed to make any serious impression on the public mind. The only substantial element now in the case is that of general attitude; and both sides might well agree to regard this as represented, for all practical purposes, by Mr. Hillquit's testimony. Accordingly, what we have to decide is just this: What is henceforth to be the status of men who avow their determination to do all in their power by lawful means to bring about a fundamental change in our system of government, who purpose to effect a revolution in the economic order, and who hold this object so paramount that they do not shrink from the possibility of being compelled at some future time to assure its consummation by force of arms?

The answer given by those who have a genuine faith in the efficacy of free institutions is that the only way to beat these men is to beat them at the polls. Let them persuade as many of their fellow-citizens as they can that they are right. Let us persuade as many of our fellow-citizens as we can that they are wrong. Then if they are beaten—as we feel sure they will be—all the world will know that they have been beaten. Nobody proposes to kill them, to put them in prison, or even—in so far as they are American citizens—to deport them. They will remain with us, whether we seat their representatives or not. Their attachment to their own convictions will not be weakened, but strengthened, by denial to them of the fundamental right of American citizens, the right of representation. Moreover, those convictions themselves involve no depravity, either of mind or of morals. They are shared by multitudes of persons in all the leading countries of Europe. No stigma can be put upon them by any method of proscription. If, with all our advantage in numbers, and, as we firmly believe, in intelligence, we can not make head against them in a fair contest, there is in ourselves a defect of character or of spirit which Americans surely must be loth to admit. It is not by shutting people's mouths, but by convincing their minds and stirring their hearts, that the people of a nation of freemen must uphold the institutions that they hold dear.

Profiteer-Hunting and Political Economy

> THE outcry which was raised against them on this occasion was, we suspect, as absurd as the imputations which, in times of dearth at home, were once thrown by statesmen and judges, and are still thrown by two or three old women, on the corn factors.

This sentence occurs in Macaulay's essay on Lord Clive, which appeared in the Edinburgh Review in the year 1840. He is speaking of the rumor which was spread in England at the time of the terrible East Indian Famine of 1670 "that the Company's servants had created the famine by engrossing all the rice of the country"; and the contrast to which he refers is that between the state of mind which had been almost universa[l] before the rise of the science of political economy and the enlightened understanding of elementary economi[c] phenomena which at the time when he was writing had become equally universal among educated persons.

Among the elementary teachings of that science, few are more noteworthy than that which points out that intelligent hoarding, in the face of impending or actual scarcity, by men whose business it is to watch the prospects of demand and supply, so far from being an injury to the public, is a great public service. The motive of such hoarding unquestionably is private gain; but that gain—always supposing that nothing in the nature of monopoly enters into the case—can only be realized through the interest of the speculator coinciding with the interest of the public. His gains are made not at the time of withholding the supply, but at the time of releasing it; and if his calculation is correct, the scarcity he relieves by selling is more extreme than the scarcity which he intensifies by hoarding. Prices may be made somewhat higher at a time of comparative ease, but they are made decidedly lower at a time that would be one of extraordinary hardship if the withheld supply had been previously consumed.

It is something of a shock to one's Twentieth Century complacency to think how numerous in our time has become that tribe which Macaulay dismissed eighty years ago as represented by "two or three old women." In our frantic endeavors to do something about the high cost of living we have clutched at all sorts of straws, and at none more eagerly than that of "profiteering." The hunt for profiteers has taken many shapes, but the most conspicuous of them has been that of sporadic crusades against the storage of food products. Four or five months ago, State and Federal agents in all parts of the country were busily engaged in discovering supplies of eggs, and sugar, and meats, which in their judgment were more than ought to be allowed to remain in storage, and thrusting them upon the market. The front pages of the newspapers bristled with the figures of a million eggs here and a thousand tons of sugar there, which through the zeal of the people's officers were rescued from the maw of greedy speculators. We had got the beast by the tail at last, and prices were to be reasonable once more. Of course, nothing of the kind happened. The price of eggs and the price of sugar went higher than ever—we do not say because of these seizures, but at least in spite of them. The fact was that besides the impossibility of accomplishing the object in any such way—besides the circumstance that whatever effect it did produce was almost sure to be precisely the opposite of what was intended—the amounts involved, large as they looked to the unthinking, were too small to exercise any important influence on the general situation.

It is just to acknowledge that, widespread as was (and is) the delusion on this subject of the relation between speculation and prices, it was not shared by the more intelligent part either of the business world or of the press. What was wanting, however, was that firm grounding in fundamental principles which is necessary to enable intelligent sentiment to dominate over unintelligent. And the absence of this—as illustrated in many another economic question— is to be ascribed, above all else, to the discredit into which the "classical" political economy fell some three or four decades ago, under the influence chiefly of the then fashionable German historical school. This latter school itself lost its vogue perhaps as far back as twenty years ago; it really had but a short run of favor. Whatever its merits, it was soon found that it was quite incapable of offering a substitute for the fruitful ideas on which the science had been built by the great British economists, or for the central doctrines which had flowed from those ideas. But, so far as the general public was concerned, the mischief had been done; with the consequence that the world has gone through a vast deal of floundering for want of the authoritative guidance which nothing but those central doctrines can supply. What this floundering has cost our country and the world, it is quite impossible to compute.

We are by no means unaware of the errors into which the world was led, partly by a too naive acceptance of the doctrines of the classical economists, partly by a misunderstanding of them, and partly by faults which are justly to be laid to the charge of those economists themselves. Most mischievous of all, perhaps, was the readiness of statesmen and journalists to regard economic principles which constituted merely an analysis of what is, as dogmatic declarations of what ought to be or what must be. The business of economic theory is to extricate from the great and complex mass of economic phenomena those factors which are of fundamental importance, and to trace out the relations of cause and effect which flow from their operation. That there are factors of a non-economic character which the statesman must take into account, the great economists have never denied; nor have they denied that it is possible for the state to introduce economic factors which modify the operation of those brought into play by individual initiative. The doctrine of laissez faire, though doubtless overemphasized by many political economists of the past, is not a doctrine of economic science at all. Its merits in any given instance must be determined by all the considerations bearing on the case, among which those that belong to economic science are only a part.

What the doctrines of theoretical economics can do for the world is not to furnish a magic prescription for the conduct of its affairs, but to enable it to think clearly about some of the most vital elements that enter into them. The mariner's chart and compass do not tell him for what port he should steer, neither do they enable him to dispense with the services of the pilot who knows the rocks and shoals with which the voyage may be beset. But we do not throw away the compass and the chart because they do not of themselves assure the success of the voyage. In our wanderings among the economic difficulties of the time, these invaluable aids have fallen into regrettable desuetude, with the result of a vast amount of most expensive sailing on false courses.

Agriculture, the Basic Industry

AMERICAN agriculture, as a basis for American aid in the reconstruction of Europe, is the subject of a very interesting pamphlet put out a few days ago by the publicity department of the Guaranty Trust Company, of New York. In spite of the "drift to the cities" of which we hear so much, the volume and value of our farm products continues to show remarkable growth. Forty years ago the far output of the nation was valued at a billion and a half per year. From that date to the beginning of the great war, the annual value is estimated to have risen to about eight billions, and to have doubled this immense figure within two years, under the influence of war conditions. The author of the pamphlet fails to call attention to the fact that this last violent "increase," in so short a time, is in the main not an increase of production but merely the evidence of a great decline in the purchasing power of the medium of exchange. Yet after proper deduction on this score, there was a notable increase.

The proportion of the population now living on farms is put at a trifle less than one-third, but nearly twenty millions more live in towns of less than 2,500 and many of these are directly engaged in farming, or are the owners of rented farms. Mention should also be made of the increasing number of professional and business men in cities who own and operate farms. We do not refer to the "city farmer" who is simply amusing himself with a country home and farm, regardless of expense, but to men who are themselves of farm origin and who hold their acres to an even stricter financial account than farmers who have never had the business training of the city. Farming of this type is especially in evidence in the Middle West, where so many cities have rich farm lands immediately adjoining. Such farms are often of great value in introducing business habits and scientific agricultural methods into backward communities.

Among the systematic means now in use for the introduction of better methods, the "county agent" is the most pervasive and perhaps most successful. We are told that there are a trifle under three thousand agricultural counties in the United States, and a county agent, sometimes with one or more assistants, is now employed in more than three-fourths of them, not merely addressing farmers' meetings, but going from farm to farm and giving expert advice to meet the individual need. In each of about 1,700 counties a woman "home demonstration agent" is also employed to carry to the women of the farm the newer applications of agricultural science to such matters as canning, care of poultry, house sanitation, etc. In some parts of the country the banks are employing agents to assist farmers in so applying loans as to increase net profits. The amount of money loaned on farm property at present is estimated at something like $6,000,000,000; but these are very largely loans for the express purpose of increasing profits, not the result of a failure to meet expenses and a consequent necessity of mortgaging the farm that the family may be clothed and fed until the coming of better times. And with better methods, the agricultural borrower is making steady progress towards a lower rate of interest. Go to any of the towns and small cities in the good farming districts, and the banks will tell you that the farmers are steadily growing in importance as depositors and investors. In these phenomena the compilers of the Guaranty Trust Company's pamphlet find evidence that the American farmer will constitute a very effective factor in absorbing the securities necessary to provide the credits essential to the reconstruction of Europe.

There is nothing in the facts brought out by this pamphlet to deny the special difficulties with which the farmer is now contending, such as scarcity and high wages of labor. There is much, however, to show that the forces by which these difficulties are to be met are already well in hand and making steady progress. There is no occasion to grow pessimistic over the future of American agriculture, faulty conclusions from still more faultily managed questionnaires to the contrary notwithstanding.

Outwitting Winter

SOMEONE recently dug up Stevenson's remark about life being "an amusement totally unsuitable for winter." Yet surely winter is not so different from other things that there is not something to be said for it. It happens to be just fifty years ago that Lowell spoke his "good word for winter," as "a thoroughly honest fellow, with no nonsense in him, and tolerating none in you, which is a great comfort in the long run." One would expect that from Lowell; ruddy and hirsute, with hands thrust deep in the pockets of his pea-jacket, he might pass, as one met him on his daily walk, for old Hiems himself. The frailer Stevenson, unequally but not ungallantly pitted against the dour Scots climate, has in him the larger share of our common humanity.

Accepting winter, however, as a fact—and gad! we'd better—its chief charm appears to be that it may in one way or another be outwitted. This is, after all, the best of winter sports. Skating, skiing, snow-shoeing, tobogganing, curling, ice-boating are all very well for one who had but the requisite opportunity and stamina, but for most grown people they can furnish at best but a very occasional day's sport. The bulk of the winter must somehow be got through without them. And, indeed, to one given to reflection, they offer very little that is sustaining. This may be proved by referring to a recent anthology called "Winter Sports Verse." The thing was worth doing, perhaps, merely to show what could be done. As a demonstration it is perfect. But as for poetry, a man would soon perish on a diet of snow and rushing air. It is all too confoundedly healthy and cheerful for any use. There is too much crying of "ho!" in it.

No, the poetry of winter, the satisfactions of winter, as distinguished from its fun, lie largely in getting the better of it, in defeating its purposes by means of fire and companionship. Lowell, in his essay, has faggotted up what the poets have had to say on this subject, and it is all to this same purpose. The best strategy is even to convert it into an ally. The simplest creature-comforts gain from us a respect that we forget to pay them in easier days. One of the few warm touches in our book of verses about winter sports is this from Theodore Roberts:

What matters though the winds blow chill
And foot the drifts about our door,
When we have fire-light, and good-will,
And bear-skins strewn upon the floor,
And bacon and a pot of tea
To make the time go merrilee?

The world shut out, we are the more ready to value the little that we have.

We have come, it is true, a long way from the primitive days in which humanity huddled together comforting one another as under a common calamity, looking to its waning stores and half wondering if the miracle of spring would in truth repeat itself. We have progressed far in the game of outwitting winter with our theatres and concerts and other ways of being warm and bright and pretending it is for some other reason that we are got together. We may have our peaches at a dollar apiece. The old minstrel's tale of cherries at Christmas is no miracle at all; it is merely a matter of having the price. But we all have deep in our bones some ancestral sense for winter as it was, some lingering zest for the older game of looking for winter's compensations, as against the newer game, not always successfully played, of pretending that winter doesn't exist. To whom will the sound of sleigh-bells come without a lifting of the heart? When snows have made of the automobile a lurching, helpless body upon ineffectually spinning wheels, when the shag-coated horse is roused from his winter nap, and the old cutter in which the hens lately roosted or the mice worked their will is dragged rustily across the barn floor, who does not feel himself warmed by the spectacle of the contraption as it passes? The sound of its bells lingers in the ear, now faint and now generously showered about one by a moment's gust, like ancient memories forgotten in all but their sweetness. In future ages, when new religious forms shall rise among peoples with manners seemingly new, yet blood of the old blood in their veins for all that, who shall say that annually a ceremonial sleigh, like the car of the ancient earth-goddess, shall not pass between lanes of reverent folk, who shall do honor to its smooth-gliding course and the music of its bells, not quite knowing what they do, but sure that without these things the people perish?

A Lamentable Failure

THE breakdown of the work of re-educating our disabled soldiers makes a story, as it is set forth by the New York Evening Post, that leaves the heart sick. Failure here is more humiliating than in any other of the many sorts of endeavor which the war called forth. To fail in the face of a superior enemy can be supported by fortitude; to blunder and still to win may be excused to human nature; but to fail in a clearly recognized duty toward those who uncomplainingly yielded up the strength of their young manhood is, for the rest of us, to accept the brand of unpardonable sin. Failure is the merited word. Seventy-five per cent. of the men who are eligible for training are not in training, though it is now twenty months since the Division of Rehabilitation was established. Three hundred thousand of our boys were, in greater or less degree, disabled. Two hundred thousand of these expressed a desire to avail themselves of the offer of help—real help, no mere cash bonus—which Congress held out to them. According to the Post's figures only 24,000 have so far been put in training, and only 217 have graduated into gainful employment.

Money has been spent in abundance, a clerical force of more than three thousand have been busy, at good salaries, constructing impenetrable entanglements of red tape, spacious offices have been hired and, sometimes, paid for, and the business for which the Federal Board for Vocational Education was created simply has not gone forward. The ex-soldier, sensitive of his disability and easily discouraged, had a burden of proof placed upon him by the Board which was more than he could bear; summoned by form letter to interviews that ended in nothing but waiting, ordered to produce this document and that, subjected to repeated medical examinations, it is small wonder that he came to the conclusion that it was the Board's intention to wear him out if it could; counsel, support, encouragement, a sustaining sense that someone was looking out for his interests, there was none. Even when a man finally found himself placed in training, there seems to have been no adequate care taken to see that he got what he was supposed to get.

It can hardly be doubted that the Board for Vocational Education counted among its number some who labored devotedly and with a sense of the issues at stake. But it is only too plain that the direction of the work was not intrusted to men of insight and grasp. It was a task at once difficult and delicate. Mere organization, without appreciation of the human values involved, could not meet it. As a demonstration of the failure of bureaucracy when it comes to intimate dealings with the lives of human beings it leaves nothing to be desired. If the Board had been made responsible to one of the several Departments which contended for its control, things might have gone better. Even now it is not too late for Congress, which alone is directly responsible, to do something, not by way of investigation but by putting the work in charge of a man capable of retrieving what is yet retrievable. If Congress will do nothing, being busied in withholding grants to the stricken peoples of Europe and in distributing a cash bonus among ex-service men as one gives a check at Christmas because it is too much trouble to pick out a gift that means something, then the charge falls upon each community and upon each individual of means to see to it that this draft upon the nation's dearest honor is worthily met. Dishonored it must not and can not be.

The "Student-Hour" and College Efficiency

THERE are fields in which "efficiency" is a matter of definite physical measurement. A sewer system is efficient in proportion as its discharge, within a given period, approximates the greatest amount of sewage which the calibre of its tubes will in theory permit it to carry. But there are fields in which efficiency is a quality too elusive for such easy methods of evaluation. We may not say, on the analogy of the sewer, that a college classroom is efficient in proportion as its discharge of students at the end of each class-hour approximates the full number which its seats, not to speak of windowsills and standing room, will accommodate. And yet there are not a few American colleges in whose administrative offices a careful record is now kept of the "student-hours" taught by each member of the faculty. This aggregate is obtained by multiplying the number of hours taught per week by the average number of students in the instructor's classes. Now there may be reasons entirely harmless, if not positively useful, for collecting and filing such statistics. There is a growing suspicion, however, that college presidents and trustees are inclined to attach an undue importance to them when such matters as salary increases, promotions, and the granting of requests for department supplies are concerned.

Few things could be more inimical to the true spirit and purpose of higher education than the rating of the comparative efficiency of teachers on any such basis. A class of five or six students in some abstruse and comparatively neglected subject may seem a waste of effort to the administrative officer bent on economy, but the inspiration gained from close personal contact with a scholarly instructor under such conditions has not infrequently made of one man a greater force than a hundred ordinary college graduates, whether in wise public leadership or in some important special line of scholarly research. We readily grant that college students are more intelligent than the average, but their experience of life and sanity of judgment have not yet reached the point where their comparative numbers in two departments of study, or in the classrooms of two different instructors, can be taken as a safe indication of comparative educational values.

We are not unaware that college administrators have of recent years encountered a real evil in the multiplication of small classes. The evil resides, however, not in the size of the classes but in the relative unimportance of the subjects, in the too close paralleling of courses already scheduled, or, in undergraduate work, in the introduction of subjects for which the students are not yet sufficiently prepared. In all these cases the evil would be still greater, educationally, if the classes were larger. The young instructor, and sometimes the veteran professor in competition with the younger, finds no greater temptation to cheapen the standard of his work than that which comes from an apparent show of special administrative favor to the teacher of large classes in comparatively easy subjects. The college administration that has the broad interests of scholarship most intelligently at heart will realize that it has a special duty of support and encouragement, both financial and moral, to any branch of study which, important in itself, is suffering from student neglect, whether because it is inherently difficult, or because it is too far out of the ordinary course of student thinking for its importance to be known, or because it is without any direct bearing upon the power to earn money. We have ceased to insist that every student should pursue certain definite lines of study in order to secure the distinction of a college degree; but this very concession should arouse our colleges to a firm determination that no branch of higher learning having a vital relation to human life and culture should be dropped from its schedules, or allowed to languish, merely because subjects more superficially attractive have caught the taste of the time.

In addition to the danger to important subjects of study not spontaneously elected by large numbers, another harmful tendency of the "student-hour" idea is to speak of recitation halls as attaining their maximum efficiency only when each classroom is occupied by a class every hour of the college day. A storage warehouse is of course most profitable when each day's withdrawal of goods is accompanied by immediate entries of equivalent amount; but a vacant hour in a college classroom, when the teacher can linger with the more interested of his pupils, or even compel the less interested to linger with him, and converse a little more freely than the requirements of the regular hour will allow, will often raise a student to a new level of effort and attainment. Opportunities for such informal converse ought to be favored, not discouraged by an effort to use the "plant" to its full capacity every hour of the college day. Modern ingenuity has wrought out certain mechanical processes and standards of measurement which are of great practical value when intelligently applied to their appropriate objects; but when we turn about and attempt to apply them to the workings of the human intelligence itself, failure and confusion is the result. This may seem to some too obvious a truth to need utterance; but many college professors are to-day required to furnish statistics the collection of which is evidently inspired by a belief in these mechanical theories of educational evaluation. The triumph of such ideas would be far more effective than low salaries in driving genuine scholars, of the true teaching spirit, out of the profession.

THE REVIEW

A weekly journal of political and general discussion

Published by
THE NATIONAL WEEKLY CORPORATION
140 Nassau Street, New York

FABIAN FRANKLIN, President
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER, Treasurer

Subscription price, five dollars a year in advance. Fifteen cents a copy. Foreign postage, one dollar extra; Canadian postage, fifty cents extra. Foreign subscriptions may be sent to Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons, Ltd., 24, Bedford St., Strand, London, W. C. 2, England.
Copyright, 1920, in the United States of America
Editors
FABIAN FRANKLIN
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER

Associate Editors
HARRY MORGAN AYRES O. W. FIRKINS
A. J. BARNOUW W. H. JOHNSON
JEROME LANDFIELD

Pre-War American Diplomacy

IT IS now a commonplace of American politics that the President's control of foreign affairs is thoroughly autocratic and, in spite of the powers of the Senate, may be exerted without any check except the very indefinite one of public opinion. The Constitutional authority delegated to the Federal Government is incompletely and not too definitely parceled out; neutrality, the recognition of new Governments, the abrogation of treaties, and the conclusion of agreements not so formal as to require the sanction of the Senate are all within the prerogative of the President. And, as Mr. Wilson has said, to guide diplomacy prior to the conclusion of a treaty is very often to force ratification—the present conflict being the exception to the rule. Yet the fact that the Senate must ratify all agreements is likely to make us believe that we really have popular control of foreign policy when, as a matter of fact, less is known about American diplomacy before and during the war than about the exchanges leading to and accompanying the belligerency of any of the other Allies.

This is rather forcibly brought to mind, so far as pre-war American diplomacy is concerned, by the publication in the January Contemporary Review of extensive excerpts from the testimony of Count Bernstorff before a "Parliamentary Commission of Inquiry into Responsibility in and for the War," which was instituted by a Reichstag resolution under Article 34 of the new German Constitution. The sub-committee before which Bernstorff testified was to investigate "all occasions which offered a possibility of peace negotiations with the enemy." The former Ambassador's revelations, even in their substantially verbatim form, contain many omissions and can not be definitely dealt with until they are heavily documented. But some prima facie disclosures are made on a number of points concerning which the American people have been vouchsafed little information.

After his first public attempt at mediation, President Wilson made unsuccessful overtures in September, 1914, which were not answered by the Entente; after his first trip abroad for the President during the winter of 1914-1915, Colonel House reported that the moment for peace had not yet come; on June 2, 1915, in discussing the Lusitania, President Wilson told Bernstorff that if Germany would give up the use of submarines, he could persuade the English Cabinet to agree to abandon the attempt to starve Germany, and "he hoped that this would be the beginning of peace action on a great scale." President Wilson first insisted that Germany should admit the Lusitania outrage to be a breach of faith, but later gave way and was satisfied with the statement that "reprisals must not inflict injury on neutrals." In January, 1916, Colonel House found the chief opposition to peace in Paris and a certain willingness in Berlin and London. Many negotiations took place in New York between Bernstorff and Colonel House in order to avoid the publicity that White House conferences would have entailed.

House told me Wilson no longer had the power to oblige England to obey the practices of international law [this was just after the Sussex affair]; American trade was so intimately tied up with the Entente that Wilson could not possibly disturb these trade relations without evoking a terrific storm. On the other hand, he was in a position to obtain a peace without victory, and he intended to do so as soon as an opportunity offered itself. But seeing that such a step would now universally be called pro-German in America, he could only do it when public opinion about relations with Germany had somewhat calmed down. He proposed a pause, and hoped without fail to be able to make a beginning of peace mediation towards the end of the summer. Then Rumania entered the war.

This made the Entente sure of victory and caused Wilson to defer his intervention.

In October, 1916, the Emperor transmitted through Ambassador Gerard a memorandum to the effect that he was willing to entertain a peace offer, but the Presidential election caused a delay.

The Peace Note which Wilson dispatched on December 18 had been composed as far back as the middle of November but had been thrust by Wilson into his writing table, because another wave of anti-German feeling swept through the country on account of the Belgian deportations. Colonel House told me that the peace offer which was already drawn up by the middle of November was not sent off by Wilson because he could not be responsible for it in the state of public feeling. . . .

On November 24, Bernstorff telegraphed:

Wilson has commissioned Colonel House to tell me in the strictest confidence that he would undertake an effort for peace as soon as possible, presumably between now and the New Year. But meanwhile he made it a condition that we should discuss peace as little as possible, and that we should allow no new submarine controversies to spring up, in order to prevent a premature refusal by our enemies.

When the German reply to President Wilson's peace note of December 18 contained no mention of terms of peace, Count Bernstorff "telegraphed that Lansing had begged him at any rate to communicate our peace terms to him in confidence." The terms sent by the Germans with their peace proposal of December 12 were so moderate, however, that "Lansing answered me that he was unable to understand why we did not ask as much as the others; then a middle line of compromise could be arranged."

Bernstorff said that "an American peace mediation which should not include the restoration of Belgium was wholly excluded"; he understood President Wilson's "peace without victory" address to the Senate on January 22, 1917, "to mean that Germany was to retain her world position undiminished."

It must always be remembered that on January 31, 1917, Wilson's whole attitude underwent a change. Until January 31 Wilson believed us to be wishing for a peace by agreement; after January 31 he was convinced we would only accept the so-called German peace.

These are the most significant points in Count Bernstorff's testimony, and they serve to show the incompleteness of what we know of American neutrality. Practically all of the formal notes concerning the submarine warfare have been published, but Bernstorff's testimony indicates very clearly that the informal exchanges were both frequent and important. Ambassador Gerard's book did tell us something, but it was valuable chiefly as propaganda and, while he doubtless participated in pourparlers which, at the time of publication it was thought wise to leave out, his story can not be important, since most of the negotiations were conducted in the United States. Judging by the few times he figures in Bernstorff's evidence, Secretary Lansing will not have any startling disclosures; the German Ambassador dealt chiefly with Colonel House. One wonders, however, what the State Department's archives contain. In a volume entitled "A Survey of the International Relations between the United States and Germany, 1914-1917," published in 1918, James Brown Scott (who had been chairman of the Neutrality Board which advised the State Department) casually quoted an unpublished pledge (February 16, 1916) of the German Government with reference to the Lusitania and submarine warfare in the future. This formula, never, so far as I know, published in the newspapers or official editions of the correspondence, is doubtless the partial admission of fault which Bernstorff told his investigating commission President Wilson was persuaded to accept. With the exception of matters such as this and the controversy over armed merchantmen, we shall have to look to President Wilson and Colonel House for the full story.

In England the documentation of the war is proceeding rapidly. Lord Haldane's personal defense of his much-discussed reports on the 1912 mission to Berlin is about to appear in book form. Lord Morley is known to have a third volume of "Recollections," and it is an open secret that certain members of the Liberal Government of 1914 are not well pleased. There are many authoritative volumes on war responsibility as indicated by the diplomatic correspondence, by Headlam, Price, Archer, Stowell, and Oman. Early in the war Professor Gilbert Murray issued a semi-official defense of "The Foreign Policy of Sir Edward Grey," and extreme radicals like Morel and left-wing Liberals like Lord Loreburn have published reasoned attacks on the diplomacy which obligated England without a treaty, an adequate army, or Parliamentary approval, but could not tell Germany that England would intervene. Little remains to be known of Anglo-German relations—at least on the English side.

America's case against Germany was much simpler and more indubitable than England's, yet President Wilson's policy has not been adequately disclosed. What did the President say to Bernstorff and what notes (not yet published) were sent to Berlin? Did President Wilson and Mr. Balfour discuss the secret treaties? Was there any attempt at political preparedness for peace before the final débâcle? What actually did Wilson, Lloyd George, Clemenceau, and Orlando say to each other in that stuffy room which housed the Council of Four? These are things that we must know before even provisional estimates can be formed of President Wilson's policy before and during the war; and, in spite of our machinery for popular control of diplomacy, Americans know rather less of their own recent history than of European history. It is a nice ethical question, finally, as to whether the citizens of a democracy should not be told these matters by official publications instead of personal memoirs.

LINDSAY ROGERS

What Must the World Do To Be Fed?

TWO books are at hand which deal expertly with a problem which a few years ago only the initiated recognized as a problem at all. The first, "The Feeding of Nations," by E. H. Starling, was written by the Chairman of the Royal Society Food Committee and Honorary Scientific Advisor to the British Ministry of Food during the war. The second, "The World's Food Resources," is by Professor J. Russell Smith, lately Consulting Expert of the War Trade Board and Professor of Economic Geography at Columbia University. If the present writer ventures to call attention to the importance of these two works, it is not because he has long been in the class of the initiated, but because in common with thousands of his fellows he has learned to see in recent events the development of a new function of statecraft.

The world learned more of the technique of democratic government during the few fevered years of the war than it had learned in a hundred previous years. And the war served as well to reveal the dangerous pressure points in the democratic structure. Not the least of these concerned the utilization of resources which are the very grist of the democratic mill. The campaigns for conservation of national resources had seemed to have camparatively only a doctrinaire interest until the operations of Dr. Walther Rathenau in Germany and of the Munitions Ministry of Lloyd George in England taught the necessity, as well as the possibility, of a strict mobilization of all the resources of a nation. But more important in every respect in the psychology of peoples, and even the stability of governments themselves, are the questions which arise in connection with the administration of the food supply. For these questions the foundations have already been laid in abstract science, two branches of which are represented in the books before us. Dr. Starling is a representative of applied physiology, who finds his attention drawn from the problems of the composition of food and the food requirements of the average man back to the questions which are involved in Europe's deficit for 1920 of 16,000,000 tons of cereals. Professor Smith is a representative of economic geography, who finds himself asking the question, "Has food shortage come to stay?" The best answer he can find is that it depends on whether man behaves. By all odds the most interesting and significant portion of Professor Smith's book is the last fifty pages, in which he discusses "The Distribution of Food and of Men," and "Hunger, Trade, and War."

As our authors well know, these questions involve more than economic geography or applied physiology, important as these are. They involve new zones of administration in the state. For these administrative activities there are few enough precedents. Until the great war, food policy was either lacking or it was doctrinaire. When starvation lay outside of the paths of the world's markets it was taken as the handiwork of God. When nations have had a foodstuffs policy it has been a local one. Germany began to adapt its national life to the food problem immediately after the Franco-German War. Since then she has extraordinarily increased her productiveness per man unit, but she did nothing to prepare for the supreme test of her policy in war, and when war came her policy failed her. Great Britain never had raised enough for her own consumption; but she has been kept from facing the problem by her excess of manufactured stuff which she could exchange for foodstuffs from abroad, and by her command of shipping. Free trade was England's food policy, and it was a local one.

The place of food policy as an economic principle of government was not learned until Herbert Hoover taught it in connection with the work of the Commission for Relief in Belgium. There the true governmental function of the food supply in all its various social, financial, economic, and diplomatic aspects was created during the first two years of the war. When Hoover was taken into the war Government as United States Food Administrator, this function of government was accepted by the United States as belonging to its war policy. This was followed immediately by the appointment of Lord Rhondda as British Food Controller, and, a little later, when the Clemenceau Government was established in France, food policy was accepted as a factor therein. During the two years of war that followed and the one further year before peace was finally declared, the world learned all that it now knows of the statesmanship involved in the food supply. It is not likely soon to forget the pressing need of all the lessons it learned in the hard school of war.

Is peace to bring an end to the food problem? One cannot gather an affirmative answer to this question from either of these books, or from any sane view that one may take of the situation. The best that one can say is that the food problem will end if the world can get together. And this answer is worth little enough, for it must be taken with a plenty of reservations and interpretations. Aside from the inherent difficulty of rebuilding again the broken bonds of faith between nations, of filling up the lack of manufactured goods to exchange for products of the farm, of establishing on a larger and better basis international finance and shipping, in fact of providing again a social equilibrium within the States as well as between States, there is the further difficulty that food policy never has been rationally envisaged as a world problem; and getting together, therefore, will not mean a return to the conditions of before the war, but advancing by slow and painful stages to a point at which the internal food policy of a nation is adjusted to the world situation.

Immediately after the armistice, Europe asked for a continuation of inter-Allied food control, and Dr. Starling adds his plea for coöperative control in tim of peace. No man more than Mr. Hoover stands for the entente between nations, and yet he has been compelled to oppose from the first all such measures. The reasons are not selfish ones. The nations of Europe must return to a basis of defensible independent food policy before the United States can undertake even to consider the pooling of her vast but sorely-tried resources with those of Europe. During the war we were willing to feed high-priced grains to live stock in order to provide a quick export of fats to Europe. We cannot indefinitely continue such an expensive programme. The physiological mean necessary for sustenance is a useful abstraction when you have reached the danger point. The time has not yet come for the application of this mean to America along with Europe to compensate for errors in Europe's food policy. Europe has been living from hand to mouth for generations, and meanwhile, by means of embargoes which were both murderous and suicidal, destroying the production across border lines. The destroyed herds of Serbia must have come back more than once in five hungry years to plague the consciences of Magyar statesmen. Germany came near to having a rational food policy, but the difficulty of enforcing a strict application of policy on the farmers during the war was responsible for the wastage of incalculable amounts of cereals on the maintaining of useless herds, which were good neither for milk nor fat, and was one of the contributing causes to the loss of the war.

The problem as to how food policy will enter into the psychology of government will constitute in time to come one of the severest tests of democracy. The failures in food policy of the last five years have been even more illuminating than the successes. On account of her position in the food market and because she has had the advantage of wise administration, the United States has been put in the way of the successes. We learned to conserve in the midst of plenty, to produce readily at a suggestion of need, and to control stable distribution in the midst of a nervous market. The failures of Europe were also partly on account of her position. Paradoxical as it may seem, it is more difficult to stabilize a market in the midst of conditions of scarcity than in the midst of well-advertised plenty. And it is more difficult to exercise suasion over the producer than over the distributor. You can encourage producers to raise wheat and pigs, as we did in America, but you cannot force them to give up the last margin on a requisition. More important still, you cannot force them to measures of scientific economy, as was shown in Germany in connection with the cattle supply.

An important difference revealed by the war between the food policy of Great Britain and that of Germany is pregnant with meaning. Throughout the war Great Britain managed to keep her average consumption per man about the same as the pre-war average, about 3,400 calories. She did this by reducing the overlavish consumption of the rich and increasing the ration of the formerly ill-nourished classes. Germany sank from the excess of pre-war days to 2,300 calories in 1915 and to 1,600 calories in 1916. Upon such a ration no man can thrive. There developed, therefore, what may be called the underground stocks that were never counted in the available supplies of the nation and finally reached only the hands of those who could pay exorbitant prices. While England as a matter of governmental policy was binding to her cause the classes that were necessary for the prosecution of the war, Germany, on the other hand, on account of her hard straits and as well on account of her ancient ineptitude in popular government, was draining foodstuffs from the people for the support of the wealthy few. And when the well-fed Junkers in power called upon the people in their extremity in the fall of 1918, either the people were dead or they had turned against the Government which had betrayed them.

THOMAS H. DICKINSON

The Uncult

I AM in touch with the hippodrome of the seven arts. The ringmaster is on the wire.

Mrs. Challis informs me that the Athelney Club is to give a dinner to-morrow night. The Athelney Club doesn't give dinners without provocation, and, whenever I receive an invitation, I ask "Who?" Then I say "Oh, of course," and blunder about the public library feeling like a regular dilettante.

"The guest of honor," Mrs. Challis's moral-suasion tone indicates that I am being reproved for not knowing all about it, "the guest of honor will be Arthur Veronicus Roehm. You know."

"He was in Welterweight's Anthology last year, wasn't he?" I venture. I can venture things over the telephone quite recklessly; I think I could win in a long-distance poker game. Besides, Welterweight's Anthology is the surest of all literary hazards, as Mr. Welterweight distributes two-penny bouquets to everyone who ever wrote a rhyme. I have wounded Mrs. Challis, however. She moans prettily, and I know that her eyes are like a dove's that sickeneth.

"You are confusing him with Ada Roehm who wrote 'Sonnets from the Bosnian,'" she corrected me with the glibness of a barber exploding the fallacy that Mollowitz pitched his first game for Milwaukee in 1902. "Mr. Roehm writes those reminiscences of a rivet-slinger for the Next-to-Reading-Matter Weekly—without any punctuation, you know. And his spelling is a scream. You must be there to-morrow night. Be sure, now."

The receiver stops its gracious grating, and I hang it up, and wonder a little. My sense of duty tells me that I ought to meet this lion with the screaming spelling. I ought to sit at the Athelney dinner-table and look and listen and have Boswellian thrills, but, first of all, I ought to read something by Arthur Veronicus Roehm.

I hunt up one of the Reminiscences of a Rivet-Slinger and plunge into it manfully. My eye searches in vain for capital letters and commas. I shouldn't let such superficialities prejudice me. Somewhere there is an idea, everywhere there is humor; the editor's foreword says so. "Whenever we have cumpany to eat the wife gives me eyebrow signels all the time for feer I should maybe cut my mouth with my nife but I never dun it yet and I am age 28 yrs old if its a day." . . . The sociable seat-mate! the smoking-car raconteur! the relatives of the charwoman! that rough diamond, the self-made man! Rather than turn over a handsome advertisement of Dutch Cleanser, I stop reading.

Truly, illiteracy is upon us in a deluge. It is more popular than ever before, and it has always been more or less popular. Daisy Ashford is the newest member of the uncult, and takes a place above Ring Lardner, H. C. Witwer, and "Dere Mable." The Lowell centenary brought the Biglow Papers to the attention of many as something entirely new. We can all remember "Hashimura Togo" and "Chimmie Fadden," and we still have Abe Martin as the successor to Josh Billings, Petroleum V. Nasby, Artemus Ward, and M. Quad, whom our oldsters are now ashamed to have laughed over in their bicycle days.

Modernize old Samuel Pepys' orthography and construction, and he would become as ponderous a bore as Benjamin Franklin. Write the "Real Diary of a Real Boy" as it would be written by the super-schooled youth of to-day, and Plupy and Beany would sink into oblivion with Sanford and Merton.

What is the lure of the illiterate, the spell of the misspelled? What is there about bad grammar that so charms the dear public?

The bright boy at the end of the column states that he believes the vogue of the uncult is due to its sincere humility. He goes on to say that the dear public is weary of the condescending voices on Parnassus. It is no longer impressed by holier-than-thou literary style and the apotheosis of the polysyllabic; it has discovered that an honest heart may beat between a split infinitive. It prefers the writers who get on its own level—the street level—or even a little lower, in the gutter.

However, in spite of this pessimistic conclusion, I shall attend the Athelney dinner to-morrow night, and give this Roehm person the double-o.

WEARE HOLBROOK

Correspondence

The Decline of Liberty

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

In the middle of the nineteenth century Mill contended, with popular approval, that the duty of a Government was to assure the individual the greatest amount of liberty compatible with the liberty of all. Herbert Spencer was of the same mind; and Lord Acton expressed the same conviction when he said a perfect Government must be one, irrespective of its form, in which each man was free to follow the dictates of his own conscience. In America, as late as 1905, James Coolidge Carter could endorse the laissez-faire doctrine with the approval of thoughtful students of sociology.

Are we drifting away from these tenets of Benthamite liberalism? The course of contemporaneous legislation would so indicate. Women have been given the vote, it is true, but their liberty to contract or to dispose of their property has been considerably abridged. They may not work more than a certain number of hours a week, and only in places conforming to standards approved by Government inspectors. Employees in certain occupations are forbidden to sue their employers for torts, but obliged to accept the benefits of insurance schemes required by law. There is a constant and successful agitation for laws forbidding work for less than a minimum wage, prohibiting many callings to children, proscribing articles of food and drink, and assuring special privileges to individuals or classes supposed to be powerful in politics.

The lassez-faire policy gets no hearing to-day. Government help has been substituted for self-help. It is purposed to give the mass of the "workers" their "fair share" of what they contribute to the national wealth. This interesting experiment has never been tried before. The feudal baron took from his serfs everything they produced except what was essential to support their lives. In return he kept the peace and gave them employment. He kept the seed corn himself until the seeding time. If he had confided it to the serfs, can anyone doubt there would have been none to plant? The Russian peasants drank up the harvest annually. Contemplate the excesses of our own artisans who stayed home during the war. Are they rich? No, they have eaten the seed corn. They now have silk shirts, second-hand automobiles, imitation jewelry, and the memories of numberless movie shows. But they have no capital.

They still have votes, however, and if they can not render themselves financially independent by economic means, they will by political. Alas, to climb the hill of prosperity requires more than votes. If one increase one's income by dollars which are unearned, the buying power of the dollar depreciates. This is not due to a capitalistic conspiracy. No form of government can be invented which will relieve the irresponsible of the effects of their incompetence. If oversight of the seed corn is really necessary, will it be cheaper to have the Government do it than the capitalists? Or shall we be merely delivering ourselves up to the mercies of a new set of thieves who will have to make up for lost time?

Those of us who prefer to be free and be cheated rather than to bargain away our liberty to the Government for protection against the rich are little heard from in these days. Perhaps we shall have to give collectivism a chance. About the end of the century the pendulum will swing back again, and it will be observed that the same old crowd is acting as the custodian of capital.

GEORGE W. MARTIN

New York, February 20

What Might Happen to the Constitution

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

In a statement published in the New York Times, Mr. Wayne B. Wheeler, chief counsel of the Anti-Saloon League, asserts that "the power to amend the Constitution of the United States is unlimited except in two particulars named in Article 5. On all other questions there is no limitation except as to the method prescribed in that article."

If Mr. Wheeler's contention is upheld by the Supreme Court of the United States it will be constitutionally possible for 180 Members of Congress, 86 less than a majority of both Houses, and less than 3,000 members of 36 State Legislatures, to do these things:

Abolish a republican form of government.

Establish a hereditary monarchy.

Abolish the Supreme Court.

Take away from the several States the right to levy taxes.

Prohibit the exercise of the Christian religion.

Confiscate all money in the banks.

Repudiate the national debt.

All these revolutionary changes, destroying the American system of government, can be brought about by less than 3,000 men, in spite of the protest of all other citizens of the United States, and the Supreme Court will be powerless to hold that such amendments are void, even though, as is clearly the case with the Eighteenth Amendment, they are in direct conflict with the existing Constitution.

E. J. SHRIVER

Chairman Executive Committee, The Vigilance League

New York, February 18

The Outlook for Religion

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

Religion, as well as industry and politics, needs resistance to dangerous radicalism. In the former, as in the latter, irresponsible agitators and conservative extremists make true progress difficult. Orthodox believers still cling to the literal infallibility of the Bible, and will not study it as they do other books, prizing the good and rejecting the evil. They worship it as the basis of all truth and virtue. The Catholics regard the Church rather than the Bible as the final authority, a position theoretically more liberal, but in practice they are as uncompromising as the Protestants.

Many movements, such as Positivism, Ethical Culture, Spiritualism, Theosophy, Christian Science, Monism, Rationalism, etc., have attempted to improve upon or supersede the Christian religion, and have rendered benefits along certain lines; but too often they have served only to destroy existing abuses, failing to advance constructive principles. Without disparagement of the work of any of these movements, or of any of the Christian denominations, the writer maintains that Rationalism—the exercise of reason in all problems of thought and conduct—thoroughly accepted and applied, would go a long way toward meeting present difficulties. It has long existed, both within the Church and without. It was a leading factor in the Renaissance and the Reformation, and can claim credit for the Copernican system, the doctrine of Evolution, and many other great truths. It has given humanity countless advances in science, art, education, and government, sharing at least equally with the altruistic spirit of Christianity in building the great edifice of modern civilization.

The most urgent task, therefore, is the rationalization of the churches, making all religious creeds and ordinances subject to the rules of reason, and substituting progress for the idea of finality. But Rationalism must discover and proclaim new religious views, as well as pass judgment on those already existing. It must work out a new philosophy of the cosmos, and a new code of morals, not destroying the vital elements of the old, but reproducing them in higher form, and correlating them with modern thought.

The separation of Church and State, in this country and some others, puts a serious difficulty in the way of thorough modernization. The people as a whole can not act in the interest of their religious needs. Religion, as education, concerns the people in general, and should be supervised and regulated by the Government. The "community church" is a move in the right direction, and all efforts to discard strictly sectarian teaching are commendable, but creeds and platforms should not be dropped entirely. The various creeds should be retained by those who sincerely hold them, but with tolerance and respect for the views of others. Gradually, the collective thought and experience of the congregations will determine what is helpful and what detrimental. The present is a supreme crisis in the churches, and the movement towards a more rational programme must be rapid if they are to endure. Liberals will accept all in the Christian religion that is sound and uplifting, but they will not accept error, or abandon the principles of rationality and progressiveness in the search for truth.

CYRUS H. ESHLEMAN

Ludington, Mich., February 19

Universities and the Danger Point

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

I read, February 7, "What Are Colleges For?" with profound interest. It is good to have you emphasize what cannot be too widely known, President Butler's and President Lowell's opinion that, as you say, education along the lines of narrowly applied science is not the only thing worth while. I can bear witness to the fact that one president of a State university—it cannot be doubted that there are others, and it is to be hoped that there are many—President Bryan of Indiana has long held and upheld the same opinion. But I cannot believe that your adjective, "dominant," used in respect to this idea is applicable to Columbia or Harvard or any other university in the United States at this time, and, therefore, I can not agree, much as I should like to do so, that the "point of danger" is passed. I should say rather that the point of danger has been perceived and is being attacked by a few farsighted men. But this is not enough. I dare affirm that a decided majority of every university faculty in the country to-day believes that education along the lines of narrowly applied science is the only thing worth while, including the "science of education." I heartily wish that facts to prove me wrong might be forthcoming.

May I touch upon one other point? You say that students must learn breadth and tolerance. But what you, and other farsighted ones who make this declaration, do not do is to keep on to the conclusion—the practical reason for studying the humanities—namely, increase of understanding among men; human sympathy. Sympathy is the product of imagination, and imagination—that which "bodies forth the forms of things unknown"—imagination, with all men save geniuses, soon withers and dies if it be not nourished by the one support which can be given it, communion and constant intercourse with the best that the past has thought and done. This support the American alma mater has largely withheld from her children for decades past. Applied science, largely at Germany's academic dictation, has taken the place of English literature, particularly English poetry, while the humanizing thought of the past, as expressed in architecture, the allied arts and music, has had, relatively speaking, no place at all. That the genius finds such support somehow, somewhere, is a commonplace.

John Drinkwater makes the point in question beautifully clear in his "Abraham Lincoln" when—it is the Fort Sumpter crisis—he has the President turn to Seward and say, (after a pause):

> "There is a tide in the affairs of men——"
> Do you read Shakespeare, Seward?
> Seward: Shakespeare? No.
> Lincoln: Ah!

But the rank and file of undergraduates are not geniuses or near-geniuses. With these it is necessary that imagination be nursed to the great end that sympathy may be awakened and quickened, and so their capacities for getting on with their fellow countrymen and worldmen be increased.

ALFRED M. BROOKS

Bloomington, Ind., February 18

Pelf and Pedagogy

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

Up and down the land the hat is being passed for the somewhat problematical benefit of the professor. Heroic exertions are being made to increase university salaries from fifteen to fifty per cent. over the present scale, although the authorities do not fail to realize that to save the present, or, to be exact, the former status of college teachers, their salaries will have to be doubled at the least, and that in the very near future. Of course, the crucial question is: Where's the money to come from? The teachers are tempted to say to their trustees: "That's not our problem, but yours." But being teachers, they say nothing. To some people it looks like a conspiracy of silence; they fear the teachers might "unionize" or amalgamate with the A. F. of L. No fear. Their vocational solidarity is not sufficient for that. Something else will have to happen to arouse the authorities to a full sense of the danger; rather, it is happening now. As the teachers die off, one by one, or as they desert the educational camp for the wider fields of business, their places are filled by men of lesser calibre.

Now supposing, optimistically, that the salaries of university teachers can be sufficiently amplified to put a stop to the professorial exodus, will the other pressing needs for duplication, aye, triplication, of collegiate endowments be met? The question simply amounts to this: Can the new crop of multi-millionaires produced of late be relied on to foster the higher learning with the same lavishness that has built up our institutions under the munificence of the past two generations? Or, in case the majority of privately endowed colleges should starve to death, can we hope for such spiritual enlightenment in our State Legislatures as would bring about a sudden amplification of their educational budgets? The truth is, universities have not been managed in conservative business fashion. Most of them have undertaken more than their finances can carry, they have "bitten off more than they can chew." The remedy lies in retrenchment. We have altogether too many institutions that strive to cover the whole ground, crippling themselves and their rivals in the effort. They are run too much like department stores; only there is no actual profit in some of the lines to offset losses in others. Isn't it absurd, for instance, for urban universities to encumber themselves, for the factitious show of the complete stock, with schools of mines and agriculture, or for rural universities to be conducting schools of law and medicine?

Educational institutions ought to change from their silly attitude of rivalry to one of thoroughgoing coöperation. Then they could easily agree on some form of labor division, and abandon the imaginary obligation of maintaining singly and severally all conceivable departments of instruction. By the assignment of particular departments to particular institutions within a given zone, and by partnership in the maintenance of important, but under the present system unprofitable, endeavors, the available funds could be made to go much farther; at the same time, the cause of higher education would be much better served.

OTTO HELLER

Washington University,
St. Louis, January 21

Book Reviews

The Interpreter of American Nationalism

The Life of John Marshall. By Albert J. Beveridge. Four Volumes. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co.

THE first and second volumes of ex-Senator Beveridge's "Life of Marshall" appeared in 1916. The third and the fourth, three years later. They all have but a single theme. In Marshall's day there was much mutual jealousy and suspicion among the different sections of the country. A majority of the people of each State felt it was, of right, still sovereign and independent. The Life makes plain how Marshall came to think and to feel nationally. It pictures to us those qualities which, at the age of forty-five, made him Chief Justice, and which, during the more than a third of a century of his service, enabled him to play in the nationalizing of the American people a part greater than that of any other man.

The present is a fitting time to tell such a story. It is true that it is fifty-five years since Appomattox, but, for almost another half century, the great party which Jefferson organized continued to profess adherence to those doctrines of States' Rights and strict construction upon which, in 1791, he based his argument against Hamilton's bill to charter a bank of the United States. That party has won seventeen out of our thirty-three Presidential elections. Even when, during its almost one-hundred and thirty years of activity, its fortunes have been at the lowest, its followers comprised nearly one-half the people of the United States.

So recently as 1912, the platform of the convention from which Mr. Wilson received his first nomination denounced as "usurpation the efforts of our opponents to deprive the States of any of the rights reserved to them, and to enlarge and magnify by indirection the powers of the Federal Government." Before another national convention came together, a Congress, Democratic in both branches, had enacted the first anti-child labor law, the Federal Reserve Bank Bill, and many another measure which, directly or indirectly, extended national power and influence at the expense of the States. The party of Jefferson had become as nationalistic as its opponents, and in 1916, for the first time in its history, its declaration of principles was silent as to States' Rights. In spite of the Virginia and Kentucky resolutions of 1798, and the teachings of John C. Calhoun and Jefferson Davis, the first four States to ratify the Eighteenth Amendment were Mississippi, Virginia, Kentucky, and South Carolina. Marshall has won. His triumph may be even too complete. The future will tell. At the moment his views are those of every section of his country. Were the economic, industrial and social forces which worked for national consolidation so powerful that they were bound to triumph, even if Marshall had never been?

It took a millennium to make Germany one, and, in the end, unity was achieved by methods which taught the German people that philosophy of politics which made possible the blood and wrack of the world war and its aftermaths. That titanic struggle enables us to comprehend, as before it few could, why our forefathers, during the wars of the French Revolution and Empire, felt and acted as they did. We were wont to think that the Republicans and the Federalists of the last decade of the Eighteenth Century, and of the first fifteen years of the Nineteenth, allowed themselves to become so absorbed in the drama which was being played across the sea that they lacked something of national self-respect. Since the 1st of August, 1914, we have learned to understand them better. For over a century everybody has wondered how the Federalists could have been stupid enough to pass the alien and sedition bills. John Marshall thought they were blunders then, and said so. In these last times we have put upon the statute book much legislation inspired by similar fears and dislikes, and are proposing to add to its volume.

We learn from this really great biography what manner of man Marshall was—how he worked and how he played. He becomes to us very human indeed. The book is readable from start to finish. In Marshall's early life there was little out of the ordinary. He served as an officer in the Revolutionary Army. He began to practise as a lawyer before he had made any serious study of the law. He was elected to the Legislature and subsequently to Congress. All these experiences were common to successful young men of his day, and since. His father, the descendant of some generations of mechanics and small farmers, was personally of the type that naturally becomes influential in the community. He was vestryman, burgess many times, sheriff, clerk of court, colonel in the Revolutionary Army, and a lifelong friend of Washington. His mother was a Keith of that family of the Earls Marischal of Scotland, many of whose members had brains as well as pedigrees. It was more to the purpose that she was a great-grandchild of that William Randolph and Mary Isham who were the common ancestors of Thomas Jefferson, of John Marshall, of John Randolph of Roanoke, and of Robert E. Lee.

Marshall was black-haired, tall, gaunt, loose-jointed and awkward, of great strength, and, in youth, athletic and fleet of foot. His eyes and the kindly expression of his countenance were his most attractive features. In his early life he was described as convivial to excess. This is doubtful, but it is probable that he always liked play better than work, though deep thinking was not necessarily work to him. At the bar and on the bench, he had an almost infallible instinct for the really important points of a case, and he seldom wasted time or strength on anything else. He never sought occasion to exert himself over that which did not seem worth while.

He had little faith in popular government, but in personal taste and habits he was the most democratic of men. He loved to mingle on familiar terms with people of every class. He enjoyed their society, and they his. The touch of indolence in his nature, combined with strong but quiet self-confidence, made it easy for him to listen patiently to arguments of intolerable length, or to appear so to do, even when he had prepared his opinion before counsel opened their mouths. He once jestingly said that the acme of judicial distinction means "the ability to look a lawyer straight in the eyes for two hours, and not hear a damned word he says." One who thinks that easy has never been a judge.

Senator Lodge in his "Life of Hamilton" refers to Marshall as "standing at the head of all lawyers," adding, "especially on Constitutional questions." There is point to the qualification. Marshall was a great advocate, and still a greater judge, when, as in Constitutional and international cases, he could think out great fundamental principles and apply them, unembarrassed by precedents established by minds of feebler grasp. Apart from the branches of jurisprudence to which a statesmanlike breadth of view is essential, his contributions to legal science were not great. His name is not associated with its development as is that of Mansfield, for example. On the bench he took his share, and perhaps more, of the common drudgery, but it is probable that he was, as a rule, quite willing to let his associates have a free hand in disposing of the ordinary run of cases, important as these usually were to the litigants, and intellectually interesting as they frequently proved to those who had a turn for such questions. If so, it was all the easier for them to follow his lead in matters about which he really cared.

The terms of the Supreme Court were then short. Travel was so uncomfortable, and even dangerous, that the Justices seldom brought their wives to Washington. During the sessions of the Court they lived in one boarding house; so that they became personally far more intimate than is usually possible to-day. Under such conditions, Marshall's charm and lovableness, his spirit of comradeship, his liking for a joke and a story, no less than the impression he always created of mental breadth, strength, clarity, and wisdom, gave him a personal influence over his colleagues, the importance of which it would be difficult to exaggerate.

These qualities explain why his power to speak for the Court did not end before his work was well begun. While for the first ten years of his Chief Justiceship the majority of his Court were, like himself, Federalists, after 1811, Bushrod Washington was the only associate who was not an appointee of Jefferson, Madison, or of one of their successors of the same political party. Of Marshall's great Constitutional decisions, only Marbury vs. Madison, and Fletcher vs. Peck were handed down while he still had the support of a Federal majority of the Court. Sturgis vs. Crowninshield, Dartmouth College vs. Woodward, McCulloch vs. Maryland, Osborn vs. The Bank, Cohens vs. Virginia, Gibbons vs. Ogden, Brown vs. Maryland, and the rest were decided by a court more than two-thirds of whose members had been selected in large part because it was believed that they were opponents of all that Marshall held dear in Constitutional construction.

One can not help being interested in the long duel between Jefferson and Marshall. There was no love lost between these second cousins, once removed. Jefferson nursed a grudge longer and had a greater capacity for personal hatred, but Marshall was at least equally tenacious in his opinions. Senator Beveridge throws into strong relief the exceeding shrewdness with which, during the critical opening years of the last century, he carried on the struggle to keep for the Judiciary that place which he believed the Constitution gave to it and which he was convinced the welfare of the country required that it should maintain.

The Republicans came into power, flushed with victory, and full of rage against the National Courts, as the last stronghold of their defeated adversaries. The "midnight judges" were ousted in contemptuous defiance of the Constitutional provision that they should hold their offices during good behavior. In each of the two Houses, the right of the Judiciary to pass upon the constitutionality of that or any other Act of Congress was vehemently denied. Procedural and other obstacles made it impossible for the Courts to reinstate the dismissed judges. There was grave danger that the practical limitation thus imposed upon the judicial power would, by the passage of years, ripen into an authoritative and irreversible construction of the Constitution. It was imperative that the Supreme Court should defend itself, and that right speedily, but how was it to be done? If executive assistance was required to enforce any order of the Court, based upon its having stricken down an Act of Congress as unconstitutional, it was certain that Jefferson would say, as very nearly thirty years later Jackson did say, "John Marshall has made his decision; now let him enforce it."

The Chief Justice found in Marbury's application for a mandamus to compel Madison, as Secretary of State, to deliver to him his commission as Justice of the Peace for the District of Columbia an opportunity safely to do the needful thing. The Supreme Court declared it could not grant the relief for which the plaintiff asked, because the Act of Congress which attempted to confer upon it the power to issue the writ of mandamus, was unconstitutional, and, in consequence, void, for the reason that it extended the original jurisdiction of the Court beyond the limits fixed by the Constitution. Jefferson might rage and his followers might imagine vain things, but, as to that case, there was nothing that they could do, for although the opinion said that Madison had refused to do his duty, no order had been passed against him.

The more zealous partisans of the administration hoped, through the exercise of the power of impeachment, to teach the judges that the Houses were their masters. It was upon this issue that the trial of Justice Chase really turned, rather than upon the allegations of the specific articles exhibited against him. No one had a clearer understanding of all that was involved than John Marshall. He knew that the intemperate expressions and the indiscreet conduct of his associate had put weapons into the hands of the foes of the Court. The pages of the Life tell us how alive he was to the danger, and how prudently he bore himself while the proceedings were pending. The acquittal of the accused ended forever the attempt in that way to strip the judiciary of its independence, as sixty years later a like verdict in favor of Andrew Johnson determined once for all that the President's political responsibility is not to Congress.

By his opinion in Marbury vs. Madison, Marshall took from his opponents the aid of time, and made it his ally. The longer what was there said remained unreversed and unqualified, the less likelihood there was that it could be successfully challenged. The Court could wisely rest content with the situation, but Senator Beveridge is not quite accurate in saying that fifty-two years passed before (in the Dred Scott case) it again asserted its right to declare unconstitutional an Act of Congress. In Hodgson vs. Bowerbank, 5th Cranch, 303, decided in 1809, it was held that the provision of the Judiciary Act of 1789, which attempted to confer upon the Circuit Courts jurisdiction over suits to which an alien was a party, exceeded the authority of Congress because it went beyond the Constitutional grant of judicial power to the Federal Government "over controversies between a State, or the citizens thereof, and foreign States, citizens or subjects." The most significant thing about this otherwise unimportant case is that in six years the doctrine of Marbury vs. Madison had become, to the Bench and Bar of the Court, a finality. The chief Justice disposed of the case in a single sentence: "Turn to the article of the Constitution of the United States, for the statute can not extend the jurisdiction beyond the limits of the Constitution." That was all. It was conclusive. The whole report of the case occupies but half a page.

One who holds that the Courts should strike down unconstitutional legislation need not necessarily favor a broad construction of the Constitution itself. Indeed it is a strict constructionist who would most often wish to exercise such a power. In the earlier years of the country's history, however, the earnest upholders of the prerogative of the Courts in this matter were almost always believers in an effective national government. This was strikingly true of Marshall. Why was he so strong a Nationalist when most of the Virginians of his generation took the other side? Senator Beveridge finds the chief explanation in the impressions made upon him by the unnecessary sufferings at Valley Forge, and, indeed, throughout the Revolutionary War, resulting from a military inefficiency which prolonged the conflict far beyond the time in which it could have been ended had the resources of the American Colonies been effectively used by a well-organized central administration. His devotion to Washington undoubtedly confirmed his Nationalistic leanings, but more important was his knack for seeing the essential thing. He felt that unless the power of the nation was strong enough not only to hold the States together, but to limit the lengths to which temporary gusts of popular opinion in particular localities might go, union, peace, order, or justice could not long be maintained. Almost all men have since reached the same conclusion. He got there first.

Senator Beveridge takes up each of Marshall's great decisions, and makes clear to us the way in which the issues involved presented themselves to the different classes then making up our people. His story of Burr's trial is especially interesting and unusually well told. Had Marshall been less firm and less clear-headed, our annals might not be so free of political prosecutions, under the guise of treason trials, as they fortunately are.

It might have been easier than we think to have fallen into the habit of at least occasionally waging our political battles by the aid of gallows, block, guillotine, or firing squad.

Space will not permit an examination of the author's account of the great cases in which Marshall upheld the duty of the Supreme Court to compel State tribunals to act upon its construction of the Constitution, and to require State Legislatures to respect the obligations of contracts, and to refrain from interfering with interstate commerce or with those agencies which the Federal Government, in the exercise of its implied powers, has found useful. All of it is excellently done. Since Thayer's Cavour, no American has given to the world so valuable a biography of a great historical personage.

JOHN C. ROSE

Disentangling Socialism from Bolshevism

THE PSYCHOLOGY OF BOLSHEVISM. By John Spargo. New York: Harper and Brother.

MR. SPARGO'S efforts to disentangle Socialism from Bolshevism arouse (in one who knows his Spargo) mixed emotions. In the mixture it is easy to identify a modicum of amusement, a modicum of admiration, and a modicum of satisfaction; and, under the influence of these three, it is natural to pronounce, if not an enthusiastic, at least a tolerant benediction upon those efforts. In the language of the street, they will probably be "all to the good," anyhow!

"The Psychology of Bolshevism" is an amusing work, because it exhibits Mr. Spargo's anxiety (as a Socialist) to clear his own skirts and the skirts of his party from responsibility for the consequences of putting into practice the doctrines of their chief evangelist, Karl Marx. It excites in the reader a real admiration for the mental agility that is displayed therein, and it produces at least some satisfaction, because it shows that Socialism in practice, alias Bolshevism in Russia, has frightened a good many of our Socialists in America, who, seemingly, never intended any such results and do not like them now that they have occurred. In the belief that Mr. Spargo's latest book may help to bring others to the same state of dissatisfaction it has our blessing.

His adventures in the field of psychopathology—to explain the phenomena of "parlor-Bolshevism," and so forth—are conducted with the same fluent facility of phrase-making and easy generalization that are to be found in more than one of his previous essays in compromise. Much in the "Psychology of Bolshevism" reminds us of his book wherein he "reconciled" Socialism with the Judæo-Christian theology. It is all simple, after all. One can as easily say "hysterical hyper-æsthesia" as "immanence," and "psycho-neurosis" is a very comfortable refuge. Besides, every intelligent newspaper reader nowadays is presumed to know the main "complexes" recognized by the "Sunday science" of psychoanalysis. It is a diverting sketch that Mr. Spargo draws of the typical Bolshevist Intellectual. Here are some of his main characteristics : — "exaggerated egoism, extreme intolerance, intellectual vanity, hypercriticism, self-indulgence, craving for mental and emotional excitement, excessive dogmatism, hyperbolic language, impulsive judgment, emotional instability, intense hero-worship, propensity for intrigues and conspiracies, rapid alternation of extremes of exaltation or depression, violent contradictions in tenaciously held opinions and beliefs, periodic, swift, and unsystematic changes of mental attitude." He has evidently been conscientious in his studies of the current literature of "opinion," journalism of "protest," and broadsheets of "revolt." To do him bare justice it is only fair to say that he himself has never been of this class; compromise has ever been the keynote of his thought. He has always sought to prove that Socialism was a gentle thing, quite compatible with religion, the family, personal property, home comforts, and the other simple pleasures and treasured convictions of the humble every-day bourgeois. Small wonder that he wants to convince us that Bolshevism is a wicked perversion of the true Marxian faith!

He will not grudge us a quiet chuckle over it, we feel sure!

Recent Books on Mexican Problems

THE PLOT AGAINST MEXICO. By L. J. de Bekker. New York: Alfred A. Knopf.
INTERVENTION IN MEXICO. By Samuel Guy Inman. New York: Association Press.
INDUSTRIAL MEXICO. By P. Harvey Middleton. New York: Dodd, Mead and Company.

IN recent publications concerning Mexico there is to be found little that has not already appeared several times during the last three years. So long, however, as the Mexican problem continues to have news value, we must expect the frequent publication of books with such titles as "The Shameful Treatment of Americans by Mexico" or "The Crime Against Mexico." If a correspondent becomes impregnated with the desire to carry to the American public the message which comes to him during his fleeting "first-hand" investigation, he must, of course, express it in print, but it is unfortunate that he can not state it in a concise article in one of the current periodicals or in a Sunday supplement.

"The Plot Against Mexico," by Mr. de Bekker, is the most recent contribution from visiting journalists. Of the nineteen chapters, two are devoted to the "plot" and occasional reference to this thesis may be found elsewhere, but the remainder of the book is devoted to a repetition of impressions and facts that have for some time been common property. The writer appears to have a genius for relating the most commonplace facts with all the ardor of one who has made a new discovery. The reader should remember this literary ability when he reads, for example, on page 53, that Mexico's "assets are a thousand times in excess of her liabilities."

The plot against Mexico is not undeserving of attention. There is, undoubtedly, a small group of men who have wished to bring about intervention in Mexican affairs. And any discerning reader of the daily newspapers must have been impressed by the "yellow" character of much of the news coming from Mexico. It has been unfair, highly colored, and calculated to stir the feeling of the country. Mr. de Bekker does a service in bringing these facts together in striking form. But to recognize these facts is one thing, and to characterize them as "a plot" in which high Government officials are implicated is quite another thing.

Mr. Inman's book is much more carefully and modestly written. Mr. Inman has had long experience in Mexico, and is entitled to express seasoned opinions. Moreover, he has the first requisite of a writer upon Mexico, viz., a sympathetic understanding of the Latin-American. He has known President Carranza longer and more intimately than any other writer in the United States, and while his picture of the Mexican President is highly complimentary and possibly a little prejudiced, he is not ignorant of the weaknesses of the man, and, altogether, his portrayal of Carranza is probably the best that has appeared in English. Mr. Inman is also much impressed by the activity of those Americans who desire intervention. He is firmly of the opinion that intervention would be a tremendous blunder. He has no panacea, but believes that the Mexican problem can be solved only by long and patient efforts to educate the masses of the people in the practical arts, the cultural subjects, and in higher ideals. And, finally, "the great problem before the Mexican people is the development of character, and to the working out of this problem all of Mexico's friends are called to help." As a presentation of the Mexican point of view, there is much in this volume to arouse sober thought among Americans.

Mr. Middleton's book is of an entirely different type, and we must confess some relief in reading a current book that makes no pretense at interpreting Mexicans or the Mexican problem. The book is an economic manual, giving the prin cipal industrial and financial facts—such as we have been accustomed to find in the Mexican Year Book up to 1914, and, more recently, in the Latin-American Year Book. Mr. Middleton's book is superior to the Mexican Year Book in that it brings the facts up to date, and it is better written and more carefully edited than the Latin-American Year Book.

In addition to the ordinary commercial and industrial statistics, it contains much recent information of interest to American investors, such as the proposed new petroleum law, the new mining law, together with some remarks on the probable trend of the new banking legislation. The book is readable, timely, and appears to be reliable. Mr. Middleton states, in his interesting introduction, that the business men of best standing in Mexico are now of the opinion that Article 27 of the new Constitution will be so amended as to protect the foreign interests. He is also of the opinion that the Mexican Government is about to take steps to recognize and refund the debts of the Huerta régime. It is difficult to conceive of two acts of the Mexican Government that could do more to quiet the feeling of unrest that is evident wherever the interests of foreigners are touched by the present Government. And, incidentally, nothing could do more to rehabilitate Mexico's credit. The opinion that Mexico is preparing to recognize her international obligations is borne out by other recent books. It would seem, therefore, that the present is not the time to spread broadcast a propaganda of intervention.

Mr. Bullard on Russia

The Russian Pendulum. By Arthur Bullard. New York: The Macmillan Company.

MR. BULLARD'S new book deserves careful attention. Much of it is valuable first-hand material for the student, and some of it, alas, can not be considered as entirely accurate or unbiased. The author is a trained and painstaking observer, and where he has erred it has been in fields where he depended on the testimony of others rather than upon his own personal investigation, and where his own background has inclined him to see many things only through the eyes of the Russian revolutionists of the beginning of the present century.

Quite the most valuable feature of the volume is his opening chapter devoted to Lenin. Here we have the results of the author's personal observation and searching interviews, and it is to be doubted if there exists a more authoritative analysis of the mentality of the man who is the brains of the whole Bolshevist revolution. What makes this analysis particularly interesting is that it is based on an acquaintance dating back to 1905.

When Mr. Bullard deals with the conditions and institutions of Russia under the Old Régime, he is less sure of his ground. Few will attempt to defend the lumbering old bureaucracy with its arbitrary conduct, its incompetence and corruption, but if one sees it only as a malevolent tyranny and has not actually lived among the peasants under it, the tendency is to exaggerate their unhappiness and misery. His study of the Zemstvo, Duma, and Coöperative institutions is well done, considering the space at his disposal, and especially good is his account of the development of that new phenomenon in Russian life, the Soviet, an account that shatters the fiction circulated concerning it by Raymond Robins and other superficial observers. In his treatment of the land problem, and particularly of the peasant commune, he is less happy. His statements concerning land tenure, allotment, and redemption payments, and especially the attitude of the peasants toward the commune, require considerable correction and modification. He distinctly misinterprets the land reforms of Stolypin and their motives, reforms that were almost universally welcomed by the peasants as freeing them from the yoke of the commune, and which marked a great step forward toward an enlightened solution of the agrarian problem.

In dealing with the March Revolution and the Provisional Government, Mr. Bullard does not exaggerate the difficulties that confronted Kerensky, but he takes entirely too kindly a view of this contemptible and cheap little demagogue, who, more than any other, was responsible for the failure of the revolution. On the other hand, he does not do justice to Kornilov, displaying a partisan bias and ignoring Kornilov's address before the Congress at Moscow and his understanding with Kerensky, which the latter so treacherously repudiated in the crisis.

The study of the November Revolution and the Bolshevik régime is excellent. With all of the author's judgments and conclusions one may not agree, but one must grant it fairmindedness and careful analysis. With the third section of his book, the part that deals with Siberia, the case is different. Here he viewed events and men from the far-distant city of Vladivostok, the worst place in all the world in which to gain information as to the facts or to form fair judgments as to men and movements. With reference to this, it is fair to quote the author's own words, appended to his account of the coup d'état of November 18, 1918, at Omsk. "The truth of the matter was that at Vladivostok we did not have any facts on which to base a judgment." In fact, the Siberian part is unworthy of the writer and appears to have been done under pressure to pad out an otherwise admirable book, a pressure which is also indicated by the faulty transliteration of Russian names.

Proletarian Comedy

Storm in a Teacup. By Eden Phillpotts. New York: The Macmillan Company.

Two Men: A Romance of Sussex. By Alfred Ollivant. New York: Doubleday, Page and Company.

The Taming of Nan. By Ethel Holdsworth. New York: E. P. Dutton and Company.

THE comedy of the small town and the main street continues to win much attention from current British novelists. Mr. Phillpotts is still at his old game with the witty, garrulous, and appallingly above-board denizens of what may now be frankly recognized as the land of Phillpottsia. Long since it became evident that, for all their differences of accent and whether placed in Devon or Wales or Cornwall, his people are pretty much the same in type and treatment. For the rest, "Storm in a Teacup" adds to his earlier romances of industry the atmosphere and the technique of the paper-maker's trade. Step by step, with interludes of romantic comedy, we follow the processes of paper manufacture; and the expositor makes little attempt to conceal from us that we are under instruction. No less than seven of the chapters are frankly devoted to describing the different stages of paper-making, most of them under titles like "The Rag House," and "The Drying Lofts." In short, readers of Mr. Phillpotts who do not skip these chapters for the story may now add a knowledge of this industry to the lore of poppy-growing, shepherding, slate-quarrying, and divers other trades with which the writer's earlier novels will have acquainted them. He has little to add to the interpretation of rustic character and situation which charmed so many readers in his earlier novels; and there is no denying a sense of repetition and dilution in much of the later work.

"Two Men" and "The Taming of Nan" are chronicles of the main street and the vulgar cit. Mr. Ollivant's two men are brothers. Their father, Edward Caspar, is not quite a gentleman, being the son of a rich but rough-and-ready contractor. With the makings of a scholar, he has succumbed early to drink, and allowed himself to be privately married by a lower-class woman of character who is devoted to him. Ernest, the elder son, inherits something of his father's wondering simplicity of nature, his practical helplessness, and his taste. Alf, the younger, is a born gutter-rat, the embodiment of all the squalid instincts and sordid motives of the slum-bred child. To tell the truth, it is Alf's very completeness which casts doubt upon the whole book. He is too unshaded a rascal. His pusillanimity and malignity are plain to see; and we can not believe that the Trupps and the Pigotts of the story would have let him off with any such mild tushing and finger-shaking as the narrative records. Nor can we quite believe that his mother, who is certainly not a fool, would have waited so long before turning on him with the verdict he patently deserves. Alf becomes the pushing and foxy man of business and duly achieves a waistcoat and a watch-chain. Ern, the feckless and half-awakened, drifts along unprosperously enough, putting always the wrong foot foremost, and yet never altogether losing sight of a faint star towards which his stumbling way does vaguely lead. In the end, or rather at the point where we lose sight of him, his loyal heart finds its humble reward. What makes the book, of course, is not its matter but its substance, that fabric which owes its richness more to the workman's hand than to any visible quality in the material. Mr. Ollivant's work has been oddly unequal in this respect, ranging from the firm perfection of "Bob, Son of Battle," to the artificiality of "Boy Woodburn." But for the dubious figure of Alf, one might unhesitatingly place "Two Men" with his best work.

Readers with a keen eye for new work of unusual quality may recall the appearance a year or two ago of "Helen of Four Gates" by an Englishwoman who chose to sign herself "An Ex-Mill Girl." It was a rather "grim" story, with a flavor which reminded more than one reviewer of Hardy and, a considerably stranger thing, won the praise of the old Master himself. "The Taming of Nan" is less "uncompromising," that is, less disagreeable in its net effect. Indeed we recognize it, in retrospect at least, as romantic comedy. But it is romantic comedy reduced to nearly its lowest terms. Nan Cherry, married to and honest fellow, and mother of a nearly grown girl, is a fighting shrew: "The untamable hooligan—the Stone Age hidden under the veneer of Civilization. She had neither humor, imagination, nor protectiveness. She should have been an apache's mate." The man Cherry is a huge porter, a man of humor and self-command. We see him in the opening scene, breasting the torrent of his mate's wild speech and regarding her with a glance "of affectionate tolerance, mingled with that of a man who has lost all illusions, but knows that he has his feet, if the worst comes to the worst." Feet, that is, to stand on and if necessary to run away with. He loses them presently on the railway, and comes home a cripple for life. Nan does not soften towards him. She scorns him for his helplessness and for a long time treats him brutally. How he gets back a place in the world and finally wins Nan for good is the matter of a very good story. There is Polly's story, too, which is of hardly secondary interest. Indeed, it is as a study of her emergence from the blurred prettiness and apparently unprotected amativeness of girlhood to real achievements in character and happiness that the book may especially commend itself to the confirmed yet still hopeful novel reader.

H. W. Boynton

Ancient Architecture

The Foundations of Classic Architecture. By Herbert Langford Warren, A.M., Late Fellow of the American Institute of Architects and Dean of the Faculty of Architecture of Harvard University. Illustrated from Documents and Original Drawings. New York: The Macmillan Company.

The death in 1918 of Professor Herbert Langford Warren, late Dean of the Harvard University School of Architecture, deprived American scholarship of one of its most promising figures. The volume which the Macmillans have just published under the title of "The Foundations of Classic Architecture" gives rise to new regrets that his late-maturing, but richly-developed, literary and critical talent was not spared for wider and still higher achievement. His death left the manuscript of this volume nearly ready for publication; the last chapter has been sympathetically completed from his notes by the editor, Professor Fiske Kimball, upon whom devolved also the selection of the 118 excellent illustrations which elucidate the text and of the beautiful drawings by the author's brother, Harold B. Warren, which serve as caption-pieces to the five chapters or sections of the book.

These five chapters discuss with fine scholarship, wholly free from affectation or pedantry, and with admirable discrimination between essentials and non-essentials, the architectures respectively of Egypt, Mesopotamia, Persia, the Aegean civilization, and Greece. The author vitalizes the ancient styles, setting forth with simplicity and clearness the conditions which gave them birth, and the processes by which they were developed. His explanations of their methods of construction and his descriptions of their characteristic forms and decorative details gain in the reader's interest by their freedom from technical jargon. The various streams of influence leading through and from the more ancient architectures to the culminating art of Greece are traced with remarkable clarity. The reviewer knows of no work that deals more sanely, and at the same time sympathetically and convincingly, with that glorious culmination. Breadth of view and sincerity of treatment characterize the whole discussion.

It was inevitable that such a survey should involve dealing with certain matters of controversy, especially in the field of theories or origins. Such questions Professor Warren handles with perfect fairness to theories from which he dissents, while expressing his own conclusions with clear conviction. Not all readers will agree with his contention in favor of the purely lithic origin of the entire Doric order, both column and entablature, but one is forced to admire the clarity and sanity of his presentation of this contention. We may assent in general to his division of all architectural forms into the two classes of "primary" and "secondary" forms, according to their structural origin, without necessarily assenting to all his applications of this classification; but no one can read Professor Warren's suggestive and illuminating discussions of such questions without an awakened interest and a real intellectual pleasure. Here is the ripest work of a scholar and teacher, who refuses to follow traditional ruts or to be bound by narrow prejudices; the final masterpiece of a teacher who never could be a mere pedagogue, but who, if his teaching was like this book in its charm of literary style and clearness of exposition, must have been an inspiring and stimulating educator.

The book is beautifully printed on heavy plate paper, and the only typographical error the reviewer has discovered is the unfortunate printing upside down of Figure 91 on page 284. There is an adequate index, but no list of illustrations.

The Run of the Shelves

Without doubt Mrs. Whitehouse did excellent work in interesting the Swiss press in the war aims of America and in the vast war preparations which were being made. She admits it. No doubt, also, this publicity was not without its effect in counteracting German propaganda in Switzerland and in heartening those whose sympathies were with the Allies. But a reading of her book ("A Year as a Government Agent"; Harper), interesting as it is, leaves one in doubt as to whether it is an apologia or a suffrage tract. Further, it exposes again the error of creating an extra-legal government department, The Committee on Public Information, with authority to act abroad in matters of foreign policy independently of the Department of State. It may be that, as Mrs. Whitehouse declares, the American Legation in Switzerland was inefficient, or trammeled by the traditions of diplomacy, unable to meet certain vital issues raised by German propaganda. But the fact remains that an independent publicity bureau, uncontrolled by the Department of State, might easily, and in many places actually did, put forth "publicity" and foster policies inimical to the lines decided upon by the Department. The obstructions which Mrs. Whitehouse found from this quarter are not correctly attributable to the fact that she was a woman and a suffragist, or to antiquated methods of secret diplomacy, but to the fact that, lacking proper control in a field for which it was solely responsible, the legation could not be sure of her discretion and the subordination of her work to the Department policy. The fault was not that of Mrs. Whitehouse, but of those who instituted a system in which there was bound to be conflict of authority.

Mrs. Whitehouse's book is a lively recital of her personal experiences and gives a vivid account of the trying conditions under which Switzerland maintained neutrality, and her doctrinaire views on diplomacy and democracy add zest to it.

During the course of the war it looked for a time as though the convenient little Leipsic "Tauchnitz Edition of British and American Authors" might go down in the universal wreck of German interests. In the middle of 1915, M. Louis Conard started at Paris "The Standard Collection of British and American Authors," modeled, as regards size and thickness, on Baron Tauchnitz's volumes, and declared that "ninety per cent. of the former Tauchnitz authors have signed with me for the duration of the war and for five years after the peace." Before the end of 1916, M. Conard had published nearly forty volumes from such well-known writers as Mrs. Humphry Ward, Booth Tarkington, W. E. Norris, Mrs. Atherton, Arnold Bennett, Joseph Conrad, Miss May Sinclair, and John Galsworthy; and the volumes are still appearing. But so are the Leipsic volumes, and what is more, some authors are found in both lists. Thus, C. N. and A. M. Williamson gave M. Conard "Secret History" more than two years ago, and Baron Tauchnitz starts his renewed, after-war series, No. 4, 527 of the Edition, with "The Wedding Day" of these same joint authors. Mr. Arnold Bennett is still more conspicuous in this respect. Though he gave M. Conard "The Price of Love" and "These Twain," four volumes in all, he has just appeared in two volumes at Leipsic—"The Truth About an Author" and "The City of Pleasure." Bernard Shaw, however, much as might have been expected, remained faithful to the German house, and both of the latest issues from across the Rhine are from him—"The Plays for Puritans" and "John Bull's Other Island." The truth of the matter is that a great collection of nearly 5,000 volumes, the copyright paid for, the plates stereotyped, and embracing, not only the most popular British and American authors of the day, but the classics of the past like Shakespeare, Milton, Byron, Irving, Cooper, Dickens, Thackeray, Macaulay, Emerson, and a host of others, can not easily die, especially as the founder of the series, the first Baron Tauchnitz, and its continuator, the present Baron, were the warm personal friends of many of the most famous writers on both sides of the Atlantic.

"Memoirs of the American Academy at Rome" Volume II (New York: University Press Association) offers first a selection of the current work of the Fellows of the Academy in painting, sculpture, and architecture. We have reconstructions of the Ponte Rotto, of Hadrian's Round Pavilion near Tivoli, a study of the admirable formal garden of the Villa Gamberaia at Settignano, and, most important, a reconstruction of Bramante's original design for the Court and Pavilion of the Belvedere at the Vatican. Expressive of the advantages of coöperative study under favorable conditions is the joint design for the sanctuary of a Roman Catholic church by fellows respectively in architecture, painting, and sculpture. Four archæological papers by members of the affiliated School of Classical Studies make up the bulk of the volume. These are creditable on the scholarly side and interesting to any reader with a modicum of ancient lore.

E. Douglas van Buren discourses on Terracotta Arulae. These miniature altars are mostly tomb finds from Magna Græcia and Sicily. The author thinks they represent a survival of an Asiatic custom of combining altar and tomb. Of the 276 examples analytically catalogued, 86 are animal subjects, 97 mythologies, and 69 genre themes. These altarlets are of good period, Fifth and Sixth Centuries B. C. The essay seems pretty well to exhaust the subject. Lucy George Roberts's article on "The Gallic Fire and the Roman Records" touches the layman more nearly. Historians, supposing that the sack of 387 B. C. must have destroyed all records, have dismissed all earlier accounts of Rome as legendary. From a careful study of the location of the archives and of fabric records Miss Roberts arrives at the reassuring conclusion that international, legal, and senatorial papers probably survived the fire, while only priestly records were certainly destroyed. These could have been replaced from memory. Thus, we need not wholly forego the she-wolf nor yet the capitoline geese. In a brief paper Albert William van Buren makes some minute contributions to the archæology of the Forum at Pompeii. It is a bit of a shock to learn that important and bulky objects mentioned in the diaries of the excavators have utterly disappeared. The single contribution in the mediæval field is Stanley Lothrop's careful study of Pietro Cavallina, who, more than his junior contemporary, Giotto, revived the Roman style of painting. Mr. Lothrop's reconstruction follows the lines of Venturi's, but is more conservative, rejecting all panel pictures. Thirty-five plates of good scale and definition are treasure trove for the special student. The very interesting frescoes in the Palazzo Communale at Perugia are here first published. The whole volume make an impression of serious and well-balanced activity on both the practical and historical sides of art. It should hearten the supporters of the Academy to renewed and extended effort looking towards a permanent endowment.

Mrs. Cynthia Morgan St. John, of Ithaca, New York, who died last summer, spent nearly forty years of her life making one of the most complete Wordsworth collections to be found here or in Europe. For the past ten years Mrs. St. John was occupied in preparing for Messrs. Houghton Mifflin a "Bibliography of Wordsworth," but the publication was finally abandoned on account of the author's ill-health. Into this work was being put a mass of inedited notes and references, and it would have contained also eighteen facsimile illustrations of interesting Wordsworthiana from her collection, which is now being catalogued and about to be offered for sale.

Besides the thirty-three regular editions given in some of the bibliographies of the poet, Mrs. St. John had the rare privately printed issues and several containing variations not noted elsewhere. In addition to a copy of "The Lyrical Ballads" (1798), we find here a second copy of the same issue, but with the name of Joseph Cattle, Bristol, on the title page, which slight variation adds considerable value to the volume.

The collection contains not only books and separate poems by Wordsworth, but many volumes, pamphlets, and poems about the poet—publications referring to him, biographies, poems addressed to him, parodies, a considerable number of manuscripts, a score of books from Wordsworth's own library, the bust which belonged to Mrs. Wordsworth, an early portrait painted for Cattle by Shurter, a considerable number of other portraits, including a large engraving signed by Wordsworth, and many rare relics, such as a lock of his hair.

It is impossible to read many pages of Laurie Magnus' "European Literature in the Centuries of Romance" (Dutton) and retain one's patience. It is exasperating to be told that Dares and Dictys relate the story of Troilus and Criseyde, that Saxo's History is interesting because "it narrates the tales of the old Anglo-Saxon epic 'Beowulf,'" that the Nibelungen poet "incorporated all that went before him in the matter known as 'Germania'; the lay of Hildebrand . . . 'Beowulf' of the northern mainland, 'Maldon' of our own coasts and similar heroic poems," that "Piers the Plowman, who is Peter the Church, starts in the character of a just man, and is gradually spiritualized into a symbol of Christ. His original dream in the Malvern hills," etc., etc. In a general sketch of European literature from the tenth century to the twentieth, of which this first of three projected volumes brings the story down to the middle of the seventeenth, minor inaccuracies and considerable omissions might be pardoned, if the broad lines were sound and clear.

Magnus ab integro saeclorum nascitur ordo.

What we get instead is clutter, and not very trustworthy clutter, and at a frightfully high price. Magnus and ordo are as the poles asunder. Doubtless as the work progresses into more modern times things will go better. It would have been wiser if the first part had not been attempted at all.

"The Story of the Great War," by William Stanley Braithwaite (Stokes), is intended for the boy and girl reader, but the style and method is that of a compressed weekly press history, crowded with detail. A more concise and more general treatment would have answered better the writer's purpose; it is a quite possible thing to do, and has not yet been attempted. The general spirit of the book is appreciative rather than discriminating—we read, for instance, that "the conquest of the air was an American achievement." Beside this, the occasional inexcusable errors of the text fade into insignificance. For the most part, the author is accurate in his statement of facts. His military narrative presents a clear arrangement, chronologically and by campaigns—except for the events of 1918; but it is not clear how his boy and girl readers are to follow even the larger outlines of his narrative without even a single map.

The devices which go to the making of E. Phillips Oppenheim's "The Great Impersonation" (Little, Brown)—the two men who look alike, the assumption by one of them of the rôle of the other, and even the skillfully managed surprise at the end—have all met with the approval of time. But they are not for that reason the less capable of holding one's interest, especially when the story turns on the machinations of the German spy system in the tense days preceding the war.

Winter Mist

FROM a magazine with a rather cynical cover I learned very recently that for pond skating the proper costume is brown homespun with a fur collar on the jacket, whereas for private rinks one wears a gray herringbone suit and taupe-colored alpine. Oh, barren years that I have been a skater, and no one told me of this! And here's another thing. I was patiently trying to acquire a counter turn under the idle gaze of a hockey player who had no better business till the others arrived than to watch my efforts. "What I don't see about that game," he said at last, "is who wins?" It had never occurred to me to ask. He looked bored, and I remembered that the pictures in the magazine showed the wearers of the careful costumes for rink and pond skating as having rather blank eyes that looked illimitably bored. I have hopes of the "rocker" and the "mohawk"; I might acquire a proper costume for skating on a small river if I could learn what it is; but a bored look—why, even hockey does not bore me, unless I stop to watch it. I don't wonder that those who play it look bored. Even Alexander, who played a more imaginative game than hockey, was bored—poor fellow, he should have taken up fancy skating in his youth; I never heard of a human being who pretended to a complete conquest of it.

I like pond skating best by moonlight. The hollow among the hills will always have a bit of mist about it, let the sky be clear as it may. The moonlight, which seems so lucid and brilliant when you look up, is all pearl and smoke round the pond and the hills. The shore that was like iron under your heel as you came down to the ice is vague, when you look back at it from the centre of the pond, as the memory of a dream. The motion is like flying in a dream; you float free and the world floats under you; your velocity is without effort and without accomplishment, for, speed as you may, you leave nothing behind and approach nothing. You look upward. The mist is overhead now; you see the moon in a "hollow halo" at the bottom of an "icy crystal cup," and you yourself are in just such another. The mist, palely opalescent, drives past her out of nothing into nowhere. Like yourself, she is the centre of a circle of vague limit and vaguer content, where passes a swift, ceaseless stream of impression through a faintly luminous halo of consciousness.

If by moonlight the mist plays upon the emotions like faint, bewitching music, in sunlight it is scarcely less. More often than not when I go for my skating to our cosy little river, a winding mile from the mill-dam to the railroad trestle, the hills are clothed in silver mist which frames them in vignettes with blurred edges. The tone is that of Japanese paintings on white silk, their color showing soft and dull through the frost-powder with which the air is filled. At the mill-dam the hockey players furiously rage together, but I heed them not, and in a moment am beyond the first bend, where their clamor comes softened on the air like that of a distant convention of politic crows. The silver powder has fallen on the ice, just enough to cover earlier tracings and leave me a fresh plate to etch with grapevines and arabesques. The stream winds ahead like an unbroken road, striped across with soft-edged shadows of violet, indigo, and lavender. On one side it is bordered with leaning birch, oak, maple, hickory, and occasional groups of hemlocks under which the very air seems tinged with green. On the other, rounded masses of scrub oak and alder roll back from the edge of the ice like clouds of reddish smoke. The river narrows and turns, then spreads into a swamp, where I weave my curves round the straw-colored tussocks. Here, new as the snow is, there are earlier tracks than mine. A crow has traced his parallel hieroglyph, alternate footprints with long dashes where he trailed his middle toe as he lifted his foot and his spur as he brought it down. Under a low shrub that has hospitably scattered its seed is a dainty, close-wrought embroidery of tiny bird feet in irregular curves woven into a circular pattern. A silent glide towards the bank, where among bare twigs little forms flit and swing with low conversational notes, brings me in company with a working crew of pine siskins, methodically rifling seed cones of birch and alder, chattering sotto voce the while. Under a leaning hemlock the writing on the snow tells of a squirrel that dropped from the lowest branch, hopped aimlessly about for a few yards, then went up the bank. Farther on, where the river narrows again, a flutter-headed rabbit crossing at top speed has made a line seemingly as free from frivolous indirection as if it had been defined by all the ponderosities of mathematics. There is no pursuing track; was it his own shadow he fled, or the shadow of a hawk?

The mist now lies along the base of the hills, leaving the upper ridges almost imperceptibly veiled and the rounded tops faintly softened. The snowy slopes are etched with brush and trees so fine and soft that they remind me of Dürer's engravings, the fur of Saint Jerome's lion, the cock's feathers in the coat of arms with the skull. From behind the veil of the southernmost hill comes a faint note as

From undiscoverable lips that blow
An immaterial horn.

It is the first far premonition of the noon train; I pause and watch long for the next sign. At last I hear its throbbing, which ceases as it pauses at the flag station under the hill. There the invisible locomotive shoots a column of silver vapor above the surface of the mist, breaking in rounded clouds at the top, looking like nothing so much as the photograph of the explosion of a submarine mine, a titanic outburst of force in static pose, a geyser of atomized water standing like a frosted elm tree. Then quick puffs of dusky smoke, the volley of which does not reach my ear till the train has stuck its black head out of fairyland and become a prosaic reminder of dinner. High on its narrow trestle it leaps across my little river and disappears between the sandbanks. Far behind it the mist is again spreading into its even layers. Silence is renewed, and I can hear the musical creaking of four starlings in an apple tree as they eviscerate a few rotten apples on the upper branches. I turn and spin down the curves and reaches of the river without delaying for embroideries or arabesques. At the mill-dam the hockey game still rages; the players take no heed of the noon train.

> Let Zal and Rustum bluster as they will,
> Or Hatim call to supper . . .

Their minds and eyes are intent on a battered disk of hard rubber. I begin to think I have misjudged them when I consider what effort of imagination must be involved in the concentration of the faculties on such an object, transcending the call of hunger and the lure of beauty. Is it to them as is to the mystic "the great syllable Om" whereby he attains Nirvana? I can not attain it; I can but wonder what the hockey players win one-half so precious as the stuff they miss.

ROBERT PALFREY UTTER

George Soures, an Athenian Satirist

HE made others laugh, but he could not laugh himself. Of very few men would this saying hold so true as of George Soures, the most popular poet of contemporary Greece, whose death was announced a few weeks ago from Athens. As a poet, in the strictest sense of the word, he can hope for little favor at the hands of the critics. Horace might bring against him the same charge he brought against Lucilius: "Often in a single hour he would declaim two hundred verses as a great feat and standing on one foot at that." But he might also say of him that he is clever and keen to detect and satirize evil. In the field of satire there is no doubt that Soures deserves a place of honor.

His popularity has been unchallenged for years. To mention the name of Soures might be sufficient to make any Greek townsman or peasant smile. A poem or verse of his recited would bring good humor to a gloomy company. In Athens when the paper boys who had the luck to seize the first packs of Soures' weekly, The Romios—the word means "The Greek" with a derisive touch to it —rushed through the streets yelling at the top of their voices "two cents for Soures' 'Romios'!" the announcement had the effect of an exhilarating breeze. The sleepy man in the generally crowded coffee house would jump up eager to snatch a copy; the businessman would dispatch his errand boy for the new number of the satirical review. The housekeeper would open her window to call loudly after the impatiently running youngster; and the hired cook would exercise particular industry in her work for that day in order to gain from her mistress the privilege of a glance at the comic little weekly.

In lounging places a group would assemble round the happy owner of a copy and listen to the reading, eager to hear how Soures would handle the last political developments and what he had to say about the Prime Minister, the King, the Queen, the Parliament, the Mayor, the Great Powers, etc. Often the readers would be delighted to find that Soures would poke fun at himself and sometimes even at his own wife and children. Friendship, kinship, majesty, power were all the same to him. He would heap ridicule upon them whenever they seemed to deserve it; and, although he never shows bitterness and appears to enjoy himself by making others laugh good-naturedly, one easily detects that the comedian laughs lest he should weep.

To say that Soures is an incurable pessimist, that he is absolutely disgusted with life, and that he laughs a hopelessly tragic laugh, would seem to the great majority of the Greeks a preposterous statement. For they have always accepted him as a merrymaker through and through. But Soures was not a happy man. Born in 1853, in the island of Syra, of a Chian family, he studied in his native place and then went to the University of Athens to attend courses in classical philology. For some reason he failed to pass his examinations for the doctorate, a fact which led him to exercise his satirical genius against one of the professors whom he held mainly responsible for his failure. Often he says of himself that "he had once taken important examinations under Prof. Semitelos, and, failing unanimously with high honors, he had become an example for all candidates for examinations." He first attempted to make his livelihood in a small town of the Azof shores in Russia, where he was employed by a grain-dealer. His employer forgave him his inability for serious work because he enjoyed his merry rimes. Describing in one of his poems his experience in Russia, he tells us how one day, when his employer had asked him to keep a lookout on one of his storehouses filled with grain, a whole army of pigs invaded the place:

> I was mad; I stoned them, chased them;
> But they could run, too, and so the great war started;
> The cursed animals—they were not so few either—
> As soon as I had pushed one out there rushed in another,
> And so in a little while they were so many
> You might think they had sown pigs with that grain.
> I am sure there are as many barbarian pigs flourishing in Scythia
> As there are wise and literary men in Greece.

An unfortunate love affair, as well as his conviction that he could never cut a figure in commercial life, drove him back to Athens, where he finally settled and married. From that time he devoted all his energy to political and social satire. His family life seems to have been quiet and happy, although he suffered from ill health and had to struggle to keep the wolf from his door. But what depressed him most was the social and political condition of his country. He lived through a period of national nightmares. Only one part of Greece was liberated. The great majority of the Greeks were under the Turkish yoke. Of the modest public wealth of the state a large part had to be sacrificed to armaments for the relief of nationals across the borders. There seemed to be no hope for the fulfillment of the national dreams. Greece saw herself treated with contempt by the Powers which made the treaty of Berlin, and passed through a long period of morbid resentment, until the climax of misfortunes was reached with her defeat by Turkey in 1897. Naturally the blame was laid on everybody and everything, and the intelligentsia of the nation, with a few exceptions, were plunged into despair. Few of the literary world, like Palamas, kept up the light of faith under the black veil of agony. Soures gave up all hope and turned to laughter for relief. It added to his gloom that even his satirical laughter was not taken seriously by the majority of his fellow countrymen, who, far from detecting under the comic masqûe the real motives of his satire, simply enjoyed good-naturedly the superficial merriment derived from his verses. Yet he did not grow angry or bitter; only once or twice he gave definite clues to his state of mind. That he thought of his work as a sad complaint rather than as coarse, meaningless fun, we see clearly in his lines "To Myself":

> Come, Myself, and find but once
> Beautiful this globe of ours;
> Let some golden worlds appear before you;
> And see this dark night as a Day.
>
> See the world as good, just once;
> In the black sorrow, scatter joy;
> Look for a quiet sea before you,
> For spring and flowers, not for misfortunes.

Tear and burn your mourning verses;
Get to drinking, get to laughing;
Write some sprightly merry songs,
And say that Greece sails on first rate.

Fascinate all ears with some happy news,
Don't be so surly, my poor self!
Enough of nagging and complaining;
Spend one hour, at least, content.

When will you be calm, at last?
When will you be sick of ailing?
When will you warm your tongue?
Eat it, after all, before it eats you!

His sincerity is by no means subdued when he attacks himself. He discloses mortifying incidents of his own life, not shamelessly but relentlessly. He will tell how he was beaten by the brother of a girl he made love to. He will confess his love for a Russian beauty he calls Vera. Courting distantly, he tried to impress her by singing a Greek serenade under her window, which never opened, only to find out next day that the fair one had left town never to return. He will even give his portrait with unsparing realism:

Four feet high;
With ugly face;
And a beard
Sparsely haired.

Brow divine
Somewhat broad
Surest sign
Of a poet.

Two eyes black
Without guile,
Full of fire,
Crassly dull.

Nostrils long,
Deeply cut;
Bearded chin
Shaped like Christ's.

Mouth, a well;
Flowing hair
And enough
For a mattress.

Savage face
Shrivelled up
Pale and cold
Like a corpse.

Not a color
Fits it much;
And it changes
Even now—

Teeth are lacking;
Others are Full of cracks;
And my looks
Are like a Jew's,
Treated roughly.

Soures worked industriously to the very end. His life and work will always reflect one of the saddest periods of Greece. Only the last few months of his life brought light in his world of darkness. He saw his country tear itself from the dishonor which a foolish king and his gang endeavored to inflict on it. He saw with pride his people rise into a revolution and dethrone a popular king in order to rank themselves with the forces of freedom and make good their plighted word; and he died with the hope which his last verses frankly reflect, the hope that Greece is at last to come to her own inheritance and a new life.

ARISTIDES E. PHOUTRIDES

Music

"Parsifal" in English at the Metropolitan

THE revival of "Parsifal," with new English words, at the Metropolitan last week, was another milestone on the road to the achievement of an ideal. It was a concession by the management of our leading opera house to the desire of many thousands of Americans to have music-drama sung in their own tongue.

To be thorough in the fulfillment of his task, Mr. Gatti-Casazza, a devout and warm Wagnerian, had flung away the old trappings, scenery, and costumes, used during the consulship at the Metropolitan of the late Heinrich Conried. New costumes, very handsome and quite accurate, had been designed for the occasion, besides stage pictures which were here and there appropriate.

Since "Parsifal" was ravished (by a trick) from its Bayreuth sanctuary, New York has changed. To many the mysterious work of Wagner seems too long. The majority, I think, would not have sorrowed if some parts of the first "Temple" scene and in the Gurnemanz episodes had been shortened. New York, you see, is not another Bayreuth. The subway runs below the Metropolitan. And there are no more lazy beer halls on Broadway, in which, between the acts, the weary may recuperate.

I have heard "Parsifal" quite forty times, or more. To me, with two exceptions—"Tristan und Isolde" and "Die Meistersinger"—it is the greatest, most sublime, of Wagner's music-dramas. Its meaning may have had too much stress laid on it. I can not think that it was wholly Christian. It is tinged with Hinduism. Much of it was anticipated in Buddhistic legends. More of it is merely monastic mysticism. But the inventor of this "consecrational festival play" no doubt conceived it as an atonement for his sins, the proof of a much bruised and chastened soul, which had expressed itself in earlier days too passionately. And yet, for one who really wished to play the penitent, the composer lapsed at times into strange license. The "Temptation" episode, for instance, almost terrifies one by its unbridled boldness. No wonder that some call the work "degenerate."

The chief novelty in the revival was, beyond question, Mr. Krehbiel's translation of the text. On this, and on the ability (or inability) of the chief singers in the cast, hung more than the success or failure of the performance. Success might lead to other longed-for efforts at the Metropolitan to replace foreign tongues by our own English idiom. The difficulties which a translator has to conquer in such tasks as Mr. Krehbiel's are considerable. No man knows more of this than I do. For I, also, have put Wagner into what I am assured is singable English. It is pleasing to be able to say, honestly, that, by and large, except in a few passages, Mr. Krehbiel has done very well indeed. He has preserved the general sense of Wagner's text (though now and then he has taken needless liberties with straightforward lines). He has done no really vital outrage to the German rhythms. His words are clear enough, if often tame; and, if well rendered by singers used to English, would be no less intelligible to attentive Americans than the original could be to German audiences.

Mr. Krehbiel has supplied a good equivalent for the prophecy

Durch Mitleid wissend,
Der reine thor. . . .

and so on, in his

Through pity, knowing,
The blameless fool. . . .

He has been particularly happy in his equivalent for the "Good Friday's Spell" words. As an example let me quote his opening lines:

Are not the meadows strangely fair today?
True, I did meet some marvellous flowers
Which sought around my neck to twine their tendrils.

But—yes, I regret to say, there are some "buts"—throughout his book he has shown a distressing tendency to prefer words of Latin origin to Anglo-Saxon words. By this he has often weakened the original sounds of Wagner's lines. Extreme cases of the kind occur in his translation of the Flower Maidens' call to Parsifal.

Come! Come! Pretty lover,
Make me your treasure.
For your solace and pleasure
I will strive without measure.

and in his opening of one chorus in the first "Temple" scene:

Wine and bread of last refection,
Chang'd at our blest Lord's election,
By compassion's loving pow'r. . . .

which in the place of "Wein und Brod des letzten Mahles," and so forth, is "tolerable, and not to be endured." Nor can I see why Mr. Krehbiel has gone out of his way to substitute for the strong German "Wer schoss den Schwan?" the much weaker English "Who did the deed?" when "Who shot the Swan?" seemed logically indicated.

On the whole, Mr. Krehbiel is not guilty if quite three-quarters of the text of "Parsifal" remained obscure at the performance. The responsibility weighs partly on certain singers who, being innocent of English when they began rehearsals, failed to enunciate their parts with proper plainness. Among them I may mention Léon Rothier, the French Gurnemanz, who had attempted what to him was utterly impossible, and the Polish Klingsor, Adamo Didur.

Margarethe Matzenauer, the Kundry, was understandable in her legato passages, but became meaningless in her declamatory moments. The choruses, of course, were unintelligible. But, after all, though one may deplore the deficiencies of some singers, the management picked out the artists for their respective parts. It can not, therefore, be acquitted of its share of the responsibility for what was lacking in the performance. In justice to the singers I have named, I wish to add that their interpretations of their parts did them great credit. I should also add that Orville Harrold, the new Parsifal, sang almost all his lines with clearness, and that, both as to his English and as to his performance, the Amfortas of Clarence Whitehill could hardly have been bettered.

The orchestra, directed by Bodanzky, interpreted the master's score with eloquence; perhaps slightly overdoing some of the climaxes, by giving the brass instruments more than the accustomed prominence, but doing justice to the gracious and exquisite beauties of the "Good Friday's Spell" music and other episodes. The choruses at times were out of tune.

The new scenery devised by Joseph Urban for this "Parsifal" revival was good and less good. It seemed a compromise between the literal realism of a bygone age of stage art and the more modern style which seeks to be suggestive. The landscapes were distinctly unsuggestive of that part of Northern Spain in which the Templars of the Grail had their abode—as we, at all events, suppose. The setting used for Klingsor's Magic Garden gave one the impression that it was somewhere in the tropics. But the white mountains near at hand seemed in Castile. Far more effective was the majestic Temple scene, with its stone pillars and impressive gloom. Admirable, though, like the other scenes, it ignored the most cherished orders of the composer, was the simple hint of a high tower from which the Magician watched the approach of the young hero in the second act, and bade tortured Kundry tempt him from his virtue. The "Verwandlung"—moving transformation scene—prescribed by Wagner and employed in the Conried production, as at the Festspielhaus at Bayreuth, was omitted by Mr. Urban, and as a consequence some mysteries were sacrificed. In its place we had a dimly painted curtain. The spring-lit meadow called for at another point expressed the loveliness of meed so apparent in both the verses and the music of the composer. But it conflicted with preceding hints and evidence as to the landscape roundabout the Templars' home.

"My father," once said Siegfried Wagner to me, as we sat in the shadow of the Festspielhaus, "intended his music-dramas to be treated as plays. And, for that reason, he desired his words to be understood by those who hear them."

CHARLES HENRY MELTZER

Drama

"Letty" and "His House in Order"—"Ibsen in England"

THE SOCIAL PLAYS OF ARTHUR WING PINERO, Vol. II: Letty—His House in Order. Edited by Clayton Hamilton. New York: E. P. Dutton and Company.

IBSEN IN ENGLAND. By Miriam Alice Franc. Boston: The Four Seas Company.

SIR ARTHUR PINERO'S books were a pile—or less than a pile even, a heap—upon a littered floor. He owes much to Mr. Clayton Hamilton for picking out the best volumes, dusting them, and ranging them in straight rows on a clean table. If only there were a fireplace in the room and a friend with courage enough to dispose of the incriminating residue! Sir Arthur's literary, or sub-literary, progeny is large. One can not help wishing that the Spartan custom of the exposure of feeble or sickly infants for the purgation of the stock had been prevalent in Sir Arthur's time and place. But England is not Sparta, and the sort of exposure which they did receive was not fitted to invigorate the breed.

Pinero is a mixture of the ordinary and the extraordinary, beside which the merely extraordinary looks rather commonplace. The difference between the two types in him is precipitous, mysterious, almost scandalous. One wonders how the better Pinero could have tolerated the worse as a trespasser on his premises or a loafer in his stable. Mr. Hamilton, whose perceptions are quick, is quite aware of this inequality, and points out that the dramatist wrote the groveling "Wife Without a Smile" between "Letty" and "His House in Order." Had Pinero no concern for his intellectual and literary admirers? Or was he bored by these admirers, like Nora Helmer by her husband's cloying virtues, and are these inferior plays his way of saying "Damn it all!"?

Mr. Hamilton's "Introduction" contains some sound and shrewd remedies suggested by Pinero's partiality for women. Women, says Mr. Hamilton, dominate Pinero's stage, because they fill his orchestra and galleries, and women love to study women as men do not care to study men. I will add that the two sexes take sex very differently: In sex women are a sect; men are a club. There is a cult of women by women; the male sex, though arrogant enough in its phlegmatic way, builds no altars to itself. I may add that there should be a sting for Sir Arthur Pinero in Mr. Hamilton's quiet and entirely friendly assumption that the roots of his fondness for women are mercantile.

In the two critical prefaces Mr. Hamilton is never less than competent and interesting, but I own that his general observations have helped me less than his uncommonly quick eye for particulars, for times, places, settings, points of diction. I can not go with him in his feeling that "His House in Order" owes its vigor largely to technique. Its technique is indeed masterly; as ship it is trimmer than "Iris" or the "Second Mrs. Tanqueray"; their advantage is in the lading. But the special claims of "His House in Order," sympathy for a baited young creature, delight in her power over her tormentors, admiration for her generous surrender of that power—these energies reside in the material, not the craft. There seems to be a vague notion in the air that technique is a substitute for power or feeling, a means of doing emotion's work without emotion. Technique is to me a lever, a middle term between power and result. A man may lift a weight with a bar or with his arms; in both cases he lifts it with his muscles. A man may move an audience with or without technique; in both cases he moves it by feeling. Technique does not generate feeling any more than the lever creates muscle. The lever applies or concentrates muscle; technique applies or concentrates emotion. "His House in Order" ranks high for me among Pinero's plays; less original than "Iris" or the "Second Mrs. Tanqueray," less cogent than the "Thunderbolt," it excels in the union of consummate workmanship with a vividly human, and in the main healthy, appeal.

"Letty," on the other hand, breaks down in the effort to rationalize a suggestive and original idea. A man and a woman face each other alone in the hour of sexual crisis. Men have spared girls at such a moment. To Pinero came another thought. Could that hour be critical, not for the girl only, but for the man? Could it be the hour when a decadent race completed its damnation or began its self-retrieval? There is a step further in originality. Could the girl, in a sense, spare the man? Such an idea savors of the tremendous; it savors of the ridiculous. The most that can be said for Pinero's treatment is that the ridiculous is avoided; the tremendous certainly is not achieved. For adequacy in such a situation, both man and woman should possess the rudiments of greatness. Nevill and Letty are both small. Mr. Hamilton admires the faultless gentleman in Nevill. I should call him an occasional gentleman, a gentleman with intermissions.

Mr. Hamilton objects, on the whole rightly, to the epilogue in "Letty," an expedient in which Pinero shows himself at one and the same moment a good man of business and a bad man of letters. Even if we waive the point of climax, the briskness and patness with which rewards and punishments are handed out in this dapper little epilogue reveal a shallowness in Pinero which it is not easy to forgive. There are men who are more royalist than the king; Pinero's providences put Providence to shame. He renews his adhesion to the copybook and psalmbook type of morality when, in "His House in Order," he permits Nina to grovel before the Ridgeleys in a quagmire of renunciation. Let her burn Annabel's letters by all means, but as for her puppies and her cigarettes—Sir Arthur becomes a Ridgeley himself in the penitence through which he drags this high-spirited young wife. The dramatist fails to see that conduct is a compromise between nature and precept, and that the precept which tramples upon nature to-day is a precept upon which nature will trample to-morrow.

To write the story of Ibsen in England was a good thing to do. It was so good a thing to do that, even when ill done, the result is not worthless. The titles of four out of the seven chapters of Miss Franc's book, "English Translations of Ibsen," "Performances of Ibsen in England," "Parodies and Sequels to Ibsen Dramas," "Ibsen's Influence on English Drama," will suggest the scope and interest of the topics. Two appendixes, listing English translations and performances, are perhaps almost more agreeable than the book proper, because they are all that they claim to be—lists—whereas the book proper claims to be narrative, and is logbook. Ibsen's career in England is a story, almost a drama, and it is regrettable that the person intrusted with its recital should have been deaf to the challenge of these facts. Accuracy in such a work is the one apology for mechanism. I tested the accuracy of Miss Franc by verifying a short list of references, fifteen, I should say, or at most twenty. The very first reference, on page 84, to the "Athenæum" for June 6, 1889, was wrong. There is no "Athenæum" for June 6, 1889. Another reference, on page 105, to Shaw in the Saturday Review for June 26, 1897, was wrong; the true date is July 3, 1897. In the chapter on influences, where judgment is naturally required, suggestiveness on the largest scale and often on the smallest evidence is attributed to Ibsen. One is reminded of that fantastic paternity which the daughter of the Dovre-King endeavored to thrust upon Peer Gynt. A curious instance of that laxity in figurative language which prevails in so many quarters nowadays is found on pages 144-145, where the topic is "Man and Superman" and "Getting Married": "The discussion walks away with the plot and the characterization, and there is left nothing but a very long and very tedious conversation." The discussion walks away and the conversation is left. What Miss Franc should do is to go over her work, fact by fact, with the utmost particularity, verifying and correcting, and to rewrite the chapter on influences, omitting from one-third to one-half of the examples she has got together. Her work will then be useful as a book of reference.

O. W. FIRKINS

Books and the News

Recent Books

THE holiday books were especially interesting, and the mid-winter books are no less satisfactory, whether you seek information or amusement. The conscientious reader must peruse Mr. Keynes on "The Economic Consequences of the Peace" (Harcourt); few economists have a more readable style. Do not fail to see Punch's rhymed review of the book. Speaking of rhymed reviews, Arthur Guiterman's "Ballads of Old New York" (Harper) is a suitable book for a gift, that is, one whose charm does not vanish after a first reading. An artist in rhyme made these verses, so that they linger in the memory, as vers libres fail to do. Mrs. Clement Scott's "Old Days in Bohemian London" (Hutchinson) tells of notable folk; but it pushes too far the present British custom of adopting an extremely chatty style of memoirs. Rather better is "My Bohemian Days" (Stokes), by Harry Furniss, and his sketches enhance the book.

A volume of literary biography is "A Book of R. L. S." (Scribner), by George E. Brown. Arranged like a reference book, with its entries in alphabetical order, it seemed to me, nevertheless, readable throughout, with its comments upon his friends and family, his books and their characters, his homes and his travels. I can never get too many books about Stevenson, for like Mark Twain, he is one of the few writers whose life was also interesting. "Leonard Wood: Conservator of Americanism" (Doran), by Eric Fisher Wood, is not to be disposed of as "a campaign biography." It is an admirable study of a man of immense importance in the world to-day.

Three volumes of fiction for pure amusement are Melville Davisson Post's "The Mystery at the Blue Villa" (Appleton), George A. Birmingham's "Up, the Rebels!" (Doran), in which the author makes his nearest recent approach to his earliest successes of "Spanish Gold" and "The Major's Niece"; and "A Thin Ghost, and Others" (Longmans), by Montague R. James. The last may disappoint readers who hope to find such good stories as those in "Ghost Stories of an Antiquary" by the same author, but Dr. James always paints in a weirdly fascinating background, even when the incidents of his plot are slight.

To turn to graver subjects, Bertha E. L. Stockbridge's "What to Drink; Recipes for Non-Alcoholic Drinks" (Appleton) may help those who see hope in pineapple tosh and raspberry rumble. But its sub-title is significant: "The Blue Book of Beverages." Stephen Graham's "A Private in the Guards" (Macmillan) is a capital account of going to war with one of those regiments where pipe-clay and brass-polish are household gods. Viscount Haldane, in "Before the War" (Funk and Wagnalls), tells of his conversations with William II, with Bethman-Hollweg, and with Tirpitz.

Two light-hearted books of essays are "Old Junk" (Knopf), by H. M. Tomlinson, with its talk about the sea, about travel, and about books; and Carl Van Vechten's "In the Garret" (Knopf), the musical flavor of which would have put it beyond me, if it had not been for one striking essay upon New York, called "La Tigresse." Satirical and vigorous are Mrs. Gerould's essays in "Modes and Morals" (Scribner), in which she pays her compliments to the "British Novelists, Ltd." The publication of this book enabled me, to my great joy, to place the anecdote about the milliner in a New England town, who when told by a customer that "they are wearing hats low in New York, this year," retorted, "They are wearing them high in Newburyport!" Knowing something of my birthplace, I believe that what Mrs. Gerould mistook for Yankee conservatism was really Irish wit.

EDMUND LESTER PEARSON

Books Received

FICTION

Benson, E. F. Robin Linnet. Doran.

Fuller, Henry B. Bertram Cope's Year. Chicago: R. F. Seymour. $1.75.

Robey, George My Rest Cure. Stokes. $1.40 net.

GOVERNMENT AND ECONOMICS

Butler, Sir Geoffrey. A Handbook to the League of Nations. Longmans, Green. $1.75 net.

Dillon, E. J. The Inside Story of the Peace Conference. Harper. $2.25.

Gwynn, Stephen. John Redmond's Last Years. Longmans, Green. $5.

(Continued on page 216)

A Good Thing To Know—

When you select C-W motors you automatically insure yourself the most reliable motor in existence, tested by time and proved out under the hardest conditions to which a motor can be subjected.

S. S. Wheeler
President

Crocker-Wheeler Co.

Ampere, N. J.

NEW YORK
BOSTON
SYRACUSE
CHICAGO
CLEVELAND
BINGHAMTON

PITTSBURGH
NEWARK
NEW HAVEN
PHILADELPHIA
BALTIMORE
SAN FRANCISCO

TIFFANY & CO.

DIAMOND AND GEM MERCHANTS

PEARLS DIAMONDS JEWELRY
SILVERWARE WATCHES CLOCKS
CHINA AND STATIONERY

EFFICIENT SERVICE BY MAIL

FIFTH AVENUE & 37TH STREET
NEW YORK

Modes and Morals

By KATHARINE FULLERTON GEROULD

"This volume of Mrs. Gerould's, with its dozen of papers on a heterogeny of themes, ought to find a host of eager readers."
—Brander Matthews in the New York Times.
$1.75

PUBLISHED FEB. 27

Bedouins

By JAMES G. HUNEKER

Intimate pictures of artists and critical studies done in the author's quick, brilliant way which describes it in terms of all the arts at once. Included are Mary Garden, Caruso, George Luks, the painter, Debussy and modern music, of the whole-tone scale, among other subjects. Illustrated. $2.00

The Grand Canyon of the Colorado

Recurrent Studies in Impressions and Appearances

By JOHN C. VAN DYKE

The Canyon is the ideal subject for the author of "The Desert," "The Mountain," and "The Opal Sea," and during all the years of his intimate acquaintance with it may be said to have awaited his ideal treatment. The book, splendidly illustrated from wonderful photographs, is at once an interpretation, a guide, and an inspiration.
With illustrations from photographs. $2.00

Socialism vs. Civilization

By LIEUTENANT BORIS BRASOL

With an Introduction by T. N. CARVER, Professor of Political Economy at Harvard University.

Hitherto socialism has been merely a theory; now it is actually, in Russia, a condition, and it threatens soon to become so elsewhere. It is therefore time men learned what ideas socialism rests upon, what socialist purposes are and how they are to be achieved. The author tells these things plainly. He explains Karl Marx's doctrines, which are the basis of socialism, and reveals the fallacies in them. He shows what socialism has done in Russia and what it is trying to do here as demonstrated in recent labor disturbances. $2.00

CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS
FIFTH AVE. AT 48TH ST. NEW YORK

Attractive offerings are made during the Midwinter Book Season.

(Continued from page 214)

Johnson, Severance. The Enemy Within. New York: The James A. McCann Co. $2.50.
National Social Science Series:
National Evolution, by George R. Davis; Housing and the Housing Problem, by Carol Arnovici; The Monroe Doctrine and the Great War, by A. B. Hall. McClurg. 75 cents each.
Secret Treaties of Austria-Hungary, 1879-1914. Vol. 1. Edited by Alfred Franzis Pribram. English edition by Archibald Cary Coolidge. Harvard University Press. $2.00.
Spargo, John. Russia as an American Problem. Harper. $2.75.
Taussig, F. W. Free Trade, The Tariff and Reciprocity. Macmillan. $2.00.
Taylor, Hugh. Origin of Government. Longmans, Green. $4.00.
Whitaker, A. C. Foreign Exchange. Appleton. $5.00 net.

HISTORY

Boynton, Percy H. History of American Literature. Ginn & Company. $2.25.
Bronson, Walter C. A Short History of American Literature. D. C. Heath & Co.
Smith, C. Foster. Thucydides. Books 1 and 2. In four volumes. Loeb Classical Library. G. P. Putnam's Sons.
White, Hugh G. Evelyn Ausonius. Book 1 in two volumes. Loeb Classical Library. Putnam's Sons.

MISCELLANEOUS

Davis, Malcolm W. Open Gates to Russia. Harper. $2.00 net.
Hard, William. Raymond Robins' Own Story. Harper. $2.00.
Home—Then What? The Mind of the Doughboy. A. E. F. With foreword by John Kendrick Bangs. Doran.
Jonescu, Take. Some Personal Impressions. Stokes. $3.00 net.
MacVeagh, Ewen C. and Brown, Lee D. The Yankee in the British Zone. Putnam.
Rainsford, W. K. From Upton to the Meuse With the Three Hundred and Seventh. Appleton.
Scott, Percy. Fifty Years in the Royal Navy. Doran.
Tucker, Allen. There and Here. Duffield.
Tweedale, Violet. Ghosts I Have Seen. Stokes. $2.00 net.

RELIGION AND PHILOSOPHY

Anonymous. Our Unseen Guest. Harper. $2.
Barton, W. E. The Soul of Abraham Lincoln. Doran.
Cooke, G. W. The Social Evolution of Religion. Stratford Co. $3.50.
Henslow, G. The Proofs of the Truths of Spiritualism. Dodd, Mead. $2.50.
Huysmans, J. K. En Route. New American edition. Dutton. $2.50 net.
Williams, Gail. Fear Not the Crossing. Clode.

SCIENCE

Balkin, H. H. The New Science of Analyzing Character. Four Seas Co. $3 net.
Elliott, Hugh. Modern Science and Materialism. Longmans, Green. $3.00 net.
Robinson, Victor. Pioneers of Birth Control in England and America. Voluntary Parenthood League.
Towns, C. B. Habits That Handicap. Funk & Wagnalls.

TRAVEL AND DESCRIPTION

Shackleton, Sir Ernest. South. Macmillan. $6.00.

Colophons of American Publishers

(Continued from February 21)

In 1918, William A. Dwiggins designed for the Yale University Press a colophon adapted from the Yale College seal.

The seven-branch candlestick used by Mr. B. W. Huebsch was designed by Charles B. Falls about ten years ago. Mr. Huebsch had long sought for an unhackneyed device that symbolizes light, and finally adopted this candlestick with the monogram at the base.

(Continued on page IV)

Two Novels You Must Read

The Clanking of Chains

By BRINSLEY MACNAMARA

Author of "The Valley of the Squinting Windows"

A daring and vividly realistic story,—an interpretation of Sinn Fein. Romance, adventure, youth and its idealism are pictured by a master artist. Unquestionably the greatest Irish novel of the decade.

12mo, cloth, $1.90 net.

Seldwyla Folks

By GOTTFRIED KELLER

"To a world immersed in literature of the war these three tales come as an idyllic interlude. Such a gem as the story of the three rival cobmakers is worth the price of the entire volume."—Boston Transcript.

12mo cloth, $1.75 net.

Publishers Brentano's 27th St. and 5th Ave., N.Y.

E. P. DUTTON & CO.

"WHEN THE HOUNDS OF SPRING ARE ON WINTER'S TRACES"

READ

W. H. HUDSON'S Books

Birds in Town and Village

In which is incorporated some of his earliest, most charming writing on the bird-life which has been his greatest interest. Through Devon lanes, into old London gardens, and Cornish villages, the reader follows the birds, with the most delightful of companions at his elbow, drawing for his entertainment upon a life-long and world-wide knowledge of birds.

Illustrated in colors from beautiful originals by E. J. Detmold, $4.00.

Far Away and Long Ago

Is an extraordinarily interesting record of the response of a finely sensitive spirit to the appeal of the fascinating life which he describes with such vivid color and reality. Strange, gaudy birds and butterflies, animals of the oddest types, and men of strange adventures figure in the every-day experiences through which he reveals himself simply and with rare sincerity.

With portrait, net, $2.50.

BY THE SAME AUTHOR

Idle Days in Patagonia. Illustrated, $1.75
The Purple Land. Introduction by T. Roosevelt. $1.75
A Crystal Age. Foreword by Clifford Smyth. $1.75

Obtainable at any bookstore, postage extra, or direct from

E. P. DUTTON & CO., 681 Fifth Ave., New York

Attractive offerings are made during the Midwinter Book Season.

217

THE REVIEW

Vol. 2, No. 43 New York, Saturday, March 6, 1920 FIFTEEN CENTS

Contents

Brief Comment 217
Editorial Articles:
What Is a Liberal? 219
The Soviet Drive for Peace 220
Mr. Asquith's Return 222
The Women's Colleges 223
Constantinople and the Straits. By Philip Marshall Brown 224
The Case of Sir Oliver Lodge. By Joseph Jastrow 225
Correspondence 227
Book Reviews:
Jeremiad and Jumble 229
A Catholic Critic of Sinn Fein 230
Among Our Americas 231
War and Discipline 232
The Run of the Shelves 234
Unlocking the Great Lakes. By L. J. B. 235
Books and the News: Mr. Wilson. By Edmund Lester Pearson 237

AS we go to press, the outlook for ratification of the treaty, in any form, is as dark as possible. If the event shall prove as now seems so probable, there will be few indeed who will be able to take any satisfaction in the retrospect. The only victors will be the outright enemies of the treaty, with Senators Borah and Johnson at their head; and, in spite of the extremely objectionable character of some of the tactics employed by them, they will at least be entitled to the satisfaction of having gained an end which they had consistently and fearlessly avowed, and to which many of them at least were sincerely devoted as a matter of principle. With this exception, all parties, from President Wilson to Senator Lodge, will experience a sense of bitter mortification as they review the long history of the impotent wrangle.

IT is still possible that a new turn may be given to the situation. But the possibility rests on the faint hope that in one or another of the decisive quarters a largeness of mind and of soul may be manifested which has thus far been wholly absent. As for the "great and solemn referendum" which will ensue upon failure of the treaty, nothing is more certain than that it will be neither great nor solemn. The time is past when the American people could be got to concentrate their attention upon the subject, to the exclusion, or even the subordination, of other issues. Not only has the lapse of time, together with the urgency of other questions, thrown it into the background, but the issue itself has been so bedeviled with trivialities and personalities that the country is sick and tired of it. The only way to make it a genuine and central issue before the nation would be for Mr. Wilson himself to be the candidate, a contingency which seems in the highest degree improbable. Barring that possibility, the injection of the treaty quarrel into the Presidential campaign opens up the prospect of a prolonged nightmare from which all citizens may devoutly pray to be spared. Until the doom has actually been pronounced, we cling to a shred of hope that it may still be averted.

OF the appointment of Bainbridge Colby as Secretary of State, it is almost enough to say that for those who like that kind of Secretary of State, he is just the kind of Secretary of State they like. This does not mean that, as some have imagined, Mr. Colby is to be, or is expected to be, a "doormat," or even a "rubber stamp." He has engaging qualities and a bright mind, and will doubtless be a great comfort to Mr. Wilson, who evidently likes him extremely. The danger to be apprehended from his appointment is not that he will be merely a passive tool in the President's hands, a function which, while not brilliant, may be useful, and, in the case of a President determined to be his own Secretary of State, perhaps as useful as any that he could perform. The danger is that Mr. Colby, who has no perceptible qualification for the post, but who has a mind of his own, and has winning ways, may, while humoring the President to the top of his bent as regards things in general, exercise an evil influence over him as regards many a thing in particular which will come up during these months of acute international trial. Neither in his training nor in his habits of thought and action does Mr. Colby possess the attributes which ought to be regarded as essential to the head of the country's department of foreign affairs.

THE editor of the Nation, after reciting the holding up of certain American cotton ships by the British blockade, characterizes ex-Secretary Lansing as "one of those who thought that just as stiff a note should be sent to England about these matters as had been sent to Germany about the Lusitania." We have yet to see any real evidence that Mr. Lansing ever committed himself to the equating of the Lusitania crime with the British blockade. The "O. G. V." Washington correspondence of the Evening Post at the time had much to say about a note answering to this description, prepared before Bryan's resignation, held for five months, and finally sent only after it was so altered as to recognize a material distinction between taking human life without warning and holding up cotton, with judicial resource to determine whether the seizure was legal. Until convinced by indubitable evidence, we prefer to believe that the hand and heart of Mr. Lansing aided in softening the note rather than in putting into it (if it really was ever there) that blind disregard of both moral and legal distinctions with which "O. G. V." credits it, and for which he commends it.

PRESIDENT WILSON is not happy in his diplomatic appointments, and the result is that America is inadequately represented at foreign capitals at a time when our foreign relations demand the highest type of diplomatic ability. It is difficult to say whether these appointments are due to the paucity of material in the Democratic party or to the faultiness of the President's judgment. The appointment of Mr. Charles R. Crane as Minister to China is the latest example. Mr. Crane is an amiable gentleman, a philanthropist, and very rich. He is feverishly but superficially interested in movements and men, lacking in tact and discretion, and a dilettante in international politics. With the best will in the world, he may easily compromise our position in the intricate and complex situation in China.

THE considerations that have led the Supreme Council to decree that the Turks should retain Constantinople are not made clear in any of the statements thus far made public. In answer to the outcry of protest among liberals everywhere, and especially that voiced by Lord Bryce, Mr. Lloyd George puts forward the claim that England is bound to consider the wishes of the eighty million Moslems in India who loyally supported the war. Mr. Montagu, Secretary of State for India, has sought to clinch matters by a premature announcement of the action in India itself. But this explanation is far from satisfying. On the one hand, it has not been demonstrated that the Moslems in India have any such reverence as is represented for the Sultan as Caliph, nor that this is necessarily localized in Constantinople. On the other hand, it is an anachronism that after more than four centuries of misrule, the Turks, themselves a minority, should be left in possession of a great city which possesses such singular significance for hundreds of millions of Christian peoples. It is possible, of course, that the British policy is based upon the desire to retain as warder at the gate a subservient tool. But there are ugly rumors in the European capitals of financial interests and sinister intrigue, and it is implied that the chief consideration involved is that of protecting the French and British bondholders. Mr. Montagu is not only Secretary of State for India; he is also a member of one of the greatest banking families of Europe.

In nearly all the discussion over the disposition of Constantinople, however, a most important factor has been entirely overlooked. That factor is Russia. To ignore her entirely now is to store up trouble for the future. A tactful acknowledgment of her interests, and an intimation that the settlement will in due time be subject to her review without prejudice, would be a wise precaution against wars to come.

THE reputed founder of the Utah State Juvenile Court and various other institutions for boys, Judge Willis Brown, has discovered a new approach to our longed-for political millennium. It lies in the very simple process of organizing four million first voters and plumping their combined first votes in favor of the right man for President. The thing looks easy, if you just shut your eyes tight enough, as the devisers of such schemes never seem to have any difficulty in doing. Of course, if these four million freshman voters once realize that they can elect a President of the United States, they will at once cut loose from all present influence of parents and older brothers and friends, throw overboard all inherited political prejudices, give up all divided opinions on all divisive political questions, pick the best man with infallible judgment, close ranks, and read the death sentence to any party foolish enough to disagree. The only chance of slipping up seems to be that the sophomore voters, jealous of such presumption, might organize their four million and pick somebody else. In the ballot tug-of-war thus precipitated, with a year's experience on the sophomoric side, Judge Brown's freshman team might conceivably get pulled into the creek, and the bedraggled millennium be left on the bank of defeat, disconsolately drying its sweater in the chill November breeze.

IN spite of the labor troubles which have absorbed so much of public attention, a recent number of the Labor Market Bulletin, published by the New York State Industrial Commission, shows that the past year has been one of progress. December averages for 1919, as compared with those of the previous year, show a considerably higher level of employment in many important industries, such as building materials of all kinds, house furnishings, wearing apparel, leather goods, musical instruments, sheet metal and hardware, rubber goods, and silverware. The total number of factory workers is higher than a year ago, as high as at the close of the two previous years, when the output of special war necessities was so great, and about one-third higher than in 1914. Total payroll expenditures for December, 1919, were 16 per cent. higher than in 1918, 49 per cent. higher than in 1917, and 178 per cent. above the figure of 1914. The compilers of the bulletin figure out a distinct gain for the wage-worker in increase of earnings as compared with the increase of price of food products, though we must remember that all such figures merely show whether or not it is possible to live more cheaply, not whether any particular class is actually doing so, or even making the attempt. In the matter of the factory man's dinner table, as elsewhere, de gustibus non disputandum.

IN sustaining Oklahoma's income tax law and in declaring void that part of the New York State law which discriminates against non-residents, the Supreme Court has rendered two important decisions which common sense hastens to claim for its own. The fact that the right of a State to tax incomes accruing to non-residents from their property or business within the State is susceptible of abuse is no valid ground for denying such a right. One such abuse is forever removed by the New York decision—non-residents must be taxed on precisely the same terms as residents; the privileges and immunities enjoyed by citizens of New York must not be denied to other citizens of the Republic. As a rebuke to the carelessness, if it was carelessness only, of the New York State Legislature, the decision is additionally welcome.

LAST year Lenin made it clear in repeated statements that the unlimited printing of paper money and the consequent demonetization of the ruble was but a step in the general plan to overthrow capitalism by doing away with money. Now, however, the Bolshevist Commissar of Finance, Krestinsky, has issued a statement, preliminary to the expected foreign trade, that the Soviet Government will issue a new type of credit note, backed by reserves of platinum, to the value of 37,500,000 gold rubles. The issue will be limited to 65,000,000 rubles, and the Government will be ready on call to convert them into platinum coins. These platinum notes will be used in payment of foreign purchases made direct by the Government. This complete volte face in Bolshevik finance is only another indication of the way in which the Soviet Government is turning to capitalism. It is interesting, both as a financial expedient and as illustrating the character of the Bolshevik mind. As it is only an expedient to secure a modest amount of credit on the security of platinum now in the possession of the Bolsheviks, the businesslike way of doing it would be to deposit the platinum in some satisfactory financial institution as a guarantee for a loan in sterling or dollar exchange. This, however, might require proof that the metal had not been stolen from its rightful owners.

THE numerous "drives" that are being made by the men's colleges ought to make it easier rather than harder for the women's colleges to obtain the endowment which they also need. The argument is the same in both cases. Faculty salaries must be raised if faculties are to be retained; the old salary schedules are absurdly inadequate in view of existing prices. Each appeal that has already been made has helped to drive the argument home. The campaigns for Bryn Mawr, Smith, and Mt. Holyoke are now under way; they should meet with a generous response not only among the alumnæ, or the alumnæ and their friends, but among people generally who realize the critical state in which the cause of education in America stands to-day.

IT is a safe enough prophecy that blundering attempts to fight Socialism by unfair means will increase the Socialist vote. To admit this, however, is not to concede the reasonableness of "voting Socialist" as a means of punishing bad official conduct or securing good. A vote for the Socialist ticket, in any case in which the political views of the candidate have any bearing at all, can be justified only by an honest conviction that Socialism is right in its fundamental fight against individual initiative, and the right of the individual to better his position by the fruits of his own brains, toil and thrift. If one really believes in that doctrine, he is justified in supporting it at the ballot box, but not otherwise. The fact that some one is rocking the political boat does not justify the voter who wants a safe passage in joining hands with those who openly seek to knock out the bottom.

IT seems hard to get the idea out of the heads of certain Congressional leaders at Washington that economy in appropriations is a mere matter of totals. The Air Service has already been seriously crippled by the denial of the financial support necessary to hold together and keep at work the best of the trained personnel in the service at the close of the war. And now more than half has been cut from the estimates for carrying on the work of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce in soliciting foreign trade. If this action stands, the commercial attaché service of the bureau will be wrecked. Representatives of many American business organizations in session in New York a few days ago formally pronounced this "a direct blow at American foreign trade, at a time when it is most in need of trade information from foreign lands." The division of statistics of the customs service is seriously hampered by a similar display of Congressional economy, not having force enough to present its results with the promptness and completeness which alone can give them real value to the business world. To follow the example set by these economizers in Congress, our dairymen should seek a more economical production of milk by cutting down the amount of food appropriated for their cows, and farmers should reduce the cost of their corn, wheat and potatoes by eliminating the expense of fertilizers.

What is a Liberal?

THE ultimate aim of the Labor Party, and of those who would inspire and direct its policy, is the acquisition and operation by the State of the whole machinery of the production of the country. That is a form of industrial tyranny against which, if you can conceive of it ever being brought into practical effect, it is, in my opinion, the first duty of Liberalism to protest.

In this clean-cut declaration by Mr. Asquith in the opening speech of his victorious campaign at Paisley, the word Liberalism (with a capital L) is doubtless used in the British party sense. But it is time we were beginning to think, both in this country and in England, of the meaning of the word in a sense broader than, and yet not out of accord with, the meaning it has had in British politics during the past half-century. What Mr. Asquith declares to be "the first duty of Liberalism" in Britain is really and truly the first duty of liberalism everywhere. The word has too long been conceded to the representatives of a cast of thought and a tendency in action to which it has no just application. To be a liberal it is necessary that one have his mind open to possibilities of improvement and reform; but not every scheme of real or supposed economic improvement, and not every project of real or supposed moral reform is entitled to the designation of "liberal." The word is a good word, and a valuable one; and it ought to be reclaimed from the hands of those who have too long enjoyed the benefit of its implication, while displaying none of its spirit.

First and foremost in this category are the socialists and, still more, the half-socialists who are promoting the socialist programme without any clear perception of what it means. It is open to anyone to think that socialism is better than liberalism; but certainly socialism is not liberalism. It is the opposite of liberalism. Under whatever form it may be proposed to put socialism into effect, it will not liberalize but unliberalize the world. It may conceivably improve the general economic condition of mankind. It may reduce, or even extinguish, poverty. It may improve the public health, cut down the rate of infant mortality, and lengthen the average span of human life. The existing institutions of society have themselves had an effect in all these directions, which, on casting a glance backward over a period of a hundred years, or two hundred years, any candid mind must recognize as most impressive. Socialists may claim that their system would accelerate the process. But the gains which we have made have been attained without sacrifice of those ideas of personal independence, and personal self-assertion, which are of the very essence of liberalism. The gains which socialism would make—if it did make them—would be purchased at the cost of an almost complete extinction of those ideas as the dominant factor in human life.

The central aim of all schemes of socialism or semi-socialism is the extinction of economic evils. It is true that in the minds of many socialists this aim is exalted by the conviction that all, or nearly all, of the moral evil in the world is traceable to economic causes. That extreme poverty is a prolific source of moral evil no reasonable person would deny, and it must be the constant aim of right-minded persons to work toward the abolition of extreme poverty. But there is no reason whatever to believe that when we get above that plane there is any correlation between economic well-being and moral excellence. On the contrary, there is abundant reason to believe that the necessity for economic struggle, the stimulus of reward for exertion imposed from within and not from without, and of punishment for failure to put forth such exertion, is the great nursery of human virtue as well as of human endeavor. But in point of fact, ninety-nine times out of a hundred, socialists and semi-socialists not only think—as we all do—of economic improvement as an end in itself, but think of it as the one all-sufficient end. They seek it with little or no regard for the price which may have to be paid for it in the shape of abandonment of liberal principles and liberal ideals. What the standardization of life may mean, in relation to its broader and deeper aspects, seldom troubles their minds.

That the older idea of liberalism, the idea that has been embodied in four generations of American and British history, is being reasserted with fresh vigor after the tempestuous eclipse of the past year or two, there are encouraging indications. Quite in line with Mr. Asquith's pronouncement have been the recent declarations of Mr. Hoover and Vice-President Marshall, neither of whom belongs in any degree to the genus mossback. It is not impossible that in the recoil from that vague revolutionism which has for some time held the centre of the stage there may be some recrudescence of reactionary activity. But it will not get far. Quite to the contrary of what was so glibly predicted a short time ago, the contest is almost sure to be not between "reaction and revolution," but between liberalism and what for want of a better term is nowadays called radicalism. The radicals are for what they confidently label as progress, but what, however it may affect the economic condition of men, is progress away from liberalism and towards regimentation and tyranny. It was John Wesley, we believe, who protested that the devil should not have all the good tunes. The radicals are not entitled to the good tune of liberalism. Liberty, variety, individuality—that is the tune to which liberals should march, and in that sign they will conquer.

The Soviet Drive for Peace

It is evident to all observers that the opening of relations with Russia and some form of conditional recognition of the Soviet régime will soon be announced by the Council of Premiers. The successive steps by which this is approached are patently face-saving expedients and will deceive no one. Mr. Lloyd George long since yielded to the influences that were pressing him in this direction, and with him it was only a question of so manœuvring this change of policy as not to arouse too great opposition on the part of the Conservative elements of the Coalition. What these influences are is becoming clear. They are, of course, domestic, but they are not, in the main, as has been surmised, the demands of radical labor, protesting against a policy that represented to them an attempt of capitalist interests to crush a workingmen's revolution. They are the more potent forces of British capital itself, pressing to have opened to them the commercial and industrial opportunities of Russia lest they be outstripped by their German rivals.

The British capitalists have much to justify them. Their hatred of Bolshevism has not abated, and they take no stock in the much-advertised change of heart and reform of the Bolsheviks themselves. But they are aware that there are in Russia at the present time more than two million Germans, entrenching themselves for the industrial conquest of Russia, and that German marks are being used by the hundred million to purchase stocks and bonds of Russian enterprises, securities that may now be something of a gamble even at the prevailing rate of exchange, but which before long will place the control of these enterprises in German hands. They see no merit or advantage in abstaining from work in the Russian field if the result is only to give their rivals a private preserve and a flying start. And it must not be overlooked that the exploitation of the resources of Russia has an international political significance for the future that outweighs mere pecuniary considerations.

At the same time the Soviet Government is feverishly engaged in a drive for peace. All who follow attentively Bolshevist propaganda in its diverse manifestations must have been struck by its singular concentration upon this one aim during the past few weeks. Their artillery of every kind and calibre was massed for the attack. The Nation published seven alleged Soviet peace proposals to the United States and carefully refrained from quoting the statements of Lenin and Trotsky that peace was sought by them only to obtain a breathing space, the better to renew the struggle. The New Republic bemoaned the fact that hard-hearted capitalists continued to display vicious hostility to the revolutionary democracy of Russia (as if the Soviet Government were a revolutionary democracy!), and let Norman Hapgood pour out his Bolshevik soul in several columns of superlative ignorance and misstatement. A claque of petty business men, organized by Ludwig C. A. K. Martens and Dudley Field Malone, issued a lot of false and misleading statements to create the impression that England was already carrying on trade with Soviet Russia and flimflamming us out of our share. A number of hand-picked correspondents were personally conducted to Moscow to be given special interviews with the Bolshevik leaders. There could be no doubt that the Bolsheviks wanted peace and wanted it badly.

But students of Bolshevik propaganda must have noticed also a great change in its character. No longer was emphasis laid upon the beauties of the social revolution or what it promised to the laboring man. Only the most perfunctory allusions were made to the evils of capitalism and imperialism. On the contrary, Lenin said to one of the specially invited correspondents: "All the world knows that we are prepared to make peace on terms the fairness of which even the most imperialistic capitalists could not dispute. We have reiterated and reiterated our desire for peace, our need for peace, and our readiness to give foreign capital the most generous concessions and guarantees." To the same correspondent Trotsky said: "Foreign capitalists who invest money in Russian enterprises or who supply us with merchandise we require will receive material guarantees of amply adequate character." In all the propaganda every effort was made to appeal to the cupidity of the capitalist, and to allay his fears, by asserting that the Bolsheviks had reformed and were no longer the ferocious looters of last year, and by covertly intimating that he need not worry as to the security of private property rights. Indeed, they were ready to allow the election of a Constituent Assembly (whatever that might signify), and permit non-Bolsheviks to participate in government.

But by far the most striking manifestations of their propaganda are to be seen in Trotsky's announcement concerning turning the Red Army into labor battalions, and the publication in foreign countries of the Soviet code of labor laws. This code is an astounding production. It provides that every citizen between the ages of sixteen and fifty who is not incapacitated shall be subject to compulsory labor. Every laborer is placed in a definite group or category by the authorities, and his scale of wages determined. He must carry a labor booklet, which serves as a sort of passport, and he can not change from one job to another without the permission of the authorities. The code deprives the working man of the last vestige of liberty and reduces him to industrial serfdom. The object of the publication of this drastic code is clear—it is to assure the capitalist that if he will come and invest his money in Soviet Russia, he need fear no labor troubles and can treat his workmen as slaves.

The fact is that the Bolsheviks have utterly failed in Russia and stand on the brink of disaster. They have brought about the complete ruin of economic life and have existed thus far on reserves already accumulated. Now these reserves are approaching exhaustion and their only hope is to persuade capital to come in and take over the task of putting things to rights. They are not concerned over the fate of the millions of hapless people, but they see in this new move a chance to retain their power as well as the ill-gotten riches that have built up a whole new Bolshevik bourgeoisie. Here is a simple analogy. Suppose a gang of ignorant bandits and cut-throats, led by a few dreamers and fanatics who believe they have discovered a marvelous process for extracting gold without labor or expense, have jumped the claim to a rich gold mine. They badly maltreat the mine and come to the end of their resources. In their extremity they appeal to capitalists to take over the property and supply machinery and engineers, meanwhile opening up fine offices and putting on the finest front possible. They hope to see the mine restored to productivity and they expect to retain a controlling interest. For the ruined stockholders they have no care.

Russia will be opened up, and before long. It will present a fearful spectacle of disorganization and ruin. Life has gone back to a primitive state—to the Dark Ages—and to material destruction is added moral degradation. Two years of violence, corruption, injustice, and terror have done their deadly work. The question is how long will the Bolshevik régime endure. If the blockade were to continue a short time longer, there is little doubt that the Soviet Government would topple over, for it has never been weaker than at the present moment, despite its military victories and its brave front. But if it should fall under these conditions, there is nothing apparently to take its place, and the result would be a vast welter of anarchy. If relations are opened with Russia and capital vigorously attacks the problem of reorganizing economic life and bringing the people back to a state of productivity, the Soviet Government may continue in authority yet a few months longer, and, vile as it is, it may serve as the necessary cohesive force to prevent utter disintegration until new forces can be developed to succeed it. Such a system can not continue to exist in modern civilization, even in so primitive a country as Russia. During its brief hour it has held sway by brute force and terror over cowed and servile millions; it has robbed the gentlemen and the scholars of Russia of their heritage; it has wiped out Russian civilization and Russian culture like a Tatar horde. It would indeed be the irony of history if in its final days it should perforce serve a useful purpose.

Although England, France, and Italy are moving rapidly towards the recognition of the Soviet Government, there is no reason why America should lower herself by grasping the blood-stained hands of the tyrants at Moscow. We are not driven by necessity to make friends with temporarily successful evil, only to appear ridiculous a little later, when those forces of evil fall. America must in the future play an important rôle in the tasks of reconstruction in Russia; this is incumbent on us by reason of our surplus capital and our future international interests; and there is no reason to compromise these opportunities for any temporary and insignificant trade advantages. On the other hand, it is our duty to work out a comprehensive and practical plan whereby we can perform these tasks wisely and adequately, looking out for our own national interests, and at the same time safeguarding the Russian people against exploitation.

Mr. Asquith's Return

EVER since his defeat in the elections of 1918, Mr. Asquith has maintained a dignified aloofness from politics, being well aware that the sound common sense he might utter would fall on deaf ears so long as the nation had not sobered down from the intoxication of victory. The people's excited passions are a fit instrument for a man of Lloyd George's talent to play upon, but to the nation in its soberer mood the self-contained wisdom of an Asquith will make the stronger appeal. He has been biding his time and appears to have chosen the right moment for his return. The greatness of his personality is out of all proportion to the smallness of the party as whose leader he will oppose the Coalition Government. Indeed, if the vote of the Paisley electorate had brought no other change than the substitution of Sir Donald McLean by Mr. Asquith as leader of the "Wee Frees," as the small group of Free Liberals is nicknamed, the result of the recent election would be merely a personal victory for Lloyd George's predecessor. But it is more than that, inasmuch as the former Premier's reappearance in the House of Commons is fraught with the promise of great and far-reaching consequences.

The Coalition has had its day. There are few people in England who continue to believe in its vitality. The abortive attempt of Lord Birkenhead to form a new, the National, party, a camouflaged revival of the moribund Coalition, has only emphasized the fact that it is unavoidably doomed. Its Liberal members, realizing its approaching break-up, will probably rally round the old leader whom they abandoned in 1918. And what, in that event, will Lloyd George's next move be? It has been observed that, less punctilious but more cautious than Bonar Law, he refrained from sending a message of best wishes for his success to the Coalition candidate at Paisley, whom they both knew to be going in for a losing fight. He evidently did not wish to commit himself to any utterance which might bar for him the way to a reconciliation with his former chief, in the event of the latter beating his Labor opponent. The Welshman's resourceful brain is capable of conceiving any new combination, however impossible its realization may seem to the outsider. Is it likely that Mr. Asquith would accept the hand proffered him by the man whom he must admire, but whom he can not possibly respect, as a politician?

British opportunism and love of compromise may build the bridge across the hostility that divides the two former associates. The chief question of the near future is whether British Labor shall dictate its will to the country or be held in check by that innate love of moderation in reform which is one of the many aspects of the Briton's common sense. Mr. Asquith has taken a definite stand against the Labor Party's demands for socialization of the mines and railroads. On the other hand, by his hearty approval of Lloyd George's Russian policy he has drawn the line between his party and the Conservative section of the Coalition. These two problems of national and foreign policy, the most important that the present brings up for solution, form the common ground on which the Prime Minister and the Liberal leader may meet and join forces.

A reconstitution of the old Liberal Party, if thus realized, would naturally react upon the attitude of the Conservatives. The defection of the Liberals from the Coalition would force them to take their bearings afresh. The proposed Centre Party, a fusion of progressive Conservatives and Coalition Liberals advocated by Winston Churchill, could not be constituted without the support of Lloyd George. It is significant of the general impression that its fate will be decided by the result of the Paisley election and the subsequent course of events, that little has been heard during the past month of any steps being taken towards the realization of the plan. Lord Robert Cecil was generally held to be the man destined for the leadership of the new party, but he has maintained a punctilious silence, evidently waiting to take his cue from the move that Lloyd George is going to make. If the latter chooses Asquith for Lord Robert, the Conservatives of divers hue will have to rely upon themselves, and, giving up all hope of continuing the Coalition in some disguise or other, smooth over the differences that divide them in order to retain their significance as a party. Conservatives and Liberals, though each retaining their independence as in former days, will be united in opposition to the nationalization schemes of the Labor Party. The exultant note struck by Ramsay Macdonald in a recent article in the Nation would probably have been tuned a little lower if it had been written after Mr. Asquith's victory had opened the writer's eyes to the possibility of a different course of developments.

The Women's Colleges

WHEN Emma Willard, in 1819, made her appeal to the New York Legislature for the endowment of a "female seminary," nothing was farther from her thoughts than the idea that she was preparing the way for the inauguration of colleges for women. A large part of her discourse, in fact, is taken up with the repudiation of any such motive. "The seminary here recommended," she says, "will be as different from those appropriated to the male sex as the female character and duties are from the male." This from one of the most advanced spirits of the time.

The modesty of the demands of those who were pioneers in the field of women's education shows more clearly than anything else can do the force of the opposition arrayed against them. Always "the phantom of the learned lady" (in Emma Willard's phrase) must be laid to rest before the positive argument for a more than A B C education for girls can proceed. And the reasons assigned for wishing to have girls educated even in a very small way are as carefully unassuming as are the schemes of education proposed. Girls should be educated because as women they will have an "influence" on society. They will be wives, they will be mothers; they may even, on occasion, be teachers of small children. It will make a distinct difference to the human race (of which women themselves seem to be rather an appendage than a part) whether they are intelligent creatures or not. The idea that women's minds may be worth cultivating for the sake of the women themselves is rarely even suggested.

Yet the recognition of the fact that women's education was, from whatever point of view, a matter of public concern, marks a big step forward. The Troy Female Seminary, which Emma Willard established in 1821, soon became famous throughout the country, as did also, a few years later, Catherine Beecher's school at Hartford and Mary Lyon's seminary at Holyoke. Nothing better was done for girls in the Eastern States until Vassar opened in 1865. In the West more progress was made. Oberlin, founded as a collegiate institute in 1832 and chartered as a college in 1850, was coeducational from the start, and Antioch not only admitted women students but made a point of having women as well as men on its faculty. But the number of women in attendance was small, and the fact of their being admitted did not attract wide attention. The opening of Vassar in 1865 impressed people generally as the real beginning of higher education for women.

Matthew Vassar, in his first address to the trustees of the college, struck no uncertain note. "It occurred to me," he said, "that woman, having received from her Creator the same intellectual constitution as man, has the same right as man to intellectual culture and development." The aim was to provide a liberal education, not toned down to meet supposed requirements of the female mind, nor trimmed up with feminine "accomplishments." Vassar was to be "an institution which shall accomplish for young women what our colleges are accomplishing for young men," and there was to be no pretense that sewing for girls is the equivalent of science for boys.

The movement, once started, made rapid progress. By 1885, when Bryn Mawr was opened, Vassar, Wellesley, and Smith were flourishing institutions, Cornell and a few other Eastern colleges had taken women in, and at the State universities of the West coeducation was a matter of course. "The phantom of the learned lady" melted away. It was found that women's minds were really of the same stuff as men's, and that girls were neither enfeebled nor unsexed by contact with Greek, physics, and higher mathematics. Bryn Mawr, building on what had already been accomplished, was able to give new strength to the movement by raising the standard of admission and by establishing, under the influence of Johns Hopkins, a first-class graduate school such as few colleges in the country at that time possessed.

In view of the combined weight of incredulity and disapproval which the idea of the woman scholar had to contend with, it is remarkable that hostile prejudice retreated as quickly as it did. Nothing is left of such prejudice nowadays. The existence in large numbers of college-trained women is one of the important aspects of our national civilization, and in the East, where coeducation in undergraduate work is not a common practice, no one would deny that colleges for women are as vitally necessary as colleges for men. But while the public has been quick to appreciate, it has been slow to help. The difficulties of raising money for a woman's college are peculiar. Men's colleges increase their endowments chiefly through gifts from the alumni; ninety per cent. of the money raised in the present Harvard "drive" is from this source. Women's colleges, on the other hand, must depend largely on outside contributions. Their alumnae associations are comparatively small, and contain a comparatively small proportion of rich members—and even those members whom one calls "rich" often have no large sums of money at their own disposal. The manifest need can not be met unless disinterested citizens, and especially men of wealth, become alive to the opportunity for usefulness that is here offered. At a time when women's higher education was but an unpopular hope, Matthew Vassar gave away one-half of his hard-earned fortune in order to found Vassar College. Our present-day millionaires know the worth of the institutions that he and his successors established; how many will come forward and help sustain them?

THE REVIEW

A weekly journal of political and general discussion

Published by
THE NATIONAL WEEKLY CORPORATION
140 Nassau Street, New York

FABIAN FRANKLIN, President
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER, Treasurer

Subscription price, five dollars a year in advance. Fifteen cents a copy. Foreign postage, one dollar extra; Canadian postage, fifty cents extra. Foreign subscriptions may be sent to Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons, Ltd., 24, Bedford St., Strand, London, W. C. 2, England.
Copyright, 1920, in the United States of America
Editors
FABIAN FRANKLIN
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER

Associate Editors
HARRY MORGAN AYRES O. W. FIRKINS
A. J. BARNOUW W. H. JOHNSON
JEROME LANDFIELD

Constantinople and the Straits

SHORTLY after the Dardanelles were opened to the warships of the victorious Allies, in November, 1918, I saw once again the glistening dome of Hagia Sophia, and thought with wonder of the many strange mutations of human fortunes this ancient Christian monument had witnessed. Among my fellow passengers was a group of fervid Greek patriots who were exalted by the belief that before long the Church of Holy Wisdom would once more resound to the liturgy of the Greek Church.

This idea has recently received the vigorous support of a group of English churchmen of prominence who are demanding that the Turks shall not be permitted to keep possession of this most ancient of Christian edifices. The British press has published violent protests against the decision of the Supreme Council to allow the Sultan to continue to reside in Constantinople.

This point of view has very many supporters in the United States—notably, Ex-Ambassador Henry Morgenthau, who rendered such splendid services in Turkey at the outbreak of the war. It is generally maintained, in the familiar words of Gladstone, that the Turks must be driven out of Europe, "bag and baggage."

Against this point of view we have the solemn protest of Mr. Montagu, Secretary for India, that Great Britain must not affront the sensibilities of those millions of Moslems who look with pride to Constantinople as the seat of the Caliphate. Both he and Lloyd George have asserted that the British Government can not prove faithless to its formal assurances given during the war that there was no intention of driving the Turks from their capital. Otherwise, as they forcibly declare, Great Britain had no right to call on its Moslem subjects to help conquer Turkey.

The legal right of the descendants of Osman to the Caliphate is undoubtedly open to serious question. It is true that many Moslems, notably those of Persia, contest these claims. Millions of Moslems throughout the world, however, including our own islands of the Philippines, have a deep sentimental regard and respect for the Sultan of Turkey as the leading temporal monarch of Islam. An interesting recognition of this fact is the action taken by the United States Government in appealing to Sultan Abdul Hamid to use his influence as Caliph to persuade the revolting tribes of Moslems in the Jolo Archipelago to accept American rule. There can be no doubt that Moslems everywhere have had a genuine pride—a childish pride, if you will—in the fact that a Moslem potentate has his palace where the Imperial Cæsars once held sway.

The overwhelming defeat of the Turks and the loss of the major portion of their once magnificent empire has been a bitter humiliation to the House of Islam. Nor should the revolt of the Arabs from Turkish rule be taken too seriously as offsetting in any sense this powerful Moslem sentiment concerning the Caliphate and Constantinople. Taking into account the simplicity of character and the fanaticism of the Arabs, it is not unlikely that they may experience at any moment a revulsion of feeling concerning their fellow Moslems the Turks, formerly their oppressors and bitter enemies. There is grave danger that sooner or later the vast majority of Moslems would unite in fierce opposition to any attempt by Christian Powers to subject the Sultan-Caliph to further humiliations.

It was an evil day for the Turks when those hardy warriors of the plains and hills abandoned their tents to settle down in the palaces of the Cæsars. Constantinople is one of the loveliest cities of the world, but it has been the apple of discord between many nations for centuries, the cause of many misfortunes, disasters, and wars. It has been the centre of base intrigues and corruption. Here the Turks were enervated and demoralized by Byzantine traditions and by the worst influences of European civilization. There is much melancholy truth in the opinion expressed by the author of "Nationalism and War in the Near East" that "the failure of the Turks is due to Byzantinism. Their corruption and impotence were inherited with their national capital—not inherent in their national character. . . . Byzantine civilization was overflowed, not flooded out, by the Turkish invasion; and all the worst features of the decadent Byzantine social system emerged and flourished in the soil refertilized by new blood. No democracy, no simple virtues, and no sound vitality could grow in such soil without a more thorough purification than even Mahomet could give it."

The curse of Constantinople comes, of course, in the main from its situation athwart the Straits connecting the Euxine and the Mediterranean, both high seas necessary for the use of many nations, particularly for the vast Russian Empire. No single nation could expect to control exclusively this place without incurring the envy and hostility of other nations. This magnificent port was plainly intended by nature to be a great port of call, like Singapore, or an important commercial emporium, like Hong Kong. It was never suited to be the free, secure capital of an independent nation.

The freedom of the Straits of the Bosphorus and the Dardanelles has long been an imperative necessity, as well as an abstract right under international law. This freedom must be established and guaranteed by the most absolute and effective measures that may be devised. Whatever the differences and mutual jealousies of the Powers, they seem fairly well agreed on this fundamental proposition: the freedom of the Straits must be assured, and no single nation shall be permitted to control their use for its own selfish ends.

Such being the facts and the logic of the situation, the question whether the Turks shall be permitted to continue to reside in Constantinople becomes of subsidiary importance. Once the freedom of the Straits is effectively guaranteed, its value as a national capital is destroyed. If the Turks care to remain under the guns of foreign warships and overawed by foreign garrisons, they are accepting restraints and humiliations that can not long be endured. Sooner or later they will hanker for the seclusion and the tranquillity of Konia, the old capital of the Seljukian Turks in the heart of Asia Minor. (Broussa is far from an ideal capital, as it also would be dependent for an outlet on the Sea of Marmora and the Dardanelles.) The day will surely come when the Turks will escape from the spell of ill-fated Byzantium; when they will see the situation in its true light, and will realize that national greatness consists not in empire but in moral regeneration. Once again they will return to the plains and hills from whence they came; and in such a Hegira will assuredly lie their salvation, their true happiness and welfare.

In the meantime, if by reason of the ignis fatuus of Constantinople they are blinded to their true interests, why should others, in the light of all the practical considerations involved, give themselves undue concern? Why dissipate their energies and influence in a futile agitation, and lose sight of the true issue which Lloyd George has properly emphasized as the problem of establishing and maintaining the freedom of the Straits, and protecting the interests of the peoples of the Near East?

It should now be evident, in view of the rivalries and the mutual distrust of the Powers, that the problem of providing the right kind of mandates in Constantinople and the Near East is excessively difficult, and overshadows all other considerations. If one could only feel sure that their main concern was truly the freedom of the Straits and the welfare of the peoples of that part of the world, there would be much less cause for anxiety. In fact, under such conditions, the American people might even be induced, by a high sense of obligation to render a great disinterested service for mankind in general as well as for these unhappy peoples in particular, to undertake a general mandate over Constantinople and Asia Minor. The attitude of the Powers, however, leaves too much reason to fear that they have not accepted wholeheartedly those generous principles advocated by the United States in this war, and that it would be futile and unwise for us to attempt a mandate where our efforts would be foredoomed to failure.

It is impossible to avoid the unhappy conclusion that the preoccupation of the Powers over the division of conquered territories, and the establishment of new spheres of influence in accordance with the archaic and utterly vicious principle of balance of power, threatens a lamentable failure to solve the Eastern question. The key to its solution would seem to lie in the establishment and maintenance of the freedom of the Straits; and with this accomplished, it matters little whether or no the Turks are suffered to remain beside the Golden Horn.

Philip Marshall Brown

The Case of Sir Oliver Lodge

THE conspicuous exhibits in the "case" of Sir Oliver Lodge are the posters six feet high announcing lectures upon "The Structure of the Atom" and "The Evidence for Survival" and the streams of auditors filling well-paid seats to listen to a "scientific" message. The popularity betokens no sudden renascence of interest in exact science; nor is the persuasive oratory of the physicist the magnet that draws dollars and devotees. It is the author of "Raymond" and not the professor of physics at the University of Liverpool that is speaking. The atom enters the best society through the patronage of "spooks."

Prestige is potent. Surely if a distinguished physicist, trained in the niceties of the laboratory and the logic of scientific evidence, is convinced that the living communicate with the dead, the testimony must be profoundly convincing. The obvious fact is strangely ignored that, for the one exceptional scientist who subscribes to the reality of such communication, there are hundreds of equal authority who would violently resent the implication that they might be tempted to draw conclusions as to the nature of the universe from the testimony of "mediums" trafficking upon human credulity. Let no venturesome entrepreneur suppose that he can repeat this platform success by importing a still more eminent physicist, whose prestige might, indeed, assemble a modest audience at Harvard or Columbia University, but who would hardly fill Carnegie Hall in New York or the Academy of Music in Philadelphia. Prestige is potent; but the will to believe is more so. They combine in the "case" of Sir Oliver and his audiences.

The scientific student of the belief in spirits places the phenomenon in the primitive stages of human thinking. Sir Edward Tylor tells us that "the received spiritualistic theory belongs to the philosophy of savages"; that a North American Indian transferred to a spirit-séance in London with its "raps, noises, voices, and other physical actions, would be perfectly at home in the proceedings." Andrew Lang regarded the study of these "psychological curiosities" of persistent belief "as a branch of mythology or folklore." Podmore, the historian of modern spiritualism, calls the belief less an hypothesis or an explanation than "the instinctive utterance of primitive animism." And yet in the twentieth year of the twentieth century the same order of belief, based upon the same discredited type of evidence, but couched in more learned language, sways the minds of men who live richly in a world built upon the discoveries of science; by whom the spirit that created the telegraph and telephone, aeroplanes and motor cars, "wireless" and X-rays, aseptic surgery and preventive medicine, is forsaken in pursuit of a cult of revelation by mediums plying a questionable trade among the intellectual slums of civilization.

For the ordinary every-day mind holding such beliefs at arm's length or playing with them as the fashionable toy of the hour, with no disciplined standards of consistency, and slight responsibilities of reputation, there is nothing seriously discreditable—though much that is deplorable—in the lapse; for such minds follow the torch-bearers and are blinded by the incandescent filament of prestige. What is pardonable for the following is not so for the leaders of thought. Nor can the tribute which we gladly pay to our cousinly colleagues coming to us under the mission of science be permitted to silence the protest against the mental confusion and darkening counsels of obscurantism which follow the trail of Sir Oliver across the American continent.

The peculiar aggravation of the "case" is the trivial irrelevance of the evidence upon which a professor of physics announces a subversive dispensation, which, if true, would contradict every principle of his science and relegate his laboratory to the scrap heap of an abandoned intellectual habitation. For Sir Oliver offers the same threadbare evidence, stale and unprofitable. The mingling of physics and psychics is most amazing:

> The fact that a photograph can be clearly recognized when the medium has only seen the person clairvoyantly on the other side of the veil is suggestive, since it seems to show that the general appearance is preserved—or, in other words, that each human body is a true representation of personality.

Sir Oliver ventures into biology with the same confidence. He speaks of the similarity of "the ideas about inheritance usually associated with the name of Weissmann, and the inheritance or conveyance of bodily attributes or of powers acquired through the body, into the future life of the soul." So, when spirits return in the incoherent disclosures of the séance room, the man of science observes how far they "inherit" or "convey" their acquired characteristics. "Future existence may be either glorified or stained, for a time, by persistence of bodily traits." Furthermore, it is found that, although bodily marks, scars, and wounds are clearly not of soul-compelling and permanent character, yet for purposes of identification, and when reentering the physical atmosphere for the purpose of communication with friends, these temporary marks are reassumed." How does Sir Oliver reach these positive deductions? From the inspired revelations of mediums, accepted on their own pretensions as experts in the physics and biology of the future world. Weissmann and his followers have a prejudice in favor of controllable experimentation upon transmission of traits through successive generations of living animal or plant forms; Sir Oliver prefers the simpler method of clairvoyance to reveal the laws of spirit transmission. But Sir A. Conan Doyle, whose training both as a physician and as a detective should give him a higher expert rating, says that in the future world we are all of an age, the young growing older and the old growing younger until a democratic equilibrium of appearance is reached. These discrepancies might be embarrassing if spirits and those who communicate with them felt it obligatory to carry the impedimenta of logical baggage on their journeys. Sir Oliver does not wish to be troubled with explaining these matters when he reaches the world with which he now communicates. He gives notice:

> As a digression of some importance, I venture to say that claims of thoughtless and pertinacious people upon the charitable and eminent, even here, are often excessive: it is to be hoped that such claims become less troublesome and less effective hereafter; but it is a hope without much foundation.

So long as mediums control the telephone-book of the "hereafter," there is little outlook for peace. For it is plain, as Dr. Furness, the genial Shakespearean, used to say, the most difficult task for a logical mind is to take these matters seriously.

The citations are relevant to show what manner of thinking and what standards of evidence Sir Oliver employs in support of his thesis. Are these reasonings those of a man of science in any other sense than they reflect the apologetics of a mind that retains a vestige of logical conscience, but for the most part wanders wherever it listeth? The conclusions must be made to appear reasonable and learned, and the argument modelled after the patterns of the fabric that science weaves. But the result is a travesty, a grotesque degradation, pernicious because it may influence minds inexpert in distinguishing between truth and nonsense, between a poem and a parody.

Let us test Sir Oliver's acumen in simpler fashion. Ten years ago New York and other American cities were similarly aflutter, but not with learned theories and platform deliverances; for the central figure of the excitement could neither read nor write, nor speak any other language than the Italian of her class. But she had spokesmen in plenty and with ample prestige: Lombroso and Morselli in Italy, Richet and Flammarion in France, and a group of eminent observers in England, including Sir Oliver Lodge. Mr. Carrington devoted a book to the "case" of Eusapia Palladino and said: "Eusapia is genuine; but she is, so far as I know, almost unique." "The whole evidential case for the physical phenomena of spiritualism" rests with her; if "nothing but fraud entered into the production of these phenomena, then the whole case for the physical phenomena would be ruined—utterly, irretrievably ruined." The pièce de résistance of Eusapia's performance consisted in the lifting, "levitation by spirits," of a very light table which she carried with her for the purpose. When unknown to her, two witnesses were smuggled under the table and saw her foot levitate, and when with proper control of her hands and feet nothing happened, while with lax control the spirits gave most satisfactory performances, the case of Palladino collapsed; but Mr. Carrington is now publishing a "psychical" journal for the further record of the rare powers of future Eusapias.

Did Eusapia deceive all Europe and did she succumb only to the shrewd Yankee mind? By no means. Professor Le Bon saw the trickery in Paris; Dr. Moll and Dr. Dessoir (Germans, be it whispered) saw through Eusapia in Berlin; Professor Sedgwick, Dr. Hodgson, Mr. Myers—though inclining to belief in some form of supernormal powers—were convinced that Eusapia was fraudulent. But Sir Oliver wrote: "I am therefore in hopes that the present decadent state of the Neapolitan woman may be only temporary, and that hereafter some competent and thoroughly prepared witness may yet bring testimony to the continued existence of a genuine abnormal power in her organism."

Is this the utterance of a science-trained caution or of the will to believe despite the unwelcome trend of the evidence?

The case of Sir Oliver does not stand alone. Sir Richard Crookes, a fellow-physicist of like distinction, testified to seeing a medium sitting in the air supported by nothing visible, offered spirit photographs as evidence of survival, inferred the existence of an "hitherto unknown force" from the fact that a medium affected a balance with which apparently he had no contact—to mention only a few of the accredited miracles of a physical nature. Alfred Russel Wallace had a like faith in the genuineness of several forms of mediumistic performances, and, in addition, regarded the neglect of phrenology as one of the scientific sins of the nineteenth century. The list could be extended not indefinitely, but considerably. The phenomenon is a puzzling one; for we associate with the effect of a professional training a general robustness of logical vigor, a thorough saturation of the mind in all its vocations with the habits of rigid evidence and critical caution. We assume a consistency of mental habit, and in that assumption seemingly go astray. We must make room for the existence of minds streaked with rationality but not uniformly penetrated by the stabilizing quality; we must consider reserved areas of prejudice and predilection in which ideas flourish and convictions are cherished with slight regard to their reconciliation with the dominant logicality of the rest of one's beliefs. If such products of our complex psychology are common, though presumably in less momentous phases of the mental character, why should they not occasionally occur among professional men of science, and now and then among the ablest of them? It is plainly not the "physical" but the personal bent of Sir Oliver that is responsible for the amazing conclusions to which he commits himself, bringing to their statement the formulating skill which results from the professional side of his mentality.

It would seem extravagant to speak of a divided personality, because that type of psychological chasm runs deeper and invades the emotional responses in more pragmatic types of conduct. And yet the emotional element in the will to believe is the essential common factor. In the presence of strong emotion in these straining times, so tragically reënforced by the calamity of bereavement on a world-wide scale, composure is difficult and reason seems a frail support. To see life steadily and to see it whole is no easy consummation, when the most cherished values have been trampled upon and the closest ties broken. Unreason is rampant in the political world; its invasion of the scientific domain is not surprising.

It is characteristic that the conclusions for which such feeble and pitiable evidence is advanced and accepted always appeal to a strong personal wish. Change the stake but a little, and the intensity of the emotion pales. One may discuss the hypothesis of telepathy quite composedly; the overwhelming evidence of exact experiment is that it does not exist. The presumption in favor of it is part of the same predilection, has the same anthropological flavor as that in favor of the belief in spirit intercourse; but its animus is closer to the intellectual pursuit. It is less hazardous to take a chance on its occasional and sporadic occurrence; and the most ardent believers in its possibility use the telegraph no less regularly when they wish to convey messages with some reasonable assurance of their delivery. Telepathy does not penetrate the emotional nature and play havoc with the integrity of social relations and the security of a logical conscience. Naturally, those inclined to credit "occult" forces are hospitable to both hypotheses; and it has been assumed by some psychic researchers that spirits may use telepathy, while Maeterlinck ascribes the power to exceptional horses. The satisfaction attaching to such beliefs is real, and when not too dearly purchased is an indulgence which strong minds can stand. But rationality is too precious an asset to be complacently exposed to such temptation.

The social menace is twofold: it inclines sober minds to speculate in supernatural forces as though they were regularly listed on the stock exchange of sound beliefs; and it sends all sorts and conditions of men and more sorts and conditions of women to visiting mediums and flirting with "ouija" boards, to the undermining of their none too stable beliefs in the rectitude of nature and the solidarity of human experience. All the interests of sanity—medical, educational, religious, and broadly humanitarian—have a like stake in opposing the momentary assault upon rationality, and marshaling against it the institutional resources of press and pulpit and platform, academic and civilian. The coinage of the mind can not be debased with impunity. At credulity's booth are all things sold,

Each ounce of dross costs its ounce of gold.

JOSEPH JASTROW

Correspondence

"The Human Cost of Living"

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

I am wondering, after reading the harrowing tale of "The Human Cost of Living," whether John knows also that to get his electric light a certain process has to be gone through wherein women have to sit in a room at the steady temperature of 110 degrees?

This I have been told by one who professes to know whereof she speaks. Their shifts must be short—but even so!

On the other hand, I really should like to know what John can do about it, and whether, unless he can do something about it, it is valuable or wise to depress and even torment his soul with the knowledge.

Can anything be done about it that will not overturn our material civilization? Of course these workers are real heroes—every one with a heart for humanity must realize that—but are they not open-eyed and voluntary heroes? They must know beforehand the risks they are to take, and, therefore, consider that the compensation repays them for it —they can hardly be so altruistic as to wish to give John his light simply because he wants to have it.

Anyhow, what can John do about it?

B.

Arlington, Mass., February 18

[Mr. Colcord made it clear that much can still be done to better the working conditions of labor. Eds. THE REVIEW.]

Industrial Welfare Work at Akron

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

The "welfare work" of the Goodyear Tire and Rubber Company is well worthy of attention by students of industrial conditions. A seven-storied clubhouse as the centre of welfare activities is nearing completion, at a cost of about a million, it is said. The first floor provides a gymnasium 100 by 172 feet, and a theatre seating 2,000, with stage 40 feet broad and of still greater depth. The second floor has community room for men, library, music rooms, etc., with dormitory rooms for 300 men. There are rooms for the "Industrial Assembly" (Senate and House) on the third floor, the greater part of which, however, is given up to domestic science rooms, recreational rooms, and dormitories, for women. Of the remaining four floors, one provides cafeteria service for 8,000 employees, and the other three house the "Goodyear University" and the moving picture department, where films elucidate the various processes of manufacturing rubber products. In the basement are lockers, bowling alleys, rifle ranges, etc. Two papers—a monthly and a tri-weekly—are published for employees, but have also a wide circulation outside.

The company aids and encourages employees to own their own homes, financing them on a system of monthly instalments proportioned to wages or salary, and at the end of five years the home purchaser who has persisted gets a bonus from the company of one-fourth the cost of the property. The welfare work is managed by a central committee of representatives from each department of the plant, working under a written constitution. Some thirty organizations, literary, athletic, musical, dramatic, etc., are under its direction. For outdoor sports a large athletic field is provided, and there is also a children's playground, with instructors on duty during the summer months, for the children of employees. A nursery is provided where mothers working in the factory may leave their babies under competent care during the day.

If we were to ask one of the 25,000 Goodyear employees how so much work of this kind can be accomplished, he would probably explain it by "the Goodyear spirit," which a former official once defined as "a feeling of satisfaction that radiates through, and is of mutual benefit to, both men and management, brought about by the earnest efforts of both parties to please and support each other." This spirit is attained by coöperation, in all things pertaining to the work of the plant, from its general management down, and the prospects are that its achievements will be even greater in the future, as the experience of years points the way.

GRACE ORB

West Lafayette, Ind., February 20

The High-Handedness of the Anti-Saloon League

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

The attempt of the Anti-Saloon League to convey the impression that the citizens who are protesting against the iniquitous Volstead Law, or attacking the validity of the Eighteenth Amendment, are countenancing law-breaking or disrespect for the Government, is a clever trick, but one that will not work. The Anti-Saloon League is not yet the Government of this country, though it thinks that it is. There are millions of sober, temperate men and women who believe that they have a natural and inalienable right to decide as to what beverages they shall drink, and they resent the assumption that a band of self-constituted reformers have any right to dictate to them in a matter relating solely to their personal tastes. They favor action thoroughly to test the validity of the Eighteenth Amendment, and, if that effort fails, to bring about its repeal. In so doing, they are just as good, just as law-abiding, and just as true Americans as the men and women who have forced upon the country a measure that directly violates the letter and spirit of the Declaration of Independence, and, we believe, also the Constitution of the United States.

The violent abuse with which the Anti-Saloon League has assailed all those, including the Vigilance League, who protest against the action of Congressmen and State legislators who had no mandate from the people on this issue, is proof that they are at least doubtful as to whether on a popular vote they would have received a majority. The test of the true spirit of Americanism is loyalty to the principle of personal liberty, which is the cornerstone of American political liberty, and it is a new and un-American doctrine that would deny to free citizens of the United States the right to test the validity of a law or Constitutional amendment, or to seek its repeal.

E. J. SHRIVER
Chairman Executive Committee,
The Vigilance League

New York, February 28

The Power of the Referendum

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

The significance of the efforts of Governor Milliken of Maine to line up the States whose Legislatures voted to ratify Constitutional Prohibition against Rhode Island lies in the fact that out of 44 possibilities he has only announced 26.

Does this not indicate a cooling off of sentiment in the remainder? The Governor of Vermont not only refused to coöperate but expressed the hope that Rhode Island would win her case. In Maryland a red-hot fight for "rescission plus a referendum" is now in progress.

Moreover, the list of 26 includes several States where the referendum has been invoked. The Governor of California, for instance, may find that he has joined the movement without the authority of his people.

Before long the Ohio referendum case will be decided by the United States Supreme Court.

Provided it holds that the people are part of "the Legislature," if the State Constitution, as interpreted by the State Supreme Court, so ordains, there may result favorable decisions for a referendum in California, Washington, Nebraska, Missouri, Oklahoma, Michigan, and New Mexico.

These States, in that event, will not have voted as yet upon Constitutional Prohibition. For, if the people can legally take part in the Legislative act, it is not yet complete. So it is quite possible that a considerable number of Americans will have an opportunity, after all, to record their views on Constitutional Prohibition, even if the New York and Massachusetts Legislatures now in sessions refuse to grant referendums.

A decision by the Supreme Court in the Ohio case may wake them out of their trance.

As to Constitutional Suffrage, the Oklahoma Legislature gave what is called "a Legislative recognition" to the referendum in that State by omitting the "emergency measure clause" after the lower house had first insisted upon it.

If, including Ohio and Oklahoma, the suffragists succeed in obtaining 36 State Legislatures for the amendment, will the Secretary of State ignore the referendums as he did on Prohibition in issuing his proclamation? Or will fear of possible legal complications as affecting the approaching Presidential election give him pause and cause him to reverse the Prohibition precedent and await with patience the coming authoritative ruling on this question by the Supreme Court. The latter would seem to be the wise course.

OPTIMIST

New York, February 29

Book Reviews

Jeremiad and Jumble

Liberalism in America. By Harold Stearns. New York: Boni and Liveright.

The Intellectuals and the Wage-Earners. By Herbert Ellsworth Cory. New York: The Sunwise Turn.

AMERICAN liberals are a rather poor sort, according to Mr. Harold Stearns. They acquiesced in conscription; they allowed themselves, either through timidity or through the seduction of office, to become a part of the war machine and to help along the monstrous evils that developed during the period of conflict—hysteria, bitterness, persecution, imposture, false propaganda, and everything. Fortunately, however, from Mr. Stearns's standpoint, not all of the liberals were of this weak fibre. A saving remnant of Sir Bediveres have stood guard till now, and will stand guard in the wild hour coming on. For a tempestuous time is just ahead of us—social revolution with a strong probability of much bloodshed.

It would be profitable to learn just what this liberalism is and with what groups it is to be identified. But the reader will hardly be satisfied with what is furnished him. Liberalism apparently is not a doctrine, nor are doctrines its primary concern. It is rather a "philosophy" which embodies a "respect for the individual and his freedom of conscience and opinion," a "temper and attitude of tolerance," a dependence upon facts and upon reason as their interpreter. Still, though it stresses reason, it does not overlook "the drive of passion of conviction." It is a well-bred "philosophy." "It is urbane, good-natured, non-partisan, detached. It is in a way frankly 'above the battle.'"

The observant reader will labor hard in his effort to discover any existent group in which these qualities are conspicuous. He will labor yet more strenuously in his effort to find their exemplification in Mr. Stearns's volume. Liberalism, he will conclude as he turns the last page, may be all of these things; but the volume itself is anything but an exhibit in support of the thesis. Of tolerance for a contrary opinion, and of respect for him who holds it, there is usually none. The things set down as facts are, as a rule, either disputable things or else the opposite of things known by any well-informed person to be true. There is small exercise of reason and much emotional excitation. There is a piling up of aggressive assertion, with sweeping and uncritical generalizations. In some pages the breathless rush of words mounts (or descends, as you please) into mere rant. The temper throughout is violent, partisan, and belligerent. The book as a whole is an interesting example of the highly modern thing called intellectual radicalism (though why intellectual it is hard to say), with its swirl and rush of extreme and unbased opinions on every conceivable subject.

It is a serious intellectual weakness, we learn on page 12, to be unfair to one's opponent. This weakness, however, is revealed more than once in the book, and nowhere more strikingly than in the treatment (pp. 111-12) of certain American Socialists who left their party because of its attitude on the war. Nothing in the book reveals the slightest understanding of the psychology of the American people as a whole regarding the war, or of the psychology of any particular group—even his own. It is but natural, therefore, that, in the fury of his partisanship, the author can see no integrity in the possessor of an opposing view. The motive that determined Mr. Walling, Mr. Russell, and Mr. Spargo was the "natural desire to be quoted and popular." In Mr. Spargo's case he goes further. The book "Bolshevism" seems to him, "on the face of it, dishonest and unfair." The stupidity and falseness of the first judgment, the flippancy and ignorance of the second, are obvious enough to any sincere person; but the offensiveness of both is made more glaring by reason of the author's high-flown pretensions to the alleged liberal virtues.

When one comes to the chapter on "Leadership," one knows what to expect. Whatever else it may contain, it is sure to include a tribute to Nicolai Lenin. The mind of emotional radicalism is fashioned of contrarieties. When it sings the praise of tolerance, of reason, of respect for the individual, of freedom of conscience, speech, press, and assemblage; when it anathematizes military conscription, the regimentation of labor, government by executive decree and the like, the observant reader senses what is coming next. It is a pæan to that chief modern exponent of intolerance, fanaticism, and repression, Lenin. And sure enough, on the second page of the chapter it begins. At first it is a bit tentative and cautious—perhaps an illustration of that liberal "method of approach" elsewhere extolled. "It [the war] produced practically no leaders among the men of affairs except possibly Lenin. . . . Even Clemenceau has been, for all his stubbornness and refreshing reactionary directness, more of a dictator than a leader." So the Clemenceau who ruled by a majority of an elected chamber and who any day might have been overturned was a "dictator," while the Lenin who has ruled by the bayonet is a "leader." But this is only the beginning. A little further on (pp. 204-5), and behold the apotheosis!

Of misstatements of simple fact there are too many to chronicle. But one wonders just how, with the figures in front of him and carefully set down, the author can assert (p. 59) that the increase in railway mileage in 1910 over the mileage in 1860—a matter of eight times—is "almost one hundred times." There is something here to prompt the reader to a curious speculation regarding the author's mental habits. But still more will such speculation be induced by a consideration of the author's readings from history and his estimates of present and future conditions. Nearly everything in the United States is wrong, it appears, and has been so for more than a century. The Civil War was unnecessary and could have been avoided had the Abolitionists kept quiet. It has left in its wake, moreover, a fearful train of horrors—the negro problem, Federal supremacy, the imminence of a national smash-up, materialism, and a miscellaneous assortment of minor ills. The recent war—at least America's participation in it—was also needless, and its effect has been only to pile Pelion upon Ossa in the shape of further horrors. The hopes aroused by it have all been dissipated, and chaos lies just around the corner.

For the emotional radical to find everything wrong in the present is conventional enough; to see the future doubtful and threatening is not uncommon; but to find past and present equally bad and to forebode the future as worse is a new turn in social meteorology. The author must at least be credited with a novel contribution.

With much tall talk, and no little sentimentality, Mr. Cory offers his blend of psycho-analysis, Bolshevism, I. W. W.-ism, Federalism (otherwise Pluralism), Marxism, guild Socialism, benevolent sabotage, and a number of revolutionary kickshaws that happen to be lying around. It is a marvelous synthesis, piled high with a jumble of heterogeneous objects in the foreground and with limitless horizons. It is the very latest word in revolutionary divination, and for a few weeks at least it ought to close the field against rival entries from the ultra-radical coteries.

True to type, it contains the conventional revolutionary pæan to liberty and the complemental laudations of Lenin. While it excoriates the sabotage of the rascally bourgeoisie, it idealizes proletarian sabotage as a thing "that moves progressively towards truth, beauty, love." The measures taken by democratic States to protect themselves constitute repression; the far more vigorous measures taken by the Soviet oligarchy to maintain itself are merely instances of "self-discipline." Fanatical absurdities of this sort crowd the volume. There is to be said for it, however, that it is free from the detestable smartness that pervades so much of current revolutionary print and that it shows evidences of study, however preposterously the gleanings from that study have been applied. I hope that it will be widely read; for there is need for all to know what fantastic speculation is constantly issuing from the revolutionary fold. Among thinking persons the book will prove its own best antidote.

W. J. GHENT

A Catholic Critic of Sinn Fein

SOME QUESTIONS OF PEACE AND WAR, with special reference to Ireland. By Rev. Walter McDonald, D.D., Prefect of the Dunboyne Establishment, St. Patrick's College, Maynooth. London: Burns and Oates, Ltd.

PRACTICAL statesmen are not much given to quoting books by professors. So there may well have been a flutter of curiosity in the British Parliament when, during a recent speech about Home Rule, Mr. Lloyd George held up a little green brochure fresh from the press, and insisted that honorable members should listen to long paragraphs by Dr. Walter McDonald. Honorable members would no doubt prick up their ears, and the suspicious among them would fancy that these extracts had appealed to the Premier less through their intrinsic merit than through the support they lend to the new Irish bill. Beyond doubt it was good debating to cite a Maynooth professor for the view that Sinn Fein has garbled the records of the past, that historically there never was any such thing as an Irish "nation," united and fully independent, and that the claim of nationality, in the only sense which matters, can be advanced with at least equal force on behalf of the Protestants in the northeast corner of Ulster. Those who might be stimulated to read the book would find in it an indictment of the prelates who said that no conscription law could be rightly applied to the Irish people without Ireland's consent, and would be impressed by the fact that an authorized teacher of candidates for the priesthood will admit no strength in such a plea. The sponsors of a bill which aims to unite the warring extremists on either side might naturally welcome the help of a Catholic doctor of divinity who says that Sir Edward Carson acted as every statesman in Europe or America would do in similar circumstances, urged by a similar conviction.

But, although the book has these obvious uses of which so dexterous a debater as Mr. Lloyd George has been quick to avail himself, it would be most unfair to call its author a mere propagandist for a party programme. In what he has written there are some notable features of permanent and timely value for the elucidation of his subject. As befits his profession, Dr. McDonald summons his readers to look at Ireland's case in the light of a history not only sympathetic but impartial, and in the light of an ethic not only insistent but intelligent. Thus, the book is in part historical and in part critical. Two sources of mistake are vigorously exposed: first, the idea that the Home Rule problem can be solved by burrowing into the past and claiming a restoration of the "independent" status which Ireland lost some centuries ago at the hand of English invaders acknowledging no principle higher than force; second, the idea that an abstract formula like "self-determination," used without any scrutiny of circumstance or any forecasting of probable results, is sufficient by itself to define the régime under which a country shall be governed. Both these specious arguments have had immense vogue, and Dr. McDonald subjects both to a mordant analysis which does credit to his power in the science of applied ethics. He raises such points as these: whether Ireland ever was united and independent; whether she has not many times renounced, at least by implication, her separate status; whether there are not numerous cases in which "nationhood," with the approval of the whole world, has been forfeited without "acquiescence;" what sort of community is to be recognized as a national self, and whether Ulster can not urge this right as against the rest of Ireland just as fairly as Ireland can urge it against Great Britain. Passing to some ethical issues of the Great War, Dr. McDonald asks how those who approve of wars waged in a good cause can help approving also of a draft law essential to military success. Since it is wrong to begin a fight where there is no chance of winning, must not those who have willed the end will also the means? How could Ireland escape this common burden of the Empire unless her people could plead conscientious objection to all war as such—a plea surely among the very last which historical evidence can make good? She can not treat the Imperial Parliament as a constitutional authority when it legislates to her own taste, and denounce it as a usurping aggressor when it legislates otherwise.

All this, and much more like it, is admirably to the point. To exempt Ireland from conscription was no matter of international right; it was a counsel of expedience, in view of that deplorable estrangement for which British rulers in days gone by are so much to blame, and whose consequence British rulers of the present have still to bear. That new term, "self-determination," in which President Wilson has crystallized the mood of a new time, involved the inevitable risk of a word which may be tortured in contradictory directions. It is an excellent working formula, but language is at best no more than approximately expressive, and no state in Europe has had its place fixed at the Paris Conference by either historical inquiries or abstract rules pursued to the complete neglect of existing facts.

In his criticism of Sinn Fein Dr. McDonald has had no difficulty in proving that the history on which his opponents rely with such confidence is at best uncertain, and that some general maxims which they quote can quite as well be used against them. But, what is really more important, he makes it clear that from neither of these sources, with whatever degree of literal exactness they may be understood, can an answer to our present problem reveal itself. What concerns us now is neither antiquarian research nor manipulated abstractions, but a resolute facing of comparative values for the future.

Those, however, who base Ireland's claim to self-government upon what Matthew Arnold so well called the fact of "the incompatibles" can endorse a great deal of what Dr. McDonald has said without agreeing with his conclusion that the northeast corner has just the same special right that belongs to the country as a whole. Splitting up into fragments can not go on indefinitely. Level-headed Irishmen do not demand Home Rule just because they are infatuated about "historical nationhood"; they rather make much, sometimes too much, of historical nationhood because they discern the need for Home Rule. Not because Niall of the Nine Hostages ruled over a united Ireland in the fourth century or Brian in the eleventh, and not because the order established by these ancient worthies was never willingly abandoned by any generation of their descendants, do they insist that a régime which has broken down before our own eyes shall be replaced by a régime which can stand. Niall and Brian and the rest are in truth as shadowy figures to nine-tenths of the discontented Irish now as they can be to Dr. McDonald, and the practical solution is as little dependent on his scientific denials as on Mr. De Valera's sentimental enthusiasms about that cloudland of romance.

Thus, when we speak of "incompatibles" we must face the incompatibility in the north. The question of Ulster is like that of conscription, a problem o expedience and generosity. One may agree that the people of the northeas corner, differing—some of them—fror the rest of Ireland in race, creed, an mentality, are entitled to a legislatur with local powers subordinate, as Dr McDonald himself insists, to a genera Irish Parliament in Dublin. But a crucial point arises in defining the princip on which the two areas are to be stake out. Again and again Dr. McDonal speaks of Ulster "Protestants." Is it possible that we are to apply just the test of differing creeds? Is there to be a barrier between contrasted faiths, such as modern Europe has learned to look upon with horror? Are we to stereotype by statute that wretched antagonism to which Ireland already owes so much of her distress? Are we to provide a constitutional guarantee for that persisting religious hatred whose softening has been so far the ideal of all good men? I defy any one to find these homogeneous districts of Ulster; for let us be thankful that in every county there are those of both creeds who will not admit without a struggle this monstrous plan for religious segregation. As a Protestant Nationalist who spent thirty years of his life in that northeast corner. I can testify to having known multitudes of my own race and creed who would be glad of any other arrangement whatever rather than one which would subject this robust minority in Antrim and Down to a purely Carsonite legislature in Belfast. Are men like Lord Pirrie—a Protestant, and for years by far the largest employer of Belfast labor—to be refused the right of self-determination? They differ at least in that interesting point called "mentality" from the swearers to a Carsonite covenant. Are scrutineers to go from house to house, presenting the alternative of the Westminster Confession of Faith and the Decrees of Trent, so that a zigzag line may be traced on the basis of the worst possible distinction for founding a polity? In Belfast alone we should have many a case of two women grinding at the same mill of whom one should be taken and another left. Mr. Lloyd George seems to have some such holy inquisition in mind. Let us hope that the good sense of Parliament will make short work of this in the committee stage of the coming bill. Fancy a proposal to harmonize Ontario and Quebec by "breaking up some of the present counties," putting the Protestants of Quebec into an expanded Ontario, and the Catholics of Ontario into an expanded Quebec!

Dr. McDonald's answer, no doubt, would be that cases of special hardship are inevitable, for, as he says, "minorities must suffer." Is not this a good rule for Ireland as a whole? A northeast legislature, based on that geography which guides us in all other places, with powers narrowly defined, and admitting of quick fusion with the legislature of the south as the logic of events may prescribe, seems to be the best practical way out for Ulster's difficulty. But there must be no gerrymandering of the areas. And it does seem unfortunate that Dr. McDonald should have bewildered us all, in a book otherwise conciliatory to constitutional folk of every side, by denying all fault in Sir Edward Carson's scheme of intimidating Parliament by arms. We read with amazement that Sir Edward was justified by the right of self-determination! Is it not Dr. McDonald himself who has taught us not to take that rubric too seriously, not to apply it with mechanical literalness, but to weigh and estimate and compare consequences? Who is to decide how the balance inclines? Sir Edward Carson says he believes only in the Imperial Parliament; and did not this Parliament, after long debate, decide the Home Rule act of 1914 to be fair? Dr. McDonald is fond of putting conundrums to the Irish bishops; can he say how Ulster could consistently take up arms to defeat an act passed at Westminster, alleging as her ground that only Westminster can be relied upon for just legislation?

Herbert L. Stewart

Among Our Americas

A Man for the Ages. By Irving Bacheller. Indianapolis: The Bobbs-Merrill Company.

Rebels: Into Anarchy and Out Again. By Marie Ganz: In Collaboration with Nat J. Ferber. New York: Dodd, Mead and Company.

The Mask. By John Cournos. New York: George H. Doran Company.

It has been the fashion for reviewers to treat Mr. Bacheller with something like good-humored contempt, or, let us say, affectionate condescension. What we have held against him most, probably, is that he has quietly ignored certain inhibitions of the literary hour. He has not chosen to assume, with the best people, that air of skeptical remoteness, that slightly lifted shoulder and slightly wry smile, which now mark good form in the humorist—except, of course, the humorist of a shamelessly popular order. Mr. Bacheller is not afraid to wear his heart on his sleeve, sees no reason for not being amiable and sympathetic. He has not thought of concealing either his old-fashioned smiles or his old-fashioned tears from professional reviewers or other superior and sophisticated persons. And who shall say that he may not have his appeal for the "highbrows" of later generations? There are current signs of reaction against the ultra-knowing and you-can't-fool-us attitude of an already disintegrating Georgian age. The best people are rediscovering the Dickens whom the people have never forgotten: rediscovering him as a fellow-being whose "unabashed sentimentalism" marked his kinship with the lave. It is suspected that you can't get the most fun or even the deepest satisfaction out of peering at life through narrowed eyelids under a wearily tolerant brow. Perhaps the Latest Unpleasantness, with its revelation of primitive faults, has driven us to seek also the primitive virtues of swelling heart and outstretched hand which the clever ones have never been able to make quite absurd.

It is possible and even tempting for professional reviewers to get rid of a book like this one of Mr. Bacheller's with a tolerant smile and a shake of the head and an "all very pretty, but too pretty" wave of the hand. But it may be as just and should be as profitable to take the author's intention and lend ourselves as far as we can to his effect. Let us grant that he has been consistently a sentimentalist in a period which has refused its official countenance to sentimentalism. Beyond doubt he has rasped the string pitilessly at times. And a generation which prides itself upon having outgrown Mrs. Stowe and Bret Harte—yes, and Mark Twain—has by no means withdrawn its ear from the author of "Eben Holden" and "D'ri and I." One thing it could not if it would ignore—the intensive Americanism of his materials and their handling. His portrait of Lincoln, in this latest story, may be accepted as neither better nor worse than other idealized likenesses of that great realist. His chronicle of the pioneering America of the thirties and forties is a performance of real freshness and power. We recall Hamlin Garland's recent interpretation of the Westward pioneers. With all its sympathy and fidelity to detail, his picture was touched with melancholy; it presented the pioneer as, on the whole, a pathetic though necessary sacrifice upon the altar of civilization. Mr. Bacheller's mood is characteristically different. His pioneers escape none of the hardships of their calling, but do themselves in some sense realize the promised land. Samson Traylor of the mighty thews and the merry heart is a true type and more than a type. The obscure call which sets him upon a long Westward trail from the Vermont village of his birth to the Illinois village of his destiny will not be denied. There is an empire building in the West; he must be there to help; and help he does, with his thews and his laughter and his shrewd Yankee brain. Nor does he fail to share the prosperity of the new land. . . . Lincoln is a figure already established in the imagination of the world. Mr. Bacheller could do no more than throw it into relief against its natural background and give us some echoes of the familiar voice. I shall remember this book for its original portrait of Samson Traylor and his fellow-pioneers rather than for its capable projection of the well-known features of Honest Abe.

Meanwhile the world has continued flowing toward the Occident. Traylor's West has become East and his East West to new races of pioneers. Quite recently a new literature has sprung up; a record of the peoples who have left the known trials of Europe for the vague blessings of America; and of how they have fared here. Two striking examples of this literature are before us at the moment. Both are plainly documentary in character, though cast in the form of fiction. Both are stories of Jewish immigrants and of what the New World does for and to them. They have little else in common. "Rebels" is a vigorous and straightforward narrative; "The Mask" is a lettered and sophisticated commentary on certain facts put in evidence. As its sub-title indicates, "Rebels" is not on the whole a document of extreme radicalism—thanks, as it appears, to the shocks of war. The story of Marie Ganz has, in substance, been repeatedly told in recent fiction. She is the daughter of a Galician Jew who has come to America to make a place for his wife and children. He plies his pushcart alone until he has saved enough to bring his family over to his wretched corner in the New York ghetto. There begins the long struggle with hunger, cold, and sickness, ignorance and the pitiless law. The white plague of the tenements presently carries off the father. Marie, the oldest child, must leave school to help her mother keep the family alive and the poor "home" intact. Eviction, the terror of the ghetto, is always menacing. Somehow they rub along. Marie grows up, makes friends among the young revolutionaries of the city. Their bitterness against want and against riches expresses itself in all ways from the preaching of the sober doctrines of the old Socialism to the open waving of the red flag of violence. Marie's initiation comes about through her personal experience in the sweat-shops of the East Side. From a leader of strikes she becomes an advocate of force. She tries to shoot the younger Rockefeller as a protest against the Colorado "atrocities," and against the capitalist system as a whole. Then comes the war. Her first impulse is to side with the pacifists and obstructionists, her former comrades. But her chief friend, her "pal," an educated man, turns her thoughts and her gratitude for the first time towards the land that has, after all, in some measure protected and developed her. She sees the larger issues involved, and joins her neighbors of the ghetto in their zealous enlistment in the cause of America and of the world. And, the war over, we see her preparing to "go back into the old fight to better the lives of our people, but there is to be no more violence, no more bitterness or hate." In this glowing mood of service and of good hope the narrative ends.

"The Mask" is of very different mould and temper. Our immigrant here is a Jew of the middle class. But he seeks America as an asylum after his "better days" are over. Chance and irony turn him towards the "City of Brotherly Love." There he finds no friendly hands outstretched; there, as elsewhere, is a ghetto in which his people may huddle at their risk. There is to be encountered a new poverty and a deeper squalor and fresh humiliation at the hands of a free people. Beyond free schooling for the children, there appears none of the boasted benefits of "the melting-pot." The family, and despite his outward Americanization, not least the boy, John Gombarov, remain unmelted and unassimilated. The boy, we gather (and here the veil of the autobiographer is carelessly worn), is, in the long run, by no means impressed with the superior culture or opportunities of "the new world." Much of the story is told by way of fragmentary reports of the conversations, or monologues, of the man whom years later this boy has become. He then lives in London, prefers London to all other cities, discourses eloquently of her perfections. She is "the chastely outlined queen, silver-girdled by the Thames, of the kingdom of creative chaos, beside whom Paris is an obviously beautiful woman, and New York a parvenu and a harlot." As for Philadelphia, she is "a dowdy housewife, who might be charming and respectable if she did not so neglect herself." John Gombarov, having had neither beauty nor loving kindness revealed to him in the "City of Brotherly Love," has willingly proceeded from her and from the America that contains her, to a richer civilization on his side of the seas. He has won wisdom from her: "But that," he says, "is because the experience came after my boyhood years in the Russian woods, and the contrast made America seem like a hell to me. Once you recognize your environment as hell, you can use that hell's fire to set your imagination aflame. Hell is always imagination. It was only this clash between the inner and the outer world which saved me. And in this clash the wood god triumphed over Pluto." So the wood god flutes it in a London restaurant, by the lips of one who has learned in America and elsewhere to wear "the mask." Gombarov's mask, "with its subtle contours of repose and irony," is, we gather, the best thing he has won from experience.

H. W. Boynton

War and Discipline

A Private in the Guards. By Stephen Graham. London: Macmillan & Company.

THIS book, the work of a well-known writer who served two years as a private in one of the most rigidly disciplined regiments of the British army, has fluttered the dovecotes of England not a little, provoking lively discussion in the press, the inevitable letters to the Times, and sundry questions in the House of Commons. The prevalent idea that Mr. Graham meant it as a deliberate attack on the British methods of military training is (we believe) quite mistaken. For the miracle of the book is that the supersensitive author seems to have convinced himself that the more or less "brutal" practices he describes are essential to the turning out of a good soldier. "The sterner the discipline, the better is the soldier, the better the army," is Mr. Graham's opening sentence. The attack, if it exists, is on war and militarism in themselves, not on what Mr. Graham conceives (erroneously, as we may hope) to be their inevitable concomitants. And it bears no mark of rancor.

Few readers of Mr. Graham's previous books would have been astonished if he had turned out a really conscientious C. O.; fewer still will find it strange that he was not among the volunteers in the early stages of the war. He says of himself he was "of a Christian temperament and more ready to be killed than to kill." As a sergeant put it: "You're too soft."

When, however, the call came to men of his age, he decided (doubtless after a soul-searching struggle) that he could take no step to evade the common lot of British manhood. He chose, too, to take his medicine in its bitterest form, joining the Scots Guards, supposed to be the most pitiless "factory" for breaking down the civilian and building him up again as a soldier. The training at "Little Sparta" (Caterham) had in severity probably no parallel short of Potsdam. He steadfastly refused all opportunities of a commission or even of a lance-corporal's stripe.

> An immense gulf seems to separate the man who wrote from the man who shoulders the rifle. It is as if he had died . . . and then been born again as a soldier. Each new man posted to the battalion is posted to the historical and spiritual inheritance of the battalion also . . . the spirit is born of many sufferings and endless patience.

It would almost seem as if Mr. Graham's career in the British army was really his first intimate contact with the ordinary man of the twentieth century. In his intercourse with his beloved Russian peasants he had certainly faced an extremity of physical discomfort that would have daunted most men; but all this happened in a mystical twilight borderland of primitive humanity where it was possible for the poet to walk, head erect, in a continuous atmosphere of haze and glamour. Among the "Jocks" he had to face the real thing. His fundamental antipathy to war led him (as it has led so many others) to deny the possibility of any fine shades in the methods of carrying it on, and so (by a natural step) to accept all the pitilessness of training as inevitable. His logic seems to be that war is so unspeakably horrible that horrible methods alone can make its instruments efficient. These "brutalities" he has probably tended uncon

(Continued on page 234)

CROCKER-WHEELER MOTORS

"Niagara's Rival for Dependable Power"

32 Years Behind Them!

The sturdiness of C-W motors is traditional. Under the severest conditions of service these motors have stood up unflinchingly and with the minimum of attention and repairs.

[signature]
President

Crocker-Wheeler Co.

Ampere, N. J.

New York
Boston
Syracuse
Chicago
Cleveland
Binghamton

Pittsburgh
Newark
New Haven
Philadelphia
Baltimore
San Francisco

TIFFANY & CO.

DIAMOND AND GEM MERCHANTS

PEARLS DIAMONDS JEWELRY
SILVERWARE WATCHES CLOCKS
CHINA AND STATIONERY

EFFICIENT SERVICE BY MAIL

FIFTH AVENUE & 37TH STREET
NEW YORK

E. P. DUTTON & CO.

SUGGEST THAT

"WHEN THE HOUNDS OF SPRING ARE ON WINTER'S TRACES"

YOU READ

W. H. HUDSON'S Books

Birds in Town and Village

In which is incorporated some of his earliest, most charming writing on the bird-life which has been his greatest interest. Through Devon lanes, into old London gardens, and Cornish villages, the reader follows the birds, with the most delightful of companions at his elbow, drawing for his entertainment upon a life-long and world-wide knowledge of birds.

Illustrated in colors from beautiful originals by E. J. Detmold, $4.00.

Far Away and Long Ago

Is an extraordinarily interesting record of the response of a finely sensitive spirit to the appeal of the fascinating life which he describes with such vivid color and reality. Strange, gaudy birds and butterflies, animals of the oddest types, and men of strange adventures figure in the every-day experiences through which he reveals himself simply and with rare sincerity.

With portrait, net, $2.50.

BY THE SAME AUTHOR

Idle Days in Patagonia. Illustrated, $1.75
The Purple Land. Introduction by T. Roosevelt, $1.75
A Crystal Age. Foreword by Clifford Smyth, $1.75

Obtainable at any bookstore, postage extra, or direct from

E. P. DUTTON & CO., 681 Fifth Ave., New York

(Continued from page 232)
sciously to exaggerate, taking (e. g.) a too literal and serious view of the "conventional" side of much of the vile language used in handling recruits. Perhaps, too, he misses some of its coarsely "humorous" intention. Mr. Graham's enthusiastic esprit de corps and almost naïve belief in the superiority of the Guards facilitate his acceptance of their extraordinarily ruthless system of training; but the success of other units, trained on milder and more modern lines, gives us some right to hope that this phenomenal severity is merely a bastion of outworn tradition. Records captured on the field show that (at least in one section and at one period) the Germans ranked a Territorial Division as their most formidable opponents, with Dominion and Kitchener formations in the second and third places. One would certainly like to believe that ultimate success was in large part due to the superiority of more humane and less mechanical treatment of the private soldier.

As a book this shows Mr. Graham at his best—perhaps as a sadder and a wiser man, who has added knowledge of the common world to his insight into the spiritual mysteries. The description of the Joy Dance at Marchiennes, the spiritual interpretation of military ritual, the characterization of the various N. C. O.'s, the march into Germany behind the pipers, are all pure delight. Americans will find many interesting references, chiefly complimentary, to the American members of the battalion. The author has, of course, much to say of the British officer, the verdict, on the whole, being favorable as to his gift of leadership and his cordial understanding with his men. He has no sympathy for the view that he is really less useful than the N. C. O. His remarks on the chaplains are also significant.

As might easily be guessed, Mr. Graham's anomalous position somewhat puzzled his chums. Some of his officers had read his books; he was entrusted with the preparation of the Battalion Records; he gave lectures; he was called out of the ranks to be presented to the King. One barrack friendship was based on the fact that the other man remembered waiting on Mr. Graham at a fashionable dinner. One day he sat at table beside an English princess; the next he was on sentry-go at Buckingham Palace, measuring his to-and-fro marching by repeating Gray's Elegy—two lines up and two lines back again.

Mr. Graham does not gloze over the horrors of war, and some of his incidents are gruesome indeed. There is no flavor of Kiplingesque rhetoric about him, but he can write that "no matter what blunders our leaders made, the common soldier always felt the Cause was good." He has no illusions as to where the real guilt lay; he does not belong to the six-of-one and half-a-dozen-of-the-other school. His account of how the British hate of the German melted away under the rays of peace is significant.

"How do you account for it?" I asked the sergeant. "If any hated the Germans more ruthlessly than others, it was you." "Well, I don't know; they just knock us off our Gawd-damned feet."

The first chapter, on Discipline, is a noble piece of English prose, well worthy of general reading. It is hardly fair to mutilate it by quotation, but this passage is characteristic:

If we had all understood Christianity as Tolstoy understood it, Germany would have won. If we had all been merely brave and gone out to fight moved by the Spirit, we should probably have lost. These facts we knew, and although the seeming defeat of the ideal might have been more glorious and even more serviceable to humanity as a whole than the prolonged conflict, we chose to fight Germany in Germany's way. . . . What our men of all ages, professions, and temperaments had to go through to become soldiers! And then how stern and choiceless the road to victory and death!

J. F. M.

The Run of the Shelves

SURVEYING the welter of the world, Professor Leacock says:

"This is a time such as there never was before. It represents a vast social transformation in which there is at stake, and may be lost, all that has been gained in the slow centuries of material progress and in which there may be achieved some part of all that has been dreamed in the age-long passion for social justice" (p 13).

The problem could hardly be more succinctly or correctly stated. What we call "Western civilization" has to find some way whereby it may contrive to retain the material fruits of the "industrial revolution" and at the same time establish a state of reasonable contentment on the part of the many stratified constituent parts of the industrial organization. Such a state of contentment can result only when it is founded upon a general recognition that the existing order corresponds to the dictates of "social justice." It is manifest that we are very far at present from entertaining any such idea concerning the "existing order"—therefore the problem is to discover wherein the "existing order" is wrong and wherein we are wrong in our ideas with regard to it. This is the subject of Mr. Leacock's book, "The Unsolved Riddle of Social Justice" (Lane).

We are to-day in a position somewhere between that of the "Manchester School" and that representing the Socialist idea. Professor Leacock rejects both the "Manchester School" and "Socialism" as exemplars of the ideal social order, the former because it has demonstrably worked badly, and the latter because it will not work. "On either side," he says, "is on the brink of an abyss. On one hand is the yawning gulf of social catastrophe represented by Socialism. On the other, the slower, but no less inevitable, disaster that would attend the continuation in its present form of the system under which we have lived. . . . Somewhere between the two lies such narrow safety as may be found" (p. 124). He sees certain things that should be done. The state must see that there is work for all who are able and willing to do it, and society must bear the burden of supporting the sick and the infirm. Recognizing the moral value of human personality, Professor Leacock rejects Malthusianism in all its forms and the extreme proposal of eugenics. He demands for every child born into the world equality of opportunity. The principle of the minimum wage follows logically upon that of a moral worth in personality, as does that of legislative regulation of labor hours. But "the chief immediate direction of social effort should be towards the attempt to give to every human being in childhood adequate food, clothing, education, and an opportunity in life. This will prove to be the beginning of many things." These words are the closing sentences of his book.

It is sound common sense doctrine that he preaches, and for that reason it will be popular with but few people in these days of emotional "thinking." The Bourbon will curse him for a "radical," the radical will bark "reactionary!" at him, the "scientific" person will scoff at his notions of "moral worth" in human personality. But, if the world does win through, it may very well be in some such way as that to which he points.

The latest number of the Paris semimonthly, the Mercure de France, offers further evidence of the solid way in which this interesting periodical, after a thirty years' struggle, has finally established itself in public favor, thanks chiefly to the fine business capacity of its editor, M. Alfred Vallette, who sacrificed his career as an independent writer in order to devote all his time and energy to the Mercure. Before 1914 each issue consisted of 224 pages, which were reduced to 192 during the war; but henceforth, beginning with the current number, there will be 288 pages. M. Vallette states that though the Mercure now offers the public about one-third more matter than its principal rivals in France, it will continue, in the future as in the past, to do this at a cheaper rate than these rivals.

New Issue

$2,400,000

The Cincinnati Gas & Electric Co.

Six Per Cent. Three-Year Secured Gold Notes

Dated December 1, 1919. Due December 1, 1922.

Redeemable at the option of the Company, as a whole or in part, at any time on thirty days' notice, at 101½ on or before December 1, 1920, at 101 on or before December 1, 1921, and at 100½ thereafter, plus accrued interest.

The following information is summarized from a letter signed by Mr. Charles D. Jones, President of the Company:

Property: The Cincinnati Gas & Electric Company owns the gas and electric generating and distributing systems supplying Cincinnati, Ohio, and a number of adjacent suburban communities. The company owns one of the largest and most modern electric generating stations in the United States, having a present installed capacity of 60,000 K. W. and ultimate capacity of 120,000 K. W. The Company is now installing and equipping a third unit of 30,000 K. W., which will give an installed capacity of 90,000 K. W.

Security: These notes will be secured by deposit of $3,000,000 of the Company's First and Refunding (now First) Mortgage 5% Gold Bonds, which in turn are secured by a first mortgage on substantially the entire properties of the Company.

Earnings: Income applicable to interest charges is equal to over three and one-quarter times the requirements on the total funded debt of the Company.

The Company has one of the longest dividend records of any corporation in the United States, having paid dividends of not less than 4% per annum for over 66 years. The present rate of 5% has been paid since 1910. The market value of the stock at present quotations is over $25,000,000.

We offer these notes, when, as and if issued, subject to approval of counsel.

Price 97½ and Interest

YIELDING 7%

J. & W. Seligman & Co. — 54 Wall Street, New York

A. B. Leach & Co., Inc. — 62 Cedar Street, New York

Unlocking the Great Lakes

THE problem of opening a thoroughfare from the Great Lakes to the sea is one that has appealed to the imagination of farsighted Americans and Canadians for several generations. It has, indeed, been partially solved by successive enlargements of the St. Lawrence, Welland, and Sault Ste. Marie canals, and the Erie canal and its branches, but the governing depth of the St. Lawrence canals is to-day only 14 feet, and of the Erie 12 feet, while the draught of modern lake freighters now exceeds 20 feet, and they are more than twice the length of most of the existing locks. The existing canals on the St. Lawrence, and between the lakes and the Hudson, are, in fact, only adapted to the smaller lake craft and barges.

At Sault Ste. Marie, the Poe lock, and what are known as the Third and Fourth locks, on the United States side, and the Canadian lock, have respectively lengths of 800 feet, 1,350 feet, 1,350 feet, and 900 feet, and depths of 22 feet, 24½ feet, 24½ feet and 22 feet. The channels in St. Mary's River have been excavated to 21 feet. The large lake vessels can, therefore, pass freely between Lake Superior, Lake Huron, and Lake Michigan, and improvements in the channels in the St. Clair River, Lake St. Clair, and the Detroit River, have also carried the deep waterway down to the foot of Lake Erie. Here Canada has at present a canal with 25 locks, each 270 feet long and with a depth of 14 feet, and is now building the Welland Ship Canal, which is to have 7 lift-locks each 800 feet long and 25 feet deep, with provision for increase to 30 feet. With the completion of this canal, the Great Lakes will be opened for large craft from the head of Lake Superior to the first rapids on the St. Lawrence.

There will then remain only the effective enlargement of the St. Lawrence canals, or the canalization of the river, to open a way for large lake craft or ocean-going vessels between Duluth and the Atlantic seaboard, the Canadian Government having already deepened the ship channel below Montreal to 30 feet, and work now being well advanced on a 35-foot channel.

At a public hearing before the International Joint Commission in the summer of 1918, the Canadian Solicitor General urged on behalf of his Government the desirability of the two neighboring countries uniting in a coöperative scheme of development of the Upper St. Lawrence in the interests of navigation and power, and shortly afterward two members of the Canadian Cabinet went to Washington to suggest similar action directly to the United States Government. Nothing was done at the time, probably because of the overwhelming demands of war emergency measures, but in March, 1919, Congress requested that the International Joint Commission should investigate the practicability and cost of creating a deep waterway for ocean-going ships between Lake Ontario and Montreal, and, after some negotiation between the two Governments, the whole problem has been now referred to the Commission. This body, as noted in a recent article in the Review, is composed of three Americans and three Canadians, and is charged, among other important duties, with the investigation of just such questions as this, more or less vitally affecting the interests of the people of the two countries.

Public sentiment toward the proposed development seems to be, on the whole, rather markedly favorable. It is, perhaps, obvious that this should be so in Canada, although the long-standing agitation for the development of an alternative route to Montreal from Georgian Bay by way of French River, Lake Nipissing, and the Ottawa River still has many warm advocates, and Western Canadians are somewhat loath to support any project that might interfere with the development of the Hudson Bay route; but one could not so readily anticipate a favorable verdict on the United States side of the boundary for a waterway which must necessarily find its outlet through foreign territory. The fact seems to be, however, that outside the State of New York, where public sentiment naturally views with a degree of suspicion any undertaking that might interfere with the success of the State's own water route to the sea, the feeling towards the proposed deep waterway is remarkably friendly. A very aggressive Association to support the project was organized some months ago under the name of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Tidewater Association, with headquarters at Duluth; it is said already to have the official endorsement of fourteen States: Illinois, Michigan, Ohio, Wisconsin, Indiana, Minnesota, Iowa, North Dakota, South Dakota, Montana, Wyoming, Idaho, Colorado, and Nebraska. A similar body has since been formed on the Canadian side under the name of the Canadian Deep Waterways and Power Association, with headquarters at Windsor, Ontario.

At the meeting of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress held in Washington in December the deep waterways scheme was discussed very fully from both the navigation and water-power standpoints, and Mr. A. T. Vogelsang, First Assistant Secretary of the Interior, devoting himself entirely to the latter point of view, brought together some extremely interesting and significant figures as to the incidental value of the waters of the Upper St. Lawrence when harnessed for the production of power.

It may be conveniently noted here that the reference to the Commission contemplates four different general schemes or methods of improvement: (a) by means of locks and navigation dams in the river, or, in other words, by canalizing the river; (b) by means of locks and side canals similar to the existing canals; (c) by a combination of the two preceding methods; and (d) by means of locks and power dams. The engineers appointed by the two Governments will

Stimulating New Books

Psychic Tendencies of Today
By Alfred S. Martin

A timely volume in which Dr. Martin frankly discusses the new psychic movements. $1.50 net

The Psychology of Nationality and Internationalism
By Walter B. Pillsbury

An unbiased presentation of the vital question of what adjustment can be made between nationality and internationalism.

Mercier, The Fighting Cardinal
By Charlotte Kellogg

The first historically accurate chronicle of Belgium's hero priest. $2.00 net

From Upton to the Meuse
By Capt. W. Kerr Rainsford

The authentic story of the famous 307th Infantry, with the true story of the "Lost Battalion." $2.00 net

Present Problems in Foreign Policy.
By David Jayne Hill

A bold authoritative review of present-day foreign affairs as they affect the interests of the United States. $1.50 net

Teachers' Pension Systems in the United States. By Paul Studensky

A detailed account of the growth of the movement for teachers' pensions in the United States. $3.00 net

At all Booksellers These are Appleton Books

D. APPLETON AND COMPANY, 35 W. 32nd St., NEW YORK

Another Letter

Winona, Minn.,
December 29, 1919.

THE REVIEW,
140 Nassau St.,
New York.

Gentlemen:—

We need such papers as this seems to be. It is sane and dignified. Refutes very logically some of the dangerous radical stuff that is printed.

Wishing you a prosperous and long career, I am

Truly yours,

* * * *

$5 a year

prepare plans and estimates for each of these alternative schemes, and, on the basis of their reports, supplemented by information obtained at public hearings and otherwise, the Commission will decide and report which of these schemes will be the most practicable, most economical and in the best interests of the people of the two countries.

As Mr. Vogelsang points out, the State of New York on one side and the Province of Ontario on the other are particularly interested in the possible development of power from the Upper St. Lawrence, while the other States bordering on the Great Lakes are more directly interested in the creation of a deep waterway which would enable ocean-going steamers to ply freely between lake ports and ocean ports.

To appreciate the probable importance of a deep waterway from the Great Lakes to the sea, it is necessary to have some idea of the phenomenal growth of commerce on the Great Lakes. In 1850 the entire volume of freight on the Great Lakes amounted to about 25,000 tons, carried by a handful of small-draught vessels. In 1916 there were 37,852 passages of vessels through the Detroit River, with a registered tonnage of over 76,000,000, carrying one hundred million tons of freight of an estimated value of something over $1,000,000,000. These totals were slightly reduced in 1917 and 1918, owing to causes arising out of the war, but there are already indications that they will be greatly exceeded within the next few years. What proportion of this enormous traffic, many times greater than that annually passing through the Suez Canal, would find its way to and from the seaboard by way of the St. Lawrence is a moot point on which there are very wide differences of opinion. But as a large percentage of both eastbound and westbound traffic is at present subject to transshipment at Buffalo and other ports on the lower lakes, there would seem to be more than sufficient traffic available for a route that would enable shipments to be made without breaking bulk to offset the cost of the proposed waterway.

L. J. B.

Books and the News

Mr. Wilson

FEW books are written about an American President which are not written by admirers. The opponents express themselves in speeches, in articles in newspapers or periodicals; the books are written by friends. The bound volumes about President Wilson fill about half a shelf in the average library, and probably there is not one which he would not read with pleasure. The same holds true of the larger number of volumes which have collected about Mr. Roosevelt. He was subjected to attack which for bitterness makes all that has ever been said about President Wilson sound like a symphony of praise, but only a trifle of it got between the covers of bound volumes. In two full shelves one may find only one or two insignificant volumes of abuse.

The following books about the President are all recent; many of them are by foreign writers. Campaign biographies, and the faithful press-agent work of Mr. Creel, are not mentioned:

H. Wilson Harris's "President Wilson" (Headley Bros., 1917) is a little out of date now, but it is interesting as an English commentary upon American politics, and as a biography which has been drawn upon by two or three other writers, English and European. A. Maurice Low can hardly be classed as a foreigner; his "Woodrow Wilson; an Interpretation" (Little, 1918) is a skillful defense of Mr. Wilson's foreign policy. A brief book, with one English view is William Archer's "The Peace President" (Holt, 1919). Daniel Halévy's "President Wilson" (Lane, 1919) has been translated from the French by Hugh Stokes. It represents a French opinion probably more favorable than that of the average European writer. A Swedish admirer, who responds to the religious appeal, is Lars P. Nelson, author of "President Wilson; The World's Peace-Maker" (Norstedt, Stockholm, 1919).

Two American books, both published in 1916, when an election was approaching, yet hardly to be called campaign biographies, are Henry J. Ford's "Woodrow Wilson; the Man and His Work" (Appleton, 1916) and Eugene C. Brooks' "Woodrow Wilson as President" (Row, Peterson, 1916). Of these, Professor Ford's is the more important; one of the best biographies published up to that time. Professor Brooks' is a fat volume, fortified with Mr. Wilson's speeches.

Professor George D. Herron wrote, in 1917, "Woodrow Wilson and the World's Peace" (Kennerley), a series of essays during the war, and, of course, without reference to the Peace Conference. Mr. Ray Stannard Baker, author of "What Wilson Did at Paris" (Doubleday, 1919) was formerly one of the writers whose method in approaching the President was to:

> Weave a circle round him thrice
> And close your eyes in holy dread.

But there is not so much of this in his present little sketch. He makes such statements as that the President consulted freely with his advisers, but he makes them calmly. It is the book of an idolator, but it is an interesting book.

EDMUND LESTER PEARSON

A Short History of Belgium

A FASCINATING STORY

It tells how Belgium became a nation and relates

Her Part In The Great War

Written by a Belgian historian LEON VAN DER ESSEN of the University of Louvain

If you would understand the reasons for the heroic part Belgium played in the world war, learn something of the history of this brave nation.

It was this glorious past that inspired the little Belgian army to fling itself against the might of all Germany. Red-blooded Americans will read this vivid narrative of Belgium's history with pleasure.

New, Enlarged Edition, $1.50; postpaid, $1.65

INTRODUCTION TO THE PEACE TREATIES

By ARTHUR PEARSON SCOTT, Assistant Professor of History, University of Chicago.

This book will give you an understanding of the causes, elements, and purposes of the negotiations during and after the great war. It is a comprehensive explanation of the Treaty of Peace—a book of vital importance to American citizens who are interested in their country's welfare. Ready in May.

$2.00; postpaid, $2.15

A SHORT HISTORY OF JAPAN. By ERNEST W. CLEMENT. New impression ready March 15.

$1.50; postpaid, $1.60

THE NEW ITALIAN SERIES

Edited by Ernest H. Wilkins. This is a new series for students of the language and literature. It consists of a grammar, a reader, and annotated editions of novels and plays.

A. FIRST ITALIAN BOOK. By ERNEST H WILKINS and RUDOLPH ALTROCCHI. 150 pages, 12mo. Ready August 1.
B. ITALIAN READER. By ERNEST H. WILKINS and RUDOLPH ALTROCCHI. 150 pages, 12mo. Ready September 15.
C. GIACOSA, TRISTI AMORI. By RUDOLPH ALTROCCHI and B. M. WOODBRIDGE. Ready May 15.

DO ANY OF THESE SUBJECTS INTEREST YOU?

- ☐ Economics
- ☐ Nature Study for Teaching Training Classes
- ☐ Correlated Mathematics for High-Schools and Junior Colleges
- ☐ The Study of Literature
- ☐ Biology
- ☐ Earth Science
- ☐ Physical Science
- ☐ Sociology
- ☐ Graded Lessons for Sunday School
- ☐ Religion and Theology

After checking the subjects that interest you, fill in and mail to

The University of Chicago Press
5786 Ellis Avenue
Chicago, Illinois

Name ....
Address ....
Occupation ....

The University of Chicago Press
5786 Ellis Avenue Chicago, Illinois

¶ What Theodore Roosevelt and the Kaiser talked about ten years ago is told in the Colonel's own words, in the March number of Scribner's Magazine. He calls the Kaiser "A curious combination of power, energy, egotism, and restless desire to do, and seem to do, things"; and adds, "there were many points in international morality where he and I were completely asunder." ¶ John Fox's last novel, "Erskine Dale—Pioneer," contains a remarkable horse race in this number. ¶ General Charles H. Sherrill recently visited Korea and Shantung. He says in the March Scribner's that the United States should try to see the Japanese point of view. ¶ Robert Louis Stevenson is portrayed sympathetically by his very old friend, Sir Sidney Colvin. ¶ The Turkish situation and Armenia are discussed by Major E. Alexander Powell. ¶ Professor Laughlin says that a change in the state of mind of the laboring man is necessary for a true solution of the Labor Problem. ¶ Judge Stafford has an eloquent plea for the college man in public service. ¶ A country governed by United States marines, Haiti, is pictured by Horace Ashton. ¶ The stories in the March number of Scribner's Magazine are by Leonard Wood, Jr. (a son of the General), Gordon Arthur Smith, and Ralph D. Paine, all vigorous, manly writers. ¶ Henry van Dyke in his third "Guide-Posts and Camp-Fires" in the March Scribner's discusses national and individual selfishness, with a preachment about the unseen Silent Partner. ¶ Distinguished writers deal with important subjects in all numbers of Scribner's Magazine.

THE REVIEW

Vol. 2, No. 44 New York, Saturday, March 13, 1920 FIFTEEN CENTS

Contents

Brief Comment 239

Editorial Articles:

"Idealism" at Its Worst 241

The Protest Against the Eighteenth Amendment 242

Fighting the Symptoms 243

What Has Come of "Blood and Iron" 244

Welfare or "Hell-fare"? 245

What Constitutes a Poem? 246

Bolshevism in Holland. By A. J. Barnouw 247

The Troubles of the "Politicians' Union." By Edward G. Lowry 248

Poetry:

On Record. By Richard Burton 249

Germany's Future Relations with Eastern Europe. By Dr. Paul Rohrbach 250

Organization in Scientific Research. By James Rowland Angell 251

Correspondence 253

Book Reviews:

Roosevelt's Imperishable Youth 255

All Sorts of Adams's 255

War-Time Reactions 257

Lessons from the Progress of Science 258

The Run of the Shelves 259

Of Woodpiles. By Robert P. Utter 260

Music:

The Birthday of the Infanta—D'Erlanger's "Aphrodite." By Charles Henry Meltzer 261

Drama:

Problem-Plays in New York. By O. W. Firkins 262

The Advertisees. By Weare Holbrook 264

Books and the News:

Turkey. By Edmund Lester Pearson 266

THE President's letter to Senator Hitchcock is interpreted on all sides as designed to make the treaty the paramount issue of the Presidential campaign. But there is only one way to make it the paramount issue. If Mr. Wilson were himself the candidate, he could unquestionably keep it in the foreground of people's thoughts. But even then it would not be the controlling factor in the election. It might be paramount among the declared issues, but there would be an issue that would transcend all those contained in any platform. That issue would be the reëlection of Mr. Wilson. We find it impossible to imagine a majority, or anything distantly approaching a majority, of the American people deliberately imposing upon themselves another four years of Wilsonian autocracy. The treaty issue can not be paramount without Wilson, because he alone can give it life; and it can not be paramount with him because he himself would overshadow it. He would carry it down to ignominious defeat, not because the people want to defeat it, but because they have had enough of him.

SENATOR JOHNSON seems to have a real grievance against the Minnesota primary law and its administration. The law permits the holding of a primary any time between the hours of 2 P. M. and 9 P. M., an arrangement amply elastic for almost any abuse which the secret purpose of machine politicians might devise. The Minnesota Republican State Committee has set the Presidential primary for the single hour from 7:30 to 8:30 P. M., March 15, with the gracious permission to county chairmen to extend the period an additional half hour. Senator Johnson's comment is, "In plain language this is no primary at all, but an endeavor by the organization in control to disfranchise the Republicans of Minnesota." The criticism in this case is just, but it does not follow that political juggling of this kind is altogether responsible for the poor results, so far, of the primary system. In fact, this very juggling of so much of our primary legislation is only another proof of that lack of intelligent popular interest in nominations without which no primary system can obviate the difficulty of getting the right sort of men into public office.

THERE are welcome signs that the American Legion is making an earnest effort to discover where it stands on the "bonus" question. Just as it was no solution of the matter last November to put it up to Congress to decide, so it is no solution of the matter now for Congress to say in effect, "The country is too poor to accommodate you just now, but later on, when we have a little more money to spend, you have only to apply again, and then see what we'll do for you!" The Legion must decide now whether it is out for itself (or, rather, whether it is going to allow itself to be dominated by an element which is out for all it can get for itself), or prepared wisely and energetically to strive for the realization of the fair promise which presided over its inception. Only if it clearly chooses the latter course will its organization be anything but a menace to the country. Already, it may be noticed, the chief priest of high protectionism in the House is of all people the most convinced that the "bonus"—the whole "bonus"—must and will be granted at once.

THERE is nothing like figures to give an air of finality to an argument, and nothing like figures to trip their own proponent up if not used with becoming care. We find the following sentence in last week's Nation, concerning the return of the railroads to private management:

> According to Mr. George P. Hampton, director of the Farmers' National Council, there must be an increase in freight rates of from 25 to 40 per cent., and that will result in an increase in the cost of living of about $200 a year per family.

Whether this $200 represents the figuring of the Nation or of Mr. Hampton, is a little uncertain, but the Nation apparently accepts it, in any case. Let us look at it: $200 per family means a total increase in living cost of about $5,000,000,000. Setting off one-third for extra profits taken by dealers on the score of increased freights, the freight carriers would have $3,333,000,000 left, in round numbers, or just about what the figures of the railroad administration give as the grand total of freight receipts for 1919. To make the Nation's figures fit into the actual facts of freight receipts, we must assume that for every dollar added in freight charges, there would be added a charge of about five dollars to the consumer. But what pleasure would there be in editing a journal of opinion, and upholding unlimited freedom of speech, if one were not free enough to make such an assumption as that?

IF strong measures against the Turks are justified by the recent massacres in Marash, there should never have been any question of leniency towards them. For the late outrages were only child's play compared to the wholesale extermination of more than half the Armenian people which was perpetrated during the war. This policy of fits and starts, determined by Turkish provocation and submission rather than by principles of international justice, is bound to defeat the ends which the Entente professes to have in view. The Turks, from long experience, know exactly how to steer their devious course against these intermittent blasts of western indignation. They will humbly submit and promise to mend their ways, well knowing how easy it is to placate a group of Powers which desire nothing better than to be placated, as each is afraid lest the problem how to dispose of Constantinople after the expulsion of the Sultan should lead to international friction more dangerous to the rest of Europe than any patched-up compromise with the Sublime Porte.

THE article by Dr. Paul Rohrbach which appears in this week's issue of the Review is valuable and illuminating, not only because it gives the German point of view, but because it sets forth a number of fundamental facts of the political and economic situation in Eastern Europe that can not be dodged, despite the unpleasant conclusions to which they point. Unerringly he tears the mask from the legend of the Greater Poland and shows how completely doomed to failure must be the efforts to build up a buffer state between Germany and Russia within the boundaries of the Poland of 1772. Such a state would contain elements of weakness of such a character that they would undoubtedly lead eventually to a Fourth Partition.

DR. ROHRBACH'S analysis of the present attitude of Russians toward Germany is undoubtedly accurate. On the other hand, his interpretation of certain other factors in the Russian situation shows some noteworthy misinformation. He exaggerates the proportion of non-Russian elements in the Russian Empire and the extent of their separatist nationalism. Especially is this the case with reference to the Ukraine. His conclusion that Great Russia, shorn of her border Provinces, will continue to exist as a sort of peasant republic seems to be the result rather of his desire than of a careful study of the history and psychology of the Russian people. In this matter, the writer falls into the all-too-common error of assuming to voice the sentiments of the inarticulate peasant masses. What is only too true is that the Balkanization of Eastern Europe has created a series of petty States which, while they may maintain the outward semblance of political independence, must, sooner or later, inevitably fall under the economic domination of Germany.

Recalling Dr. Rohrbach's profound studies of Russia, and the fact that he has in the past been one of the greatest exponents of German expansion, particularly in the East, one is led to inquire whether he is entirely candid in the statement of his belief that a Russia now broken up will not regain its unity and power. He can scarcely have recanted so quickly, and his present views can not be regarded apart from his well-known and frequently expressed opinions. Dr. Rohrbach knows better than anyone else that only a powerful Germany could overcome the natural forces making for cohesion in Russia. Finding herself incapable of achieving this dismemberment by force, does it not seem likely that Germany will attempt it by keeping alive the fires of dissension and separatism? The propagation of such ideas in the Allied countries, therefore, may not be wholly foreign to Dr. Rohrbach's purpose.

EXCELLENT progress has been made by the Woman's Roosevelt Memorial Association in the work of restoring, and opening to the public use, the Roosevelt birthplace at 28 East 20th Street, New York. The house, together with number 26, next door, has been purchased, and plans for making of the two a single monumental building which shall perpetuate the atmosphere of an unpretentious city home of the middle of the last century are well under way. Between the spacious Colonial mansion of George Washington and the pioneer cabin of Lincoln there is room in America for such a shrine as this; not a place for losing oneself in a reverent "O altitudo!"—Roosevelt himself would be the last to desire that—but a place amid whose books and portraits citizens of all ages may take heart of grace to search yet more deeply into what it means to be an American. Some money is still desired, to complete the work of restoration and to provide for maintenance. Opportunities for the country to purchase so much potential good for so little present cash are not many. Contributions may be sent to the Woman's Roosevelt Memorial Association, No. 1 East Fifty-seventh Street, New York.

AN interesting and novel suggestion in President Lowell's recent annual report was that of the inauguration of some system by which teachers at Harvard may be relieved of at least a part of their classroom duties, for a year or more, for the express purpose of preparing for publication the results of their special studies. He gives warning, however, in making the suggestion, that the number thus helped to write must be very limited, and that the humanly imperfect wisdom which is alone available for making selections is sure to result in many disappointments. Furthermore, resources are not limitless, and if departments insist on multiplying courses, relief from teaching in order to promote production will hardly be a possibility.

"Idealism" at its Worst

THERE is a great deal of fine sentiment in Mr. Wilson's letter to Senator Hitchcock. There is even a great deal of really moving language. But there is not a trace of recognition of the duty which is laid upon him by the situation that he actually confronts. Not one ray of light does the letter shed on the question whether our country and the world would be better off if the treaty were ratified in the only way in which it can be ratified, or if the treaty were rejected. And that is the only question which, as President of the United States in this month of March, 1920, he is called upon to decide.

The assertion is, indeed, made with an abundance of rhetorical emphasis that America would do better to keep out altogether than to go in with reservations. But on what kind of grounds does the assertion rest? There is not one of them that can stand a moment's calm examination. The President tells us, for instance, that he is compelled to act as he does because otherwise he "could not look the soldiers of our gallant armies in the face," since "it was to this cause [the cause of Article X!] they deemed hemselves devoted in a spirit of crusaders." Everybody knows that, so far as regards all but a minute fraction of our two million fighting boys, his is pure balderdash.

Take, again, what the President ays about the attitude of the Allied iations:

> It must not be forgotten, Senator, that this rticle constitutes a renunciation of wrong amition on the part of powerful nations with hom we were associated in the war. It is y no means certain that without this article ny such renunciation will take place.

Nobody proposes to cut out Article X, o far as "renunciation" is conerned. In so far as the Article proides that the members of the League hall respect the territorial integrity nd political independence of all its embers, no reservation that has een proposed in the Senate weakens e obligation in the least. It is only relation to the means to be used this country to preserve that ingrity and independence that the reservations are of any effect. If the Allied Powers are really on the watch to fly at one another's throats, as the President so strongly implies, and if their pledge to refrain from so doing is in itself worthless, the degree of protection afforded by a blanket promise that the United States will force them to desist—a promise which the President admits must depend for its performance upon the will of the American Congress at the time—must certainly be but a slender reliance. Our country's participation in the League—Article X, or no Article X, reservation or no reservation—would, in the nature of things, be a mighty factor in averting such evils; but if it were not so in the nature of things, it would not be made so by the presence or absence of a phrase.

Mr. Wilson says that, with Article X weakened, the League of Nations "might be hardly more than a futile scrap of paper, as ineffective in operation as the agreement between Belgium and Germany which the Germans violated in 1914." Surely this is a most unfortunate parallel. It was not owing to any defect in the wording of the treaty guaranteeing the neutrality of Belgium that that document became "a futile scrap of paper." If the League is not backed by the spirit of the nations that compose it, the letter of the Covenant will be quite impotent to make it a potent reality.

The President is not content with failing to say a single word calculated to illuminate the subject, or to clear up the practical difficulties of the situation that confronts him. He hits right and left at real and imaginary enemies. He tells us that "every imperialistic influence in Europe was hostile to the embodiment of Article X in the Covenant of the League of Nations." This will be news to at least the majority of the American public. In Mr. Ray Stannard Baker's panegyric on "What Wilson Did at Paris," a little book chiefly devoted to showing the difficulties which the President overcame, we find nothing about opposition to Article X. Was England opposed to it? Was France? Did either of these countries, or any of their statesmen, entertain so desperate a longing to snatch territory from their fellow members of the League that for the sake of the opportunity to do so they wished to refuse the protection of their own territories which Article X undertook to provide?

Coming nearer home, Mr. Wilson indulges not only in a peculiarly contemptuous characterization of reservationists in general, but, towards the end of his letter, takes pains to make an especially vicious dab at the mild reservationists. "I can not understand," he says, "the difference between a nullifier and a mild nullifier." Such is the recognition which he gives to a group of men who have labored in season and out of season to save the treaty with as little impairment as possible. Both from the standpoint of intellectual merit and from that of a respect for the decencies of human relations, there is in this short and easy dismissal of the mild reservationists a strong reminder of the President's recent behavior toward Secretary Lansing.

The President does not absolutely declare that he will reject the treaty if the Senate ratifies it with reservations that are not to his liking. He comes as near that as possible without actually saying it. It is conceivable that the letter is a last desperate effort to preserve Article X without serious reservation, and that having made this effort the President will, if the treaty comes before him, still regard the question open. This seems extremely improbable; yet it is not absolutely out of the question. If the Democratic Senators could rise to the height of their duty, they would do what they think is right and let the President shoulder the responsibility for the final fate of the treaty. We earnestly hope that this may yet happen, improbable as it seems. If it does, Mr. Wilson will be confronted with one of the most awful responsibilities that any man has ever faced. May that love of righteousness, and that lofty sense of duty, which he constantly protests so solemnly, protect him, not against the wickedness of the outside world, but against the promptings of his own arrogant self-sufficiency!

The Protest Against the Eighteenth Amendment

THE protest against national prohibition by Constitutional Amendment has begun to assume large dimensions. The first important sign of it was the Ohio election in November. Shortly after this came Rhode Island's manful and impressive assertion of the fundamental principles of our Federal Government. Governor Edwards' aggressive campaign, vigorously followed up after his installation in office, next attracted the attention of the country. In his message to the New York Legislature at the beginning of this year, Governor Smith gave a leading place to his proposal of a State referendum on the subject. The town elections in Vermont and Massachusetts last week showed, as many town elections in New England had done in November, the existence of a strong sentiment of dissent from the prohibition régime. And finally there comes the prospective inquiry at Albany into the methods of the Anti-Saloon League, which bids fair to focus the attention of the nation upon an aspect of the story which may not unreasonably be accounted as important as any.

To the Review these signs that the nation is awakening to the seriousness of the issue, even if too late for any immediate practical result, are extremely welcome. In one of the first editorials that appeared in this journal, we gave expression to our sense of the injury that had been done to the Constitution of the United States, and to the whole spirit of American institutions and American life, by the adoption of the Eighteenth Amendment. It may not be amiss to quote here one short passage from that editorial:

> Unlike many of our State Constitutions, the Constitution of the United States has hitherto been the embodiment only of those things which are essential either to the marking out of the structure of our Government or to the preservation of fundamental human rights. Such an instrument can command, and throughout our history has commanded, the loyal devotion of a great people. It is inconceivable that this feeling could have been built up for a document which undertook to impose upon the people in permanency—to withdraw from the operation of the ordinary processes of majority rule—specific statutes undertaking to control the daily lives of a hundred million people scattered over the expanse of a continent. As much as one provision can do to lower the standing of the Constitution of the United States, the Eighteenth Amendment has done. If there were nothing else to be said against it, this alone would be an objection whose gravity can hardly be overestimated.

When Rhode Island entered her suit before the Supreme Court we felt that, even if her action accomplished no juristic result, it would do "an important service in at least showing the country that the Eighteenth Amendment was not being accepted without serious protest." To our mind the most distressing feature of the whole story of that amendment was the manner in which it was put through—the country standing idly by, as if this were routine legislation, instead of the most vital change in the character of our institutions since their formation, and one which only a few years ago every normal American would have seen to be wholly repugnant to their spirit. In connection with Rhode Island's protest we said:

> Not since the formation of the Union has so gross an injury been done to the character of American institutions. For the injury has been threefold. It has struck a blow at the very life of the idea of State autonomy in State affairs, and has made easy the path of every agitation that may arise in the future for the concentration at Washington of power over any matter of local concern which the itch for regulation may seize upon as its next victim. It has swept away whatever was left of authority in the idea of the liberty of the individual to lead his own life in his own way, subject to respect for the right of others to do likewise. And last but not least, it has immeasurably lowered the standing of the Constitution of the United States by imbedding into its substance a mere police regulation, and entrenching it behind those safeguards which were designed for the preservation of the nation and the protection of the essentials of liberty.

Some very good people say that it is wrong to protest. The amendment having been adopted by Congress and the requisite number of States, they urge, it ought to be quietly accepted by all good citizens. To the testing of its validity by the Supreme Court, they of course do not seriously object; but beyond that, they insist, nothing should be done. In so far as these objections relate to any unlawful practices we entirely agree with the objectors. But vigorously to subject to every lawful test the validity of the amendment and of the laws enacted for its enforcement, we consider to be not only the right, but the duty, of those whose convictions are like ours. Nor is that all. The principles themselves of which the amendment is a violation should be asserted and reasserted on every legitimate occasion. It is a misfortune to the country that this issue should be injected into our national politics at all; but the blame for that misfortune rests upon those who, in their fanatical pursuit of a single object, were regardless of all other considerations, and upon those who either through thoughtlessness or through supineness allowed them to have their way.

Many opponents of the Eighteenth Amendment have laid chief stress upon the claim that it is not approved by a majority of the American people. This is a point which, so far as we can remember, the Review has never so much as mentioned, and certainly one upon which it has laid no stress. Much might be said of the way in which Congress, and Legislature after Legislature, has acted upon this great question. In a large number of instances members voting in the affirmative have reflected neither their own convictions nor any mandate from their constituents. But that is not the main point. It matters not whether fifty-one millions or forty-nine millions of the people of the United States are opposed to drink We should consider it just as wrong for fifty-one millions as for forty nine millions to impose upon th whole people of the United States and to imbed into their organic law this iron rule.

If we are to remain a free peopl the majority must instinctively fe that there are some things which has no right to impose upon th minority. There have unquestionabl been times when a majority of th voters of this country have felt, could with a little agitation have bee made to feel, that the Catholic Chur was a terrible danger to the natio Of those who have been of this mi a large proportion have been po sessed with the conviction that t Catholic Church was profoundly i imical not only to the temporal but the eternal welfare of the people. No anti-Catholic movement, however—though there have been many of them—has made great headway. The First Amendment to the United States Constitution, the amendment protecting religious freedom, was a recognition at once of the possibility of such attempted proscription and of its wrongfulness; but it would be a mistake to suppose that our chief protection from such evils has been in the written injunction against them. It has lain in the instincts and traditions of the people themselves. But, such as it is, the protection of the First Amendment will, as our experience with the enactment of the Eighteenth has shown, be swept away easily enough by any great tide of popular prejudice, real or factitious, if we lose our sense of the rightfulness of those restraints which the majority should gladly and of its own free will respect.

There is one more aspect of the case upon which it is important to speak at this particular juncture. The investigation of the Anti-Saloon League at Albany may amount to much or little; it may clear the League of the specific accusations made against it, or it may confirm them. All this remains to be seen. But everybody knows that, whatever the precise character of the methods pursued by the League, their effect has been intimidation, moral and political, on a grand scale. Its agents, and especially the most conspicuous of them, William H. Anderson, have constantly flaunted in the faces of those who opposed, or those who hesitated, the power of the churches as being the foundation of the power of the League. Anderson himself has acted and spoken like a ruffian. He has not disguised the terrorist character of his tactics. It was not upon persuasion of the minds of legislators, but upon the threat of evil consequences to themselves that he chiefly relied for the attainment of his end. Unless the good people of the churches, for whom he has professed to be spokesman, believe in the doctrine that the end justifies the means, or unless they are blind to the moral degradation which submission to such threats involves, they can not, in so far as he has truly had their backing, absolve themselves from the guilt of having helped to bring about what they regard as a good end by abhorrent means.

It is not the first time that good people—the good, religious people of a whole country—have done such a thing. An infinitely more intense religious fervor swept all England into a frantic agitation of which the leader was an infinitely worse terrorist. Between the zeal of the prohibition campaign and the frenzy of the "Popish plot" crusade there is only the resemblance that there is between a headache and a raging fever. Between the terrorism of Anderson and the bloodthirsty criminality of Oates there is only the resemblance that there is between a misdemeanor and a frightful crime. But all of Protestant England was swept into the tide of the Popish plot madness. Those who think that the Eighteenth Amendment must infallibly be right because all the "good people" are for it, would do well to think of the error into which the good people of England fell, with far greater unanimity, in the days of the Popish Plot and Titus Oates.

Fighting the Symptoms

The proposed statute that will make hoarding unlawful is aimed to prevent the withholding from the market of necessary foodstuffs and also the destruction of food when the purpose of destruction is to enhance the price or restrict the supply.

THIS sentence from a special message sent by Governor Smith to the New York Legislature is typical of a great deal of the well-intentioned but futile effort that has been made for many months to bring down prices, or "the cost of living." With the last part of it no fault can be found. The destruction of food for the purpose of enhancing its price is a practice which, in so far as it may exist on a large scale, it would be perfectly proper for the law to repress. That it does exist on a large scale we have seen no trustworthy evidence; but this is simply a question of fact. On the other hand, the idea that "hoarding" should be made unlawful rests on an error of principle. There are, indeed, some kinds of hoarding which it may be to the public interest to forbid; but ordinary hoarding of foodstuffs, by persons whose business it is either to produce or to buy them for the purpose of selling at a profit, is a process which it is to the public interest to permit to take its own course.

There are two types of hoarding, extreme opposites of each other, which may constitute a serious public evil. Where there is monopolistic control, or an approach to it, the withholding of supplies from the market may be so managed as to give to the manipulators an extortionate profit which could not otherwise be obtained. This evil, in so far as it exists, should be attacked through the means which the law provides for the prevention or the curbing of monopolies. At the other extreme there is the possibility of hoarding for private use, a practice which may conceivably result in the withholding from consumption, at a time of real or supposed scarcity, of large supplies when nothing in the condition or prospects of the market justifies such withholding. When there is reason to fear that such a thing will happen on a sufficient scale to be of serious public concern, regulations like those which from time to time have been adopted in regard to the sale of sugar to consumers are desirable and efficacious.

But it is to neither of these extremes that the agitation against hoarding is usually directed. It is aimed simply at hoarding as such; and it is not only useless, but positively injurious. The man who withholds supplies from the market at a given time because his trained judgment leads him to believe that the price of the commodity in question will be higher at a future time, as a natural result of the free play of supply and demand, is doing not an injury but a service to the public. If his calculation is correct, he will make his profit by selling what he has withheld, at a price higher indeed than he could have got in the first instance, but lower than the price which, had he not previously withheld a portion of the supply, would have prevailed in the market at the time of still greater scarcity when he makes his sale. In the case of perishable commodities, it is true, the consideration of actual destruction of them comes in and may justify special measures. But this must be regarded as the exception and not as the general rule. Judging from the newspaper summary of the bill to which Governor Smith refers, that particular bill appears to be carefully drawn, and not in violation of the principle we have laid down; but many bills, and many administrative acts, have ignored that principle, and popular opinion is in line with Governor Smith's apparent belief that it is a good thing simply to "make hoarding unlawful" and to "prevent the withholding from the market of necessary foodstuffs." It is much safer for the public to take the chances of injury from the miscalculations of professionals who, if they hoard unnecessarily, do so at their peril, than from the mistakes of legislators who by a cast-iron rule prevent hoarding which may be eminently desirable.

The great source of relief to which we must look, in all those matters that press most heavily upon us in these days of high cost of living, is the increase of supply, the increase of production. To strike at the symptom when and where we see it may afford a relief to our feelings, but it does nothing toward effecting a cure. On the contrary, it is very apt to aggravate the disease. The attempt to fix the price of milk is a conspicuous instance of this vain endeavor to get rid of the trouble by fighting the symptoms. If the distributers are charging extortionate rates under cover of monopolistic control of the field, something ought to be done about that; but, though the subject has been up for years in the State of New York, and though every opportunity has been given for exposing the facts, it has not yet been shown that the profits of the distributers constitute any considerable percentage of the price that consumers have to pay for milk. Recently the attack has turned largely toward the farmer producers; but here, too, the corresponding facts, at least so far as public knowledge is concerned, are conspicuously absent. Simply to decree lower prices, without any assurance that the requisite amount of milk is going to be produced and delivered at those prices, is to scratch the scab in the hope of healing the wound.

The same kind of thing has been going on in regard to the housing situation. It is all right to prevent sharp practices by which individual landlords, or go-betweens, take advantage of the ignorance, or the exceptional difficulties, of particular tenants; no doubt many individual cases of injustice and hardship have been thus prevented or relieved. But as a means of lowering rents in general, profiteer-hunting is worse than useless. If the supply of housing continues to be short of the demand at existing prices, landlords will get higher prices, because there will be thousands of people willing and able to pay them. And in the meanwhile, such encouragement as there may be to builders—speculators, if you will—in the existing high rents is seriously diminished by every threat of repressive measures, and even by the odium which the constant cry of "profiteer" places upon them. There is another injury, too, perhaps quite as important. There are possibilities of improving the housing situation—not by penalizing profits, but by diminishing expenses. The emergency quite justifies special exemptions from tax burdens for all new projects of housing for the poor and for people of moderate means. But legislative proposals of this nature fail to receive the attention which they ought to get, because of the diversion of interest to futile schemes and to idle denunciation. When you stray off on a false track you are not merely as badly off as if you had stood still, you are much worse off. For the time and energy which you have been spending on this aimless wandering might, if properly employed, have got you at least somewhat nearer to the goal toward which you had fondly imagined yourself to be tending.

What Has Come of "Blood and Iron"

REPRESENTATIVES of the Schleswig and Holstein organizations, together with members of various political parties, proclaimed on March 2 the emancipation of Schleswig-Holstein from Prussia and the establishment of a new State. This is an interesting piece of news, affording an object lesson in political history. No matter whether this declaration of independence takes effect or not, the fact that a large group of representative citizens of the old Elbe Duchies have voiced a desire to sever their connection with Prussia is in itself important enough to call for comment. The action of these men proclaims to the world that Bismarck's immoral policy of "blood and iron" can not build lasting empires.

The possession of Schleswig-Hol stein was for Prussia of vital impor tance, as it would give her control o the coast and of the harbor of Kiel the only one which could be made int a maritime base for the Prussian flee which Bismarck was planning t build. A long and patiently con ducted policy of intermittent intrigu negotiation, and armed force led t the coveted result. The Austro-Pru sian war with Denmark was the fir move in this skilfully conducted can paign. Bismarck's ally did not i tend to fight the Danes "pour le R de Prusse"; Austria posed as a cha pion of outraged German rights, a hoped to add a new member to t "Bund." On August 1, 1864, t King of Denmark ceded all his righ to the Duchies of Holstein and Schl wig to the Austrian Emperor and t King of Prussia. By the treaty f Gastein, of the following year, H stein was placed under Austri Schleswig under Prussian rule, t Kiel, with Friedrichsort, was pro sionally ceded to Prussia as a ma time station. Bismarck never loo d upon this treaty as a permanent t tlement. But he waited for a pre t to substitute Prussian rule for e newly established condominium. is was given him by Austria it f, which on June 1, 1867, publish a declaration to the effect that it wished to let the "Bund" decide the future status of the two Duchies. Bismarck denounced this as a breach of the treaty of Gastein, which consequently had ceased to have any binding force on Prussia. He ordered Prussian troops to march into Holstein. The Austrian forces of occupation retreated without giving battle, thus leaving the King of Prussia sole and absolute master in both Duchies. Prussian despotism asserted itself at once: the convocation of the Holstein States at Itzehoe was repealed, all political societies were disbanded, several papers suspended.

With iron alone Bismarck, this time, had achieved his end. But streams of blood were to be spilt in the impending war with Austria, which was, indirectly, the outcome of Prussia's act of usurpation. And now, after sixty years of Prussian rule, after having shared for half a century in the greatness and the glory of Bismarck's Prussia, the people of the two Duchies appear to be still so little devoted to the usurper as to wish for a severance from the kingdom.

Welfare or "Hell-fare"?

CERTAIN activities of the Goodyear Rubber Company for the welfare of its employees were described by a correspondent in the Review last week. This is but one of the many instances in which manufacturing concerns have deemed it wise to devote large sums of money and the energy of trained and well-paid officials to work of this kind. The movement is not new in its fundamental character, but it has reached an extent and a systematization hitherto unknown. It has been warmly approved by public opinion, but the more radical labor leaders question its motives, hold it up to ridicule, and endeavor to turn against it the laboring men who, with their wives and children, receive its benefits. Parodying the name by which it is commonly known, they have maliciously characterized it as "hell-fare work," and even Samuel Gompers has publicly repeated the jibe.

In the case of Mr. Gompers, let us hope that this was no more than a momentary lapse of judgment under the stress of the steel strike. Those who launched the epithet, however, had a more logical reason for their attitude. Having in view, not such an improvement in wages and conditions of work as will make the workman prosperous and contented, but a fundamental revolution eliminating the private ownership and management of productive industries altogether, they judge of "welfare work" only as it tends to promote or retard the overturn of existing institutions. If it were found to inculcate a discontented and revolutionary state of mind, their attitude at heart would be that of welcome, though good strategy would forbid them to say so. The fact that it meets with their disapproval is a tribute to its success.

In establishments where such work has been intelligently and liberally carried on, with sincere effort at genuine coöperation with employees in selection of activities to be undertaken and in management, laborers are more prosperous and contented, strikes or friction of any kind is less frequent, and agitators from without or within are at a discount. This normally means an improvement in quantity and quality of the average output per unit of labor, an avoidance of the loss occasioned by strikes, and, therefore, a return to the company of at least a considerable portion of the cost—in some cases probably a net financial profit of considerable importance. But the agitator seizes upon this fact to arouse prejudice against the work as mere selfishness, as though it were not permissible for the employer to benefit his employees except at the cost of actual loss to himself.

Another line of attack is that this work is paid for out of the workman's wages, and to the detriment of his right to seek his welfare in his own way. But the laborer can have this freedom at any moment, by giving up his position and taking employment with some company by which no welfare system is maintained. Incidentally, he will discover in making the transfer that wages average no higher in industries which spend no money on welfare work. The criticism, however, comes almost wholly from the outside. We have yet to learn of a case in which the employees of any great industry carrying on a well-managed work of this kind have met together and said to the management: "Sell your welfare buildings and equipment, close your athletic fields and parks and children's playgrounds, abolish your savings bureau with its attendant bonuses to persistent depositors, drop your assistance to would-be home owners, dismiss your physicians and nurses, and in place of it all divide pro rata among us in wages the same proportion of the cost as we now get out of the income of the plant exclusive of this work."

At bottom, such work is simply one of the ways of creating conditions favorable to a profitable operation of the plant. An ill-adjusted workman and an ill-adjusted piece of machinery are alike harmful to such operation, and time and money spent in better adjustment are as rational in the one case as in the other. The human as well as the mechanical side is always present, and the most skillful technical care of the latter can not bring the best results if the social, moral, and economic welfare of the former are going awry. It need not be argued that on the human side the problems of the manager are more delicate, the opportunities for harm through tactlessness and lack of understanding more numerous. Welfare work is not wholly a matter of altruism, as we have already shown; but though it must be made in general to pay its own way, the highest success will be attained only by a management which shows a genuinely sympathetic spirit. Modern thought is recognizing more and more the inherent difference between a man and a machine, and the growth of attention to the personal welfare of employees is one of the most evident marks of that recognition. It is a movement that merits hearty encouragement from all except those who find in its tendency to promote stability and contentment in industrial circles a stumbling-block to their plans for revolution.

What Constitutes a Poem?

CRITICS of the past have striven for a satisfactory definition of poetry, by stating the positive ingredients which it must contain. But the literary market-place has continually refuted them by paying good money for "poems" minus any one, or all, of the qualities enumerated in these proffered definitions. In this day of anti-everything which involves a must, either in literature or in life, the idea has arisen of getting at the matter the other way round, by eliminating the various qualities which are not necessary, thus arriving at the irreducible minimum. Rhyme, of course, was never a sine qua non, though if used at all, a certain degree of regularity has been considered necessary. Even this must no longer holds, as witness any number of our newest poets, skipping from vers libre to verse in the ankle-fetters of rhyme from one line to the next.

Of course, the very term, "vers libre," implies the kicking out of metrical regularity; but it may creep in again at any crevice of line, page, or poem, and a passage that might have fallen in faultless cadence from the lips of Tennyson himself may suddenly tumble you off, in the middle of a sentence, upon a declivity of vocal jags and crevasses in comparison with which "bumping the bumps" at Coney Island is a nerve-soothing recreation. Martial borrowed the germ of this trick from the Greeks, in his occasional Latin scazontics, or stumblers; but he kindly trips you up only once to the line, and after the second or third fall you foresee the danger and brace yourself, like the circus girl in the heels-over-head automobile stunt. The most you can claim now for metrical regularity as a poetic ingredient is that a sample now and then, dropped in with a carefully guarded air of insouciance, is not necessarily fatal to a poet's reputation.

Has length of line any vital relation to poetry? A variation of from eight to twelve syllables did not suggest either rejection or revision of a "sonnet" offered a year or two ago to so careful a periodical as Art and Archaeology; and the free sonneteering spirit of our great Mexican border State, we were assured not long since by a student of poetic tendencies among the Texans, has even cut the wires of the fourteen-line barrier. If the inspiration of boundless cow-pastures swells the outburst to nineteen lines, or a sudden raid of Villista bandits cuts it short at nine, who has the authority to tell the free American citizen that it is any the less a sonnet for either reason? As to length of line in general, Walt Whitman long ago pushed its possibilities out into regions where only an Einstein may safely range, while at the opposite extreme, the very High Priestess of the temple of Twentieth Century muses has shown that the one word Damn, with the aid of an exclamation point, will fill all requirements. We are forced to the conclusion, then, that with the modern poet length of line, as well as the regulation or non-regulation of its vocal ups and downs, is as wholly at the discretion or non-discretion of the individual writer as the cut or non-cut, the dress or un-dress, of his or her hair or beard. Even capital letters at the beginning of lines, sentences, and proper names are non-requisites, as the Dial, in its new and exclusive devotion to art and letters, proceeds to show by example, though the same authority shows that the capital is not to be despised merely as such, by allowing it to head a few harmless prepositions in the procession.

We say "procession" with some misgiving, for the word may be taken as implying that the author intends the reader to begin at the physical beginning of these particular poems and read through in regular order to the physical end, an assumption possibly altogether too conventional. We had almost said that this order in reading would enable one to get at the thought of the poems better, but this would imply that thought is a necessity in poetry. Now the whole campaign of the most modern modernists has had the primary object of clearing away every barrier that may hamper the freedom of the poetic impulse. But the requirement of genuine thought has always been a far more hampering restraint on poetic impulse than any of those mere conventionalities of form to which the boot-toe of the modernist has been so vigorously and successfully applied. Are we then to sacrifice the fruits of victory already in our grasp by leaving poetic Hohenzollernism in possession of its one really powerful stronghold, the requirement that poetry must (odious, imperialistic word!) really mean something? No, must me no musts!

And so the attempt to get at the essential substance of poetry through definition by elimination finally breaks down, just as did the earlier efforts to define it by positive characteristics. We may be sure of no more, perhaps, than that a poem is some undefinable thing (thanks to the language-builders for the non-committal vagueness of that word thing!) which its author can sell on Mount Vernon Street, Boston, or West Thirteenth Street, New York, or somewhere between. We had almost called it "an aggregation of words," rather than a "thing," but the haunting suspicion arises that the one-syllable line already quoted in full in a previous paragraph might, under suitable conditions of modern poetic inspiration, become an entire poem in itself. If poetry shall follow such a course as this, there will be a manifest conservation of ink and paper, but it will be necessary to work out some scheme of pecuniary compensation by emotional intensity rather than by linear measure.

THE REVIEW
A weekly journal of political and general discussion
Published by
THE NATIONAL WEEKLY CORPORATION
140 Nassau Street, New York
FABIAN FRANKLIN, President
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER, Treasurer

Subscription price, five dollars a year in advance. Fifteen cents a copy. Foreign postage, one dollar extra; Canadian postage, fifty cents extra. Foreign subscriptions may be sent to Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons, Ltd., 24, Bedford St., Strand, London, W. C. 2, England.
Copyright, 1920, in the United States of America
Editors
FABIAN FRANKLIN
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER
Associate Editors
HARRY MORGAN AYRES O. W. FIRKINS
A. J. BARNOUW W. H. JOHNSON
JEROME LANDFIELD

Bolshevism in Holland

According to recent despatches from Holland, the Netherland Government is enforcing a rigid control of the frontiers so as to prevent the intrusion of Bolshevist agitators from Germany. The unrest in the country must be pretty serious if the authorities have recourse to preventive measures of suppression, as political tradition in Holland is opposed to official discrimination between native and alien, and between desirable and undesirable foreigners. Even during the war, when there was reason for the Government to be on its guard against the intrigues of foreign spies and agents, free access to the country was subject only to a few limitations of simple formality, and no protests from watchful citizens in the border districts, alarmed at the traffic that was allowed to go on, could avail against the rooted aversion of the authorities to rigid interference with the liberty of interstate communication.

This extremely liberal conception of the duty of hospitality was frightfully abused by Russian and German refugees and deserters. In return for the safety and shelter which Holland afforded them, they sowed discord and discontent among the natives. Even the man at the head of the bureau for relief to Russian prisoners of war in Germany, whom the Government allowed to export large quantities of foodstuffs which the Dutch themselves were badly in need of, was, early this year, placed under police control, being strongly suspected of abetting secret Bolshevist propaganda. However, this agitation by foreigners would have been of little avail to the cause of communism in Holland, if they had not found a soil already fertilized for the cultivation of Trotskian doctrines. The gravest danger to the country's recuperation from the unsettled war conditions and its undisturbed economic development is not the alien but the native agitator, who speaks to the worker in his own tongue and with a thorough knowledge of the country.

First among these is Mr. David Wijnkoop, an Amsterdam Jew of a fiery, impetuous temperament, a great orator with a strong hold on the masses. He is the Dutch counterpart of his Russian comrade Trotsky, whom he resembles even in outward appearance, and a faithful henchman of his Moscow alter ego in the spreading of the latter's international propaganda. Before the war he was, as a politician, the laughingstock of the country, the butt of jocose criticism whenever he formulated his absurd demands on behalf of a negligible flock of followers. But the war, with its privations and unemployment, was the making of Mr. Wijnkoop. He is a political war profiteer. In Amsterdam, always a hotbed of radicalism, he carried it over his opponent of the Social Democratic Labor Party at the July elections of 1918, and with him two other Communist leaders were preferred by the electorate for a seat in the Second Chamber.

Here they were given a platform from which they could address the entire nation, as their parliamentary speeches—and they are among the most voluble orators—are faithfully reported by the daily press. The three together form an isolated group in Parliament. They profess to despise the legislative body of which they are members, and abuse their high office to denounce that capitalistic system under whose liberal rule they have obtained the right to expound their doctrine in Parliament. Their criticism being exclusively destructive, they contribute nothing to the legislative work of the House. But their presence there has, indirectly, a fatal effect upon its proceedings: some Social Democratic Labor members, afraid lest Mr. David Wijnkoop should take the wind out of their sails, are tempted to outbid him in revolutionary demands, Mr. Troelstra, the leader, being the chief advocate of this competitive policy. Wijnkoop, with his sarcastic sallies against his irritable rival, ridiculing his inconsistent, half-hearted adherence to the teachings of Marx, knows exactly how to exasperate the other into the formulation of demands which go far beyond what more moderate labor leaders, such as Schaper and Albarda, recognize as the legitimate maximum.

But the floor of the Second Chamber is not the only platform from which the Communists can address all classes of society. The Church is also open to their propaganda. The Reverend Schermerhorn, Minister of the Dutch Reformed Community in Nieuweniedorp, the centre of a prosperous agricultural district north of Amsterdam, is an ardent believer in the tenets of Bolshevism. He is a powerful preacher and attracts many a churchgoer who, though averse to his doctrine, wishes to listen to his eloquence. "Take as much liberty as you can get" is one of his maxims, and portraits of the revolutionary "dominee" with these words underneath are circulated among his admirers. When last year the Amsterdam police came upon the track of a gang of bomb manufacturers and munition smugglers, they found this portrait as a wall decoration in the criminals' den. The preacher, of course, had nothing to do with these militant anarchists, but the incident shows what close affinity there is between unrestrained idealism and crime.

More balanced minds than the fiery pulpiteer are the two scientists who, by their membership on the Executive Board of the Communist Party, lend an academic dignity to its doctrine. They are Dr. Pannekoek, a distinguished astronomer, and Dr. Mannoury, professor of mathematics in the Municipal University of Amsterdam. The support which Communism receives from these two prominent intellectuals may have a deeper and wider influence than the sermons of the Reverend Schermerhorn. Though they may carefully abstain from bringing propaganda into the lecture room, the fact of their approving the Communist doctrines can not fail to impress the susceptible minds of young admiring pupils. And as these, at the completion of their studies, are scattered all over the country, the ideas of their masters are imperceptibly spread among the intellectual milieus of even the smallest towns.

Still, the Government would make itself unpopular if it deemed this a reason for depriving them of their chairs and the university of their learning. The present conservative Cabinet, apparently alarmed at the spread of Communist thought, took just recently an exceptional step to prevent the promotion of one of these Communist professors. Dr. Pannekoek had been proposed by the trustees of Leiden University for appointment to the vacant chair of astronomy in that city, and the Government by refusing to appoint him on the ground of his political convictions exposed itself to severe criticism by the entire Left of the Second Chamber and the principal organs of the liberal press. The Amsterdam Handelsblad, a paper which has never betrayed any leanings towards Socialism, declared itself in agreement with Dr. Van Ravesteyn, one of the three Communist members of Parliament, in asserting that, generally speaking, in the appointment of educational functionaries, political or religious considerations should have no weight. There might be some reason for deviating from this general principle in the case of a vacancy in the department of law or economics, where the appointee is expected to teach a doctrine and ideas to which a Communist candidate is confessedly opposed, but no such consideration could be valid in the case of Dr. Pannekoek. The heavens are his field of research, and his claim to distinction in that domain of science can not be impaired by whatever radical views he may hold concerning sublunary affairs. Freedom of thought and speech is dear to the nation, and it will uphold it even when that freedom must be granted to those who aim at the overthrow of its established institutions. Because of native impatience and distrust of control, the people are apprehensive of greater danger resulting from the abuse of the power to suppress such freedom than from the abuse of the freedom itself.

Into this league of the politician, the preacher, and the pedagogue for the establishment of the communistic state enters, as a fourth ally, the poet, the greatest among the living poets of Holland. Mrs. Henriette Roland Holst will live in the people's memory when the names of her male co-militants shall have passed into oblivion, and her poetry is the monument by which posterity will be reminded of a revolutionary phase in the nation's peaceful history. She has written other things than verse, propaganda literature for the enlightenment of the masses, a history of revolutionary action, a biography of Rousseau. But poetry is her true domain.

If Communism can be justified in the eyes of the intellectual élite of Holland, it is as the source of inspiration for the most powerful verse of modern Dutch literature. She is a past master in moulding her vigorous thought into plastic language. In her latest volume of verse, "Verzonken Grenzen" (Submerged Bounds), she has surpassed all her previous work. The disillusion of modern man and the promise of a better world are her theme. Between the dream and the deed our lives are divided. Dreams can not lift the world to a higher plane, and when we are active the beauty of the dream vanishes. There is no escape from this disillusionment except by the self-sacrifice of love, the only deed by which the dream can be realized.

> Blessed the man who goes to the sacrifice,
> In him dream and deed are reborn into one.

Man must dare to die for the dream of the communistic millennium, go through the ordeal of bloodshed and revolution, that the next generation may live united by a common love, in which all the barriers that hatred now raises between man and man shall be submerged. It is the symbolism of the Gospel translated into terms of latter-day Communism. Instead of the One Man who died on the cross, it is the holocaust on the barricades that must bring peace on earth and good will among men.

A. J. Barnouw

The Troubles of th "Politicians' Union"

THE present demoralization of all gov ernmental activities at Washingto makes a situation that lends itself t moralizing. Even before Mr. Wilson s peremptorily sacked Mr. Lansing th pace of routine administration was slo enough and efficiency was at low eb The President's flare-up will not quicke or hearten those who remain. No Cab net officer or other underling will dar except in the most chastened and ci cumspect way, attend to any affairs c state that require initiative and ente prise. So it befalls that this harbo and refuge and centre of politicians i given over to discussion of politics.

The game of politics, like the game c chess, while intricate and susceptible c many variations, is governed by fixe and ancient rules and conventions. A Persian chess master having no languag but his own, and no contact or aquaint ance or understanding or even fain knowledge of the western world, coul yet come to Washington, Georgia, an there in the shade and repose and peac of that fine old town meet and play th local expert in the perfect ease and se curity of a meeting on thoroughly know ground. With the chessmen arrange between them the players would kno without a spoken word or any othe channel of communication what to d next. The Georgia villager might soo find himself in closer mental communio with the Persian than with any of hi neighbors.

Politicians among us are set apar like that. Many of them, a great many too many of them, follow the game fo a livelihood. They become professional in their engrossing vocation. Politics i the only game that has no penalties o suspension or disbarment for fouls an unfair practices. There are no rule against gouging and biting and scratch ing and hitting below the belt. Me seek to rise, to attain temporary ag grandizement and office, to overcom their opponents by any guile or subter fuge. In their old age they are embit tered and their lives are ashes in thei mouths. Their days of activity are spen in the vain pursuit of illusions and no in solid achievement. In the end the are "lame ducks" who must be "take care of," or if they fall out of the gam inopportunely when their old cronie and associates are not in power, they g back where they came from and "re sume the practice of law."

Their daily life is one of appallin transitions. On one day it takes thre or four messengers to conduct them i proper state from the entrance of the offices to their desks and relieve the of hat and coat. To see the great man appointments have to be made well in advance through a reluctant secretary, and the time of audience is restricted. It may be that the next time you see him he will be hanging precariously on the rear platform of a street car and oh! so eager to talk about anything and as long as you like. The heavy curse that hangs over the "ins" is that sooner or later they will be "outs," and the one hope that sustains the "outs" and prevents them from giving way to despair and going to work to earn a living is that presently a turn of the wheel will bring them "in."

As a chronicler of the Washington scene, my days were spent seeking out the notables and being besought by the ex-notables. One favorite device for "getting one's name in the papers" in other days when the President's office was a centre of activity was to come to Washington in the off-season while Congress was not in session and pay a visit to the White House "to confer" with the Executive on this, that, or the other thing that was uppermost in people's minds. It was a cheap and sure way to get the news back home. "Conferring with the President" is one of the oldest sure-fire tricks of the trade. It has virtually fallen into disuse at this juncture.

Being what they are, and permeated with the instinct for their guild, the politicians resent the intrusion of amateurs and persons with new ideas and new plans. They hate anything new like the very devil. They can not cope with it. They like established and familiar issues such as the tariff. They like to deal with other professionals. They disliked intensely the prohibition contests in the States a few years back, because "you never can tell which way the darn thing is going to cut." State fights between the "wets" and the "drys" spoiled the alignment of the more or less docile electorate. The professionals always more or less distrusted Roosevelt and Hughes, and Wilson, too, when he first emerged. What the politician always wants to know of any new man who is brought forward "to pander to the moral sense of the community" is whether he will "recognize the organization." It is the same instinct and motive that leads to a demand on employers for a recognition of the union. The politicians are strongly unionized. I am indebted to Mr. William Bayard Hale, who is, perhaps, not now remembered as one of the earliest "authorized" biographers of Woodrow Wilson, for an account of the scene when the question of "recognition" was first put to the emerging President of Princeton:

On Tuesday, July 12, 1910, a number of gentlemen gathered in a private room of the Bankers' Club, 120 Broadway, New York, to inquire of Mr. Wilson whether he would allow his name to be presented to the New Jersey Democratic State Convention. At that meeting were present Robert S. Hudspeth, national committeeman for New Jersey; James R. Nugent, State chairman; Eugene F. Kinkead, Congressman; Richard V. Lindabury, George Harvey, and Milan Ross. But one practical inquiry was made of Mr. Wilson; it was voiced by Mr. Hudspeth and was in substance this:

"Doctor Wilson, there have been some political reformers who, after they have been elected to office as candidates of one party or the other, have shut the door in the face of the Organization leaders, refusing even to listen to them. Is it your idea that a Governor must refuse to acknowledge his party organization?"

"Not at all," Mr. Wilson replied. "I have always been a believer in party organizations. If I were elected Governor I should be very glad to consult with the leaders of the Democratic Organization. I should refuse to listen to no man, but I should be especially glad to hear and duly consider the suggestions of the leaders of my party. If, on my own independent investigation, I found that recommendations for appointment made to me by the Organization leaders named the best possible men, I should naturally prefer, other things being equal, to appoint them, as the men pointed out by the combined counsels of the party."

Such fluid, changing times as these daze the politicians. They don't know what to do. Particularly they are at a loss to meet the projection of such figures as Hiram Johnson and Herbert Hoover into the scene. Johnson knows the conventions of the political game but will never abide by them. He doesn't consort or league himself with professional politicians. He does not number himself among them, nor do they claim him. He has been in politics and in office since 1910, not because but in spite of the politicians. He has been getting himself elected by going directly and in person to the voters in his own State and telling them what he would do if given power. When elected he has kept his promise and done what he said he would do. Now he is offering himself for the Presidency on the same terms without the aid or through the offices of any "organization." The managers of his party do not want him. They can't, as they put it, "do business" with Johnson. They think they have him headed off, for as they say, "He may have the votes but he hasn't got the delegates." They mean that politicians must nominate Presidents before voters can elect them.

But the horrid fear and spectre that makes the politicians so nervous and jumpy these days is that the voters may insist on nominating as well as electing a President. That is why the projection of Mr. Hoover is so baffling and bewildering. They can't make head or tail of the posture in which he has put himself. They dislike him because they fear him, and they fear him because they can't understand him. Not for a minute do they believe Hoover is not a candidate. The more frequently he repeats that he is not seeking the nomination the surer they become that he is putting over some new "deep stuff." And it is both pathetic and amusing to see them nosing about trying to find "Hoover's press bureau." They are sure that he has one concealed somewhere about these precincts where "sentiment" is being manufactured for him. They can't understand why any man should be talked about for the Presidency, as Hoover is being talked about, unless he is actively fomenting the whole movement. The Lowden boom, the Wood boom, the Harding boom, the Palmer boom, the Cox boom, they can understand. In each case there is clearly visible and apparent all the apparatus—the press agent, the managers, the Western headquarters, the Eastern headquarters—in fine, the candidate's organization. The whole apparition is familiar to the politicians. It's the sort of thing they understand. But they can not understand why such diverse journals and channels of public opinion as the Saturday Evening Post, the New Republic, the Review, the World, the Springfield Republican, and Life should all at once be found saying in various ways appreciative, friendly things about Hoover, unless Hoover has some dark, mysterious underground organization applying pressure and stimulating sentiment. That all of these editors should have come separately to the belief that Hoover is worth serious consideration for the Presidency simply on his record of accomplishment and his character and capacities, as they have been revealed since 1914, passes their understanding. The politicians won't nominate Hoover unless they have to, but they can be made to name him if the pressure of public sentiment is strong enough.

The wary, timorous, stupid creatures will do in the end, as they always do, whatever aroused opinion demands of them. Meanwhile they talk politics and con over the stale chicane of their ancient and outworn subterfuges. Washington is dull and flat, and they make it duller and flatter.

EDWARD G. LOWRY

Poetry

On Record

I WOULD not hand a baby face,
Smooth and unscarred, to God on high,
And say: "Hereon You will find no trace
Of living, now I come to die."

No, battered up and down the ways,
I give Him back this proof of me;
Record of keen, tumultuous days,
Life's scars, for man or God to see!

RICHARD BURTON

Germany's Future Relations with Eastern Europe

AFTER the collapse and dissolution of the Russian Empire, the Entente Powers found themselves faced by the problem of how they could create a new system of forces which might act as a check on a reviving Germany. Having once recovered from her enormous losses, Germany would, in the long run, derive great advantage from the fact that her immediate neighbor in the east was no longer a great power of the first order. The Entente policy naturally demanded, as a substitute for this loss, that Poland should be made as strong as possible. If, however, the Polish State remained limited to the ethnographic boundaries of its nationality, it would only be a secondary Power, little more important than Rumania. The Entente requires a strong Poland, and to that end German territories must be added to it in the west, Ukrainian land in the south, and a white Russian area in the east, so that the size of Poland should be doubled and her population increased by fifty per cent. beyond the extent ethnographically justified. If the present Polish claims were to be satisfied, the future Poland would contain seventeen to eighteen million Poles, two million Germans, six to seven million Ukrainians, several millions of white Russians, an indefinite number of Lithuanians, and four to five million Jews.

The aggrandizement of Poland, however, though an end in itself, is part also of a larger scheme, the exclusion of Germany from Eastern Europe by the formation of a barrier of Germanophobe States running from the Baltic to the Adriatic and the Black Seas. France and England are at one in supporting this policy, but they are actuated by different motives: England hopes thereby to exclude Germany from the Russian market, France to prevent a political alliance between Russians and Germans which might jeopardize the Entente's victory.

The Entente policy with regard to Russia is handicapped by a general ignorance of conditions in Eastern Europe. A better knowledge would have saved its statesmen from the mistake of believing it possible that Russia, barring the recognition of an independent Poland and Finland, could be restored in its entirety under a democratized Tsarist Government. The attempt to bring this about by supporting the military campaigns of Kolchak, Denikin, and Yudenich was doomed to failure from the outset. It was based on two fundamentally wrong assumptions, one being that the dismemberment of Russia into its component nationalities could be undone again, the other that a democratized Tsarist rule would be welcome to the bulk of the Russian nation and even to the alien nationalities. Not until the new East-European States have become established on a firm and lasting foundation will people in West-European countries and the United States cease to believe that Russia ever was an internally unified realm. The Russian world empire has always carefully concealed the fact that Eastern Europe was populated by a great variety of nations and tribes, of which the great Russians or Muscovites formed only 47 per cent. Fifty-three per cent. of the inhabitants of Tsarist Russia were not of Great Russian stock. The most important of these alien peoples, the Finns, the Esthonians, the Letts, the Lithuanians, the Poles, the Ukrainians, the Georgians, the Armenians, have realized their craving for a national independence, and it seems a psychological and political impossibility that they should ever voluntarily be reunited with Moscow. And to coerce them into a reunion by violence is not in the power of Soviet Russia.

The alleged loyalty of the bulk of the Russian peoples to Tsarism has not stood the test of the late anti-Bolshevik campaigns. The failure of Kolchak and Denikin was largely due to the people's refusal to support them. In the rear of both armies followed the landowners whom the peasants had expelled, and demanded restitution of their land, their cattle, and everything the peasants had robbed them of. When Denikin penetrated into the Ukraine he was at first hailed by the peasants as a deliverer from Bolshevist requisitions, but when the returning landowners claimed not only the value of the poultry stolen two or three years before but also the value of the eggs which the hens were reckoned to have laid during that time, the peasants began to realize that Denikin brought no change for the better. The expelled landowners in the Ukraine were Great Russians, who had been in possession of the land ever since the Ukraine was forcibly brought under the rule of Moscow; so a national element added strength to the agrarian and social motives counteracting Denikin's enterprise. The peasants know that the chief issue is the land problem and that a success of the Tsarist generals would have meant a restoration of the landed gentry, and a return to the old social order. To that old order they are bitterly hostile. It is a grave mistake to expect loyalty to the Tsar from the Russian peasants. Nicholas II and his Ministers, believing in their loyalty, granted the peasantry the right to vote when they drafted an electoral system for the first Duma in 1905. The result was a Duma with a radical majority of peasant deputies elected on a platform in which the chief plank was the surrender of all land in Russia to the peasants, if possible, without any compensation.

As to the chief aspects, therefore, of the future of Eastern Europe there can be little doubt: (1) The dissolution of the old Russian Empire will be permanent, and attempts to restore it by force, though they might have a short-lived success, will only tend to establish the new order on a firmer basis; (2) the largest of the future East-European States, Great Russia or Moscow, will most probably assume the status of a peasant democracy. It is less easy to make a forecast as to the duration of Bolshevist rule. It can hardly be permanent, as it is the dictatorship of a minority, and even of a small minority. Eighty per cent. of the Great Russian population are peasants, and these will have nothing to do with Bolshevism. Soviet Russia consists, as it were, of two separate areas, a Bolshevist one, which is limited to the large cities and the control of the railways, and an agrarian one, which has relapsed into the most primitive economic conditions, without manufactures, even almost without iron. A dozen sewing needles, the only iron implement the peasant absolutely needs, can not be bought for less than a hundred rubles. Of the middle classes in the cities little is left, as part of them have emigrated and the rest have become pauperized and decimated by diseases and starvation.

In nearly all parts of the former Russian Empire the Entente is very unpopular. Especially towards France the people's feelings are bitterly hostile, and the English are feared and distrusted. It is generally believed that the Entente is responsible for Russia's downfall. Among the better educated elements of the Russian masses the idea of a union with Germany is very popular, not a political or military union for an aggressive policy of revenge, but an economic and cultural alliance. The Russians have come to realize that the gulf between their own mentality and that of the western peoples can never be bridged, and that, in spite of their aversion to the Germans, which was very pronounced before the war, they have more in common with them than with any other European nation. Before the war the Russians used to complain that their country was being exploited by Germany by means of an extorted commercial treaty. But now one can hear them say that the British and French schemes with regard to Russia are worse than exploitation and amount to downright plunder. It is no secret in Russia that the British Board of Trade has recommended a plan for a general State insurance of all goods to be exported to Russia. The English manufacturer naturally distrusts the uncertain condition of affairs in Russia, and objects to his bearing the risk of the export. This insurance scheme, it is thought in Russia, is meant to act as a check on future German competition. The Russian officers who belonged to the former army of Colonel Avalov-Bermondt, who made the abortive attempt to enlist 20,000 German soldiers for his projected march against Moscow, say quite openly that the Entente did not permit the Germans to join Avalov's forces for two reasons, England being afraid lest that military campaign should open a Russian-German trade route, and France foreseeing the growth of a Russian-German alliance out of this joint armed action. Both apprehensions have no real foundations, as far as Germany is concerned. Both the people and the Government in Germany are too passive to conceive such far-reaching political schemes. But this Russian talk is significant of the prevailing feelings among the Russians, and helps one to understand the anger of the French Colonel who, according to a dispatch from a Swedish journalist, had an interview with one of Avalov's officers, in which he bitterly complained of the Russian people who, he said, seemed to know only one feeling, that of hatred against France.

Germany's future position in Eastern Europe, therefore, will not be decided by any definite schemes now on foot, but by the existing facts, both political and ethnographical, and by the prevailing sentiments of the Russian people. Not even Poland will probably be able to persist economically in her hostile attitude towards Germany. The intensity of national contrasts in Poland and the peculiarities of the Polish character will soon create a very unsettled state of affairs in that country. Poland as it has been set up by the Entente will never form a stable element in the future East-European system. With the Czecho-slovak State, in spite of the resentment felt among Germans on account of three millions of their countrymen being forced into Czechoslovak citizenship, Germany must also, sooner or later, enter into close economic relations. The Czechs are on three sides surrounded by German territory, through Germany they must keep in touch with the rest of the world, the German language is for them the medium by which they acquire their knowledge of western culture. Neither can Hungary and Jugoslavia exist permanently without economic and cultural relations with Germany. Their history and geographical position preclude a lasting estrangement. In the Hungarian and Slav territories of the former Dual Monarchy German has for centuries been a second vernacular; it is too firmly established to be suddenly and arbitrarily replaced by another language. Neither Eastern Middle Europe nor Eastern Europe proper is able to exist without a close relationship to Germany, to German commerce, to German industries, to German intellect. The attempt to make English-French interests and culture prevail in those parts is doomed to failure for the simple reason that the East European peoples will never take to them. It is a common error to think that French is the favorite foreign language of the Russians. It was that only among court circles and the aristocracy. When the Russian businessman, the scholar, the official learned a foreign language, it was, in four out of five cases, German. Before the war Russians loved to pretend that they knew no German, but they understood it quite well all the same. In the days of German militarism much harm was done to German interests in Russia by German "Schroffheit" and "Schneidigkeit." But these are ill manners of the past. A change also in the German mentality will help to open up a peaceful way towards the East.

Dr. Paul Rohrbach

Berlin, January 7

Organization in Scientific Research

"ORGANIZE research? Why you might as well try to organize the production of poetry, or sculpture, or painting! It can't be done, and if it could, it oughtn't to be!" Thus spoke a very clever and intelligent friend of mine, whose opinions tend strongly toward the indicative and imperative moods, with only the rarest sprinkling of subjunctives. And I suspect that his opinion, while ludicrously untrue as to the facts, is shared by many of our intelligentsia to whom research is identified with the occasional epoch-making discovery which they visualize to themselves as the inspiration of some solitary genius. The mere term "organization" smacks to them of repression and coercion, suggests the strait-jacket and the boss, and other unpleasant things well known to be hostile to initiative and individuality. But let us consider the situation.

Merely to satisfy one's instinct of pugnacity, it would be gratifying to take up the gauntlet cast down by my dogmatic friend, and to note how many great works of plastic art have in a fair sense been made to order. Even the poet laureate has been known to rise to an occasion requiring celebration in verse. But time fails to pursue this trail, and, moreover, the completeness of the analogy of research with creative art may be called in question. At all events, it is for us to come at once to grips with scientific research and the conditions of its effective prosecution.

As a noted botanist says: "Science has thus far progressed by purely guerilla modes of warfare. It is time that it organized and conducted its campaign as intelligently as do other human interests." If one thinks of such organization as implying a director-general of research who doles out to each individual his particular job in the programme, then undoubtedly the result would be disastrous. Intrinsic intellectual interest would inevitably be slighted and snubbed, enthusiasm and energy would be sapped, and in place of vigorous and fruitful endeavor we should have a process of purely mechanical time-marking. But, fortunately, there are quite other methods of securing the desired end which avoid most, if not all, of these difficulties.

Let us suppose that a group of the leading men in a given field of science get together and survey the most urgent needs or the most promising possibilities in their own line of work; suppose they outline a general inclusive programme of research which affords opportunity to pursue the most varied interests, and still to knit them all into one central project; suppose, finally, that invitations be issued to a group of competent scientists to participate in such a programme. There is nowhere any coercion, no one takes part who does not desire so to do, and no one suffers under any restrictions save those of his own imposing. But the result of such a coöperative undertaking is inevitably more inclusive in the breadth and thoroughness of its achievement than the wholly uncoördinated efforts of the same group. Nor is this assertion a matter of mere opinion. It was proved to be true over and over again in the war, and in other nations as well as among ourselves. Such methods speed up research, and produce far more symmetrical and conclusive results. This is one of the things which the National Research Council, representing as it does in its membership all the great scientific societies of the country, is successfully undertaking. It involves simply a voluntary programme of scientific men for enlarging, energizing, and expediting their own productivity, with a consequent gain for society as well as for science.

But let us return a moment to my friend and his conception of research as something wholly esoteric, individualistic, and inspired.

No doubt there are individualists in science, as in art, and even in business—men who make personal contacts with difficulty or not at all. Some of these men are geniuses, but most are not. They are simply folk who have to make their human contribution, large or small, as it may be, in their own peculiar way. They must be largely neglected in any coöperative programme. But it would be a gross perversion of the historical facts to assume that all the seriously useful contributors to science, even all the geniuses, are of this type. Quite the contrary is the case. And moreover, the natural sciences have for several generations been at the point where they could advantageously employ in their advancement research capacities extending all the way from that of a Newton or Darwin down to the freshest tyro with the ink not yet dry on his doctor's degree. Organization is the clue, and the only clue, to securing some approach to a full-interest return on the intellectual capital represented by these very diverse abilities. In a well-conceived general programme of research, place can be found for even mediocre ability, which, if left to itself, is certain, for the most part, to be sterile. As a matter of fact, much of the best research in the great scientific laboratories has emanated from the planning of the master at the head, who throughout a long period of years, perhaps, guides and directs the research of his disciples with the result that knowledge of the highest value accrues from the integrated work of men, many of whom if left unguided would have produced little or nothing and even that of an accidental and incidental character, sustaining no significant relations to the main currents of scientific progress.

One should not be confused in thinking of this situation by assuming that such coöperative research as we have been discussing need tend toward purely practical issues. The direction which such investigation takes rests on wholly other considerations. Scientists may in a given instance decide that for the moment the most urgent need is research in a field of applied science. But they well know and fully appreciate that only in pure science are the revolutionary discoveries to be made, and that no one can predict in advance whence such a discovery may come nor what its implications may be. A discovery in the physiology of the organic cell may revolutionize the conceptions of physics and chemistry. There need, therefore, be no fear that if scientists work in more intimate contact with one another than heretofore they will, in consequence, tend to neglect the interests of pure science.

Still more convincing as to the needs and possibilities of organization in scientific research are considerations regarding the problems set by society and the conditions of modern life. Many of the most important issues confronting the contemporary community inevitably involve for their solution the coöperation of scientists in quite distinct fields. Illustrations without number will suggest themselves. For example, sewage disposal is in part a problem for the sanitary engineer, in part for the chemist, in part for the bacteriologist, in part for the expert in soil fertilizers or in the industrial utilization of end products. No one individual is or can be a competent investigator in all these directions. The problem of improvement in fuels and their use is similarly in part a question of geology, in part one of chemistry, in part one of engineering, to say nothing of the economic aspects of the issue. Public health questions generally involve the bacteriologist, the hygienist, the epidemiologist, the chemist, the engineer, etc. These are not fictitious illustrations. They are drawn from actual practice, and exhibit some of the simpler, rather than some of the more complicated, requirements. Often the State or the city calls together such a group to study its own special practical problems, but no agency has hitherto attempted to assume any general leadership in securing coöperative attack upon the underlying fundamental scientific issues in such problems without regard to any immediate practical exigencies. Here again, the National Research Council is offering its services and bringing together, by the voluntary action of representatives of our leading scientific societies, groups of competent investigators to attack such problems. If left to the accidents of individual initiative, they are likely to be indefinitely postponed, and just because they involve so wide a range of scientific interests. Obvious are the opportunities for coöperation among State and Federal scientific agencies, among the great private research institutions and the like.

A very conspicuous field of coöperative endeavor in applied science is met in the case of the smaller industries. The great industrial corporation can afford its own research laboratories, and many have such. But the small producer can not afford such a luxury. There is, however, no reason why he should not join with other firms in his line of work and establish conjointly a central research laboratory, to the support of which each contributes; or if that form of procedure be impracticable, these groups may employ scientific men working in their own laboratories to undertake such research as is required. Plans of these types have already gained headway both in England and in the United States, and the National Research Council is giving such aid as it can.

By no means the least important aspect of the whole case is the producing of trained personnel for research. Broadly speaking, the universities are the only agencies from which such personnel is now derived. Moreover, they serve a double function in producing the larger part of the research in pure science at the same time that they train research personnel. It is well understood, and requires no further emphasis, how extensively many of these institutions have been raided by business and industry as an aftermath of the war, in which it was suddenly discovered that the occasional college professor has a tangible economic value. But it is impossible to exaggerate the disaster which will overtake our entire national programme in science, if there be not prompt steps taken to attract and retain for the academic profession a fair share of men of the highest ability.

Quite apart, however, from this matter is the problem of securing a more rational distribution of research facilities. As matters now stand, the larger universities tend to expand into every field of research with relatively little regard to the conditions in other institutions. The temptation is to make each institution a university in a somewhat literal sense. Now, it requires only the most superficial knowledge of the conditions in science to recognize that some forms of research are eminently appropriate in one institution and grotesquely inappropriate in others. One would be hard put to it to justify the development of marine engineering in a region hundreds of miles removed from any navigable water; and with several large medical schools in a community of moderate size, the establishment of another could hardly be viewed as judicious. Nevertheless, this is exactly the sort of thing which has been going on, and which will go on indefinitely unless our university authorities get together and arrive at some kind of gentleman's agreement, if it be nothing more formal, which will prevent the dissipation of financial and scientific energy represented by the present practices.

It is absurd to have every university attempt unlimited varieties of research work. The wastage in material equipment is unjustified, and it is quite impossible in this generation at least to secure the necessary calibre in the scientific men needed to provide so many institutions with competent directors of research and trainers of fresh personnel in every department of science. There must be coöperation and organization here if wholly unwarranted wastage and inefficiency are to be avoided.

All things considered, therefore, we may safely conclude that research can be organized in ways which exercise only beneficial influences on initiative, that without such organization our science will remain in the condition of mediæval industry, that by improving the methods already employed the boundaries of knowledge may be pushed forward with unprecedented rapidity, and finally, that for the solution of certain types of problems, organization is wholly indispensable.

For the realization of such ends, the National Research Council was created. It has just received a very generous endowment, which will allow it in perpetuity to carry forward and develop the efforts it has already initiated to provide such a mobilization of research talent as may best contribute to the welfare of the nation in times of peace, and be ready at a moment's notice for the nation's defense in time of peril.

JAMES ROWLAND ANGELL
Chairman, National Research Council

Correspondence

Mr. Lansing's Statutory Rights

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

Let me congratulate you on your editorial on the Lansing incident. In all the discussion of this question, it seems to be assumed that the President has complete power over his so-called Cabinet officers. It seems to be the general impression that, as the President nominates the head of a department and can remove him at pleasure, he is peculiarly the instrumentality of the Executive and that his rights and obligations are as the Executive may require.

The assumption that Cabinet officers derive their powers solely from the President is erroneous. Even his power to appoint them is qualified by the requirement that the Senate shall consent, and his power to remove is to some extent shared by Congress, which can at any time impeach a delinquent head of a department, and thus remove him from his position.

The head of a department has a statutory office with statutory rights and obligations. The official status is created by the Constitution itself, and the power to determine the duties of a department head is delegated to Congress, and not to the Executive. Neither by statute nor by the Constitution does the Cabinet officially exist. It is a mere colloquial term.

The Constitution (Art. I, Sect. 8) gives to Congress the power > to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof.

Under this grant of power, the departments, whose executive heads constitute the so-called Cabinet, were established by Congress. Thus, it is provided by R. S. Sect. 199:

> There shall be at the seat of Government an executive department, to be known as the Department of State, and a Secretary of State, who shall be the head thereof.

Similar provisions are made for the other departments of the Government, and Congress prescribes by various statutes the respective duties allotted to these departments, and the rights and obligations of the officials connected therewith.

Secretary Lansing, therefore, did not owe his office to President Wilson. He did owe his nomination to that office to the President and his final appointment to the Senate, which confirmed it. He had an official status, which Congress had created, and he had rights and duties which Congress prescribed. No one could question that the illness of the President in any respect impaired the right, power, and duty of the Secretary of State to continue in the administration of his department. The President, however, contended that the Secretary of State in the discharge of his statutory duties could not confer with the heads of other departments in a so-called session of the Cabinet without the consent of the President, even though the President were unable to give his consent. Of all Mr. Wilson's extraordinary manifestations of one-man power, this is easily the most indefensible.

While each department of the Government has its own province, yet coördination between them is required, as their duties overlap. The balance wheel is the Department of Justice, and nearly all the department heads, other than the Attorney General, would find it difficult to discharge their duties unless they could confer with the Attorney General with respect to their legal obligations. Congress compels the Attorney General to advise the departments, when requested by their executive heads. This generally involves conference and coöperation. If the Secretary of State had the right to confer with the Attorney General, without the request of the President, then it follows that he had an equal right to confer with any other department head whose coöperation was necessary in the discharge of his duties. Thus, no department can function without the coöperation of the Treasury Department. If two heads of departments can confer in the discharge of their statutory duties, without asking the permission of the President, it must follow that all could do the same. If this right and duty of coöperation exists when the President is not disabled, a fortiori it exists in the event of his disability.

The opposing theory is due to the fact that, in the popular mind—and apparently in Mr. Wilson's idea of the Constitution—the Cabinet has an official status as such and that its decision carries with it a collective influence as such; but, as I have said, the Cabinet is, from a legal standpoint, non-existent. Each department head has a power which is limited to his own sphere of usefulness, and is defined by statute, and the heads of departments can not collectively take any action that would have any greater legal force than that which each head of a department takes separately, except where otherwise specifically provided. Thus, if a Secretary of State were to take a certain action which in itself was legal, no court could nullify his action because the Cabinet was of opinion that it was inexpedient. In any legal proceeding, no cognizance could be taken of the Cabinet, as such.

The executive head of a department, therefore, is something more than a mere automaton of the President. He is a servant of the Government, with rights, duties, and limitations prescribed by Congress and not by the President. If Congress requires him to do a certain act or to refrain from doing a certain act, and such command or injunction is within the legislative powers of Congress, then the Cabinet officer must obey the command or respect the limitation, without regard to the wishes of the President. Thus, if Congress were to pass a law forbidding the Secretary of the Treasury to compromise a claim against the United States except after conference with and by the advice of the Attorney General, the President would be powerless to direct his Secretary of the Treasury to compromise the claim in any other way.

All this is so trite and obvious that its statement would be the idlest superfluity had not the President gravely called into question the power of the members of his so-called Cabinet to confer with each other. Undoubtedly the joint meeting of the heads of the departments, which collectively we call the Cabinet, while having no Constitutional or even statutory status, has acquired in the practical administration of the Government an unofficial status, and, therefore, it may be open to fair question, as a matter of official etiquette, whether the heads of the departments, except in an extraordinary emergency, could, on their own motion, jointly meet as a Cabinet without discourtesy to the President. If the President had rested his complaint against Mr. Lansing upon a question of courtesy, more could be said in justification of his contention; although, even then, the contention is surprising that, with the President stricken by a serious malady, the so-called Cabinet could not meet to determine what the public interests required. The President, however, did not rest his complaint upon a question of etiquette or courtesy; but contended that the meeting of the Cabinet without his knowledge and approval—although he was then incapable of either knowledge or approval—was a violation of our form of government, and sufficiently grave to justify the summary removal of a Secretary of State. Its unsoundness can be tested by an extreme illustration.

Suppose that the Cabinet of the United States, in time of war, became convinced that the President of the United States was conspiring with the enemies of his country and that for this and other grave misdemeanors was justly subject to impeachment, and let us suppose that the facts with reference to the President's dereliction, which fully justified his removal, lay exclusively in the knowledge of the various heads of departments. If, under these circumstances, the Cabinet met formally, reached the conclusion that the President should be impeached and removed, and communicated their joint judgment to the Congress of the United States, what Constitutional provision would be violated? Indeed, would they not, under the assumed circumstances, simply discharge an undoubted duty that they owed to their country?

JAMES M. BECK

New York, March 8

How to Meet the Revolutionist

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

In your issue of February 28, the editorial entitled "Hillquit on the Socialist Programme," presents the urgent question, What is to be done as to the Socialists and their revolutionary propaganda?

One difficulty encountered is the adroit use of language found among professional Socialists. The language of the Socialist agitator to his "proletariat" audience may probably be received in a different sense from that which he assigns to it if called to account by constituted authority. The terms "mass action," "direct action" and "revolution," used repeatedly in Socialist writings, are illustrations.

Mr. Hillquit himself is hardly the type of "proletarian" for whom the social "Revolution" is advocated. His successful law practice of 27 years and his residence on Riverside Drive are not an obvious identification with the "exploited" labor masses. It is not surprising that his announced definition of Socialism falls short of that current in Russia, and expressed by other leaders of the Socialist party in this country and in the manifesto of that portion of the Socialist party in this country (claiming to be a large majority in numbers) which set up a separate organization less than a year ago. The "Revolution" once loosed, it would be idle to expect it to stop at the limits assigned by Mr. Hillquit. Any answer to the problem of what we should do requires the best thought of our wisest and most experienced leaders. The following, however, are suggested as lines of action:

1. Let us clearly understand and see to it that the public understands the difference between Reform and Revolution. They are sharply differentiated by Socialists themselves, but a lack of comprehension of this distinction is responsible for ill-considered action by sentimentalists. In the manifesto and programme of the Communist party of America, which in August, 1919, separated from the titular Socialist party, and claims to have taken more than two-thirds of its membership, we find the following:

> Participation in parliamentary campaigns, which in the general struggle of the proletariat is of secondary importance, is for the purpose of revolutionary propaganda only. Parliamentary representatives of the Communist party shall not introduce or support reform measures.

In the fundamental Communist Manifesto of Marx and Engels occurs the following reference to one class of activities which they differentiate from their own objectives:

> A part of the bourgeoisie is desirous of redressing social grievances in order to secure the continued existence of bourgeois society. To this section belong economists, philanthropists, humanitarians, improvers of the condition of the working class, organizers of charity, members of societies for the prevention of cruelty to animals, temperance fanatics, hole and corner reformers of every imaginable kind.

And elsewhere it states:

> The Communists disdain to conceal their views and aims. They openly declare that their ends can be attained only by the forcible overthrow of all existing social conditions.

In the manifesto of the Communist International adopted at Moscow in March, 1919, bearing, among others, the signatures of Lenin and Trotsky, appears the following:

> Decades of organizing and labor reformism created a generation of leaders most of whom gave verbal recognition to the programme of social revolution but denied it in substance. They were lost in the swamp of reformism and adaptation to the bourgeois state.

And again:

> Socialist criticism has sufficiently stigmatized the bourgeois world order. The task of the International Communist party is now to overthrow this order and to erect in its place the structure of the Socialist world order.

2. With a knowledge of what the "Socialist world order" means, let us encourage and promote social and economic reforms. Much has been done through legislation respecting child labor, hours of labor, factory legislation, tenement legislation, workmen's compensation, etc. More remains to be done. The world war leaves us in a state of world-wide unrest, perhaps on the threshold of a new era; there is a spirit abroad that challenges established traditions and the conditions demand wide vision and wise and far-reaching plans.

3. Even as we give our earnest support to wise reforms, we should inflexibly combat the noxious revolutionary propaganda. However fair its promises, it inevitably unchains terror and social chaos. Promote in every proper way the spirit of holding fast to the fundamental guaranties and securities upon which our Government and social structure have been built. Let us not be fearful of changes that will improve and strengthen, but let the changes be step by step. True progress consists in holding to what we have until we have tried out that to which we propose to change.

4. Let us purge our civic bodies, schools, churches, and other organizations of the poisonous and destructive propaganda of revolution. Easy-going tolerance and lax indifference have allowed the propagandists of these doctrines to insinuate themselves into what should be the temples and citadels of our social structure. Let us supervise those who instruct and develop the thought of our children, and those of riper years as well, and if they are false prophets, let us brand them as such. Side by side with this attack upon those who menace our institutions, let us provide wholesome teaching for those whose energies may now be misdirected and ill-spent. Afford an outlet for the natural zeal of the reformer which will make him a supporter of our Government and institutions, not an ally of their enemies.

5. Let us also firmly exclude the aliens who come here to preach sedition. The effort is now organized on a large scale. Lieutenant Kliefoth, a former attaché of our Embassy in Russia, is quoted as stating that the Committee on Propaganda and the Suppression of Counter Revolution spent in the past year 400,000,000 rubles for propaganda, printed in every known language. Lenin's foreign policy was based, he said, on foreign propaganda and world social revolution. As to alien agitators who have already obtained or hereafter may obtain admission, through our ignorance of their real character and motives, let us provide a swift and certain return to their homeland, and let it be made clear that this will be done with all who thus abuse our hospitality.

HERBERT BARRY

New York, March 3

Book Reviews

Roosevelt's Imperishable Youth

THEODORE ROOSEVELT: AN AUTOBIOGRAPHY. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.

THE spirit of adventure and the spirit of domesticity, good things in themselves, are perfect as correctives to each other, and the perfection of their union and the fruitfulness of that perfection are abundantly manifest in this muscular and spirited autobiography. These two elements so shaped and colored the man that politics remained for him from first to last the superb adventure, and patriotism itself took form as the extension of marital and fatherly care to a widened household. There is an incipient outlaw in every adventurer; there is a potential dictator in every parent; it was curious that the exemplar, Theodore Roosevelt, whose life-formula might be summarized as the application of courage to disinterested ends on a world-scale, should have become the illustrator of both tendencies.

He was in some respects a most democratic person; he valued manhood apart from class or wealth. He would have embraced Theodore Roosevelt in blouse and sweater; he would probably have embraced Theodore Roosevelt in blanket or loin-cloth. He loved the other man of his type; what he could not love or see was the other type. He thought, with some reason, that he lived a very good life himself, and his object as patriot, like his object as father, was to distribute that form of life in the utmost possible abundance through the widest possible area. He was a man-breeder, man-feeder, man-builder. When he was President he wanted to do something to season the savorless and stupefying life of laborious women on the farms. This is more than paternalism; it is grandmotherliness. It evokes a smile possibly, but, on the absolute genuineness of Theodore Roosevelt on this side, its conclusiveness is exhilarating. Demagogues and hypocrites are not mindful of this sort of hardship; they hear only the moans which can be distilled into bravos.

The danger, the drawback, in all this lay in the subjection to things. The subjection is natural to mankind. The boy in his playground, the man in his workshop, are actualists; what society feebly tries to do in the brief interval of so-called higher education is to call geometry with its line, algebra with its letter, language with its word, law with its rule, logic with its formula, science with its class, to chasten or counterpoise the domination of the brute thing. This education Theodore Roosevelt, to all appearances, needed and lacked. He was graduated from Harvard University, he studied law, and he had acquirements and versatilities on which stress is duly and affectionately laid. But his relation to things remained elementary; he could not gain a second point of view. Efficient at an age when other men are fumbling, he was rigid at an age when other men are pliant. The gods drive their bargains with the best of us, and perpetual boyhood was the price paid by Theodore Roosevelt for imperishable youth. Hence a nature that is always, in the French phrase, on "le premier plan." Culture in the sense of modulation—the sense in which every chord in a man's being is audible with a difference in every other chord—is not the property of his mind. In style his fist is always powerful, but the hand is not versatile or supple, and there is no trace of his ownership of a musician's ear. His remarks on books, while sensible enough, are not so good as the remarks of an energetic mind on a subject that skirted its own field ought to be. Of individuality in character he seems to have had little sense. The certificates of efficiency which he deals out in lavish abundance with fraternal pleasure are curiously alike in their matter and their diction. Men to him became largely tools; he knew the difference between a good and a bad tool, but the distinctions between good tools were negligible. The sense of humor which enables a man in a sort to pursue and overtake, to waylay and circumvent, himself, was not found in high quality or large amount in Theodore Roosevelt. Something of this elemental, boyish character is visible in the plunge from deed to deed, the rebound from task to task, which marked his hurried, eager, improvised career. His fight for righteousness was a form of Roughridership; he was the moral raider, the Prince Rupert, the Morgan, the Mosby, supreme in the inspiration of a charge, less certain in the sinuosities of a campaign.

The "Autobiography" of Theodore Roosevelt may be viewed in a double aspect. On the one side, it is a strong, bright, simple book, a saga, a chanson de geste, with altered settings and properties. On another side, the side of the author's unconscious self-revelation, it has the effect of profound and artful satire, the work of a Swift or Pascal or Voltaire. The author is simple, but the book—or Nature behind the book—is cunning. When, on pages 250-1, we find Theodore Roosevelt as Lieutenant-Colonel rescinding the act of a major-general, and escaping the penalties of that violated discipline which he enforced for smaller offenses on lesser men, we can not but shudder at the peril to the Republic latent in the puissance of a man capable of the presumption of that deed and the nonchalance of that confession. The same quality is evident in milder form in the quiet bitterness of the frequent allusions to the failure of his "successor" to carry out the Rooseveltian policies where they bruised, or seemed to bruise, the Constitution. Theodore Roosevelt was so much the thrall of the concrete that the notion that a word could stand between a good man and a good act was to him incomprehensible and monstrous. It never occurred to him to ask himself seriously if the same word that stands between a good man and a good act to-day may not stand between a bad man and a bad act to-morrow. He could not understand that an unselfish act might be wrong; he felt his own acts to be thoroughly unselfish, and he accepted that artless guarantee of their virtue. This temper of mind is primitive, and its association with powers so extraordinary and with aims so magnanimous gives to his own case that subtlety and ironic point which was so curiously wanting in his own view of the world and himself.

All Sorts of Adams's

THE DEGRADATION OF THE DEMOCRATIC DOGMA. By Henry Adams. With an Introduction by Brooks Adams. New York: The Macmillan Company.

MR. AUGUSTINE BIRRELL, in one of his scoffing moods, speaks disrespectfully of poor Francis Horner because he "maintained an atmosphere," whereas if he had been asked what he had done since he was breeched, he could only mutter something about the currency. That artificial atmospheres have been maintained we do not deny; but, after many years, they acquire permanency, and posterity accepts the verdict of contemporaries as final. That an atmosphere has surrounded the elder members of the Adams family is certainly true, and we do not think it should be dispelled; nor did we think it likely that at this late day any attempt to dispel it would be successful.

We must say, however, that by the publication of this book Mr. Brooks Adams has seriously disturbed this atmosphere. So far as he himself was protected by it—not that it was in his case very impenetrable—he has completely dissipated it. The world had forgotten that he was a violent devotee of "free silver"; but he takes this opportunity to renew his vituperation of the "gold bugs," and to drag Henry Adams into the extinct controversy. He bemoans his pecuniary losses in the panic of 1893—brought on by the agitation in which he was active—but as no one but himself was to blame, his sufferings arouse more contempt than pity, for, after all, he did "crawl in with the bankers on the rise." He had better let oblivion do its kindly work.

That he did not deserve to keep an atmosphere is also shown by the title of this book. We took it up anticipating pleasure if not profit in getting Henry Adams's views on democracy. We have been disappointed. Whatever views on this subject Henry Adams may have elsewhere expressed, he expresses none here. He discourses on views of the universe in general, and the philosophy of history in particular, but he has nothing to say of the degradation of the democratic dogma, or of the democratic dogma itself. Nor do we find that Mr. Brooks Adams increases our knowledge of these subjects. He allows himself 122 pages of discursive lucubration, and spares Henry Adams less than 200 pages; but to offer this matter under the title he has given it is to practise a deception on the public worthy only of the late P. T. Barnum.

Dr. Holmes, we believe, maintained that to reform a man you must begin with his grandparents. Proceeding on this theory Mr. Brooks Adams undertakes to explain Henry Adams in terms of his grandfather, John Quincy Adams. We confess that we do not understand the explanation. It may be that "what is most remarkable is the persistence of the same cast of intelligence in the grandfather and grandson, the scientific mixed with the political, which made the older man reject with horror a scientific theory forced upon him by circumstances, which the younger man has accepted, if not with approbation, at least with resignation, and at so relatively short an interval of time." The laws of heredity are, it is true, somewhat obscure, but why the same cast of intelligence should produce such contradictory results is passing strange, if not past belief. Other explanations are offered which might be reduced to coherency with patient study, but the game is not worth the candle. Possibly the phenomenon is caused by the Adams's atmosphere.

To sweep aside the atmosphere in which John Quincy Adams has been comfortably shrouded appears to us as an act of gross impiety. The "old man eloquent" really amounted to something; he was conceited, but that does not excuse his grandson for using him as an illustration of the proverb, "seest thou a man wise in his own conceit? there is more hope of a fool than of him." Why should attention be called to the fact that the grandfather declared that if his "conceptive power of mind" had been greater, his "diary would have been, next to the Holy Scriptures, the most precious and valuable book ever written by human hands," and he "would have been one of the greatest benefactors" of his country and of mankind. He would, "by the irresistible power of genius and irrepressible energy of will and the favor of Almighty God, have banished war and slavery from the face of the earth forever." He concluded with the prayer: "May I never murmur at the dispensations of Providence." After his political downfall, according to his grandson, he never did much else but murmur.

With the result, if not the purpose, of writing down his grandfather an ass, his grandson submits extracts from his diary, some of which we quote. They do not suggest heroism, and make us skeptical as to what the diary might have been, even with the special favor of Almighty God. "I was up at three and again at four, and wrote on the arrears of this diary from that time till seven. . . . I passed a night of torture, with a hacking and racking cough, and feverish headache. . . . I went to bed at nine and was up with fits of coughing at 11, at 1, at 3, and at 5 this morning, and finally lay till near 6 utterly dispirited. . . . I ate nothing the whole day." The lapse of 80 years has deprived these events of interest, and what they have to do with the "heritage of Henry Adams"—unless he was subject to fits of coughing—is conceivable only by the "conceptive power of mind" possessed by Mr. Brooks Adams. Our own theory of "heritage" is that John Quincy Adams was somehow derived from Louis XIV. After the overwhelming defeat at Ramillies, that monarch exclaimed: "Has God then forgotten all that I have done for him!" When John Quincy Adams found that his political theories failed in practice, he considered (according to his grandson) that he had been betrayed by his God. The failure of God to support him in his policy of constructing highways and canals through the national Government caused him even to doubt the existence of a supreme being. Such incapacity to regulate the affairs of this country in accordance with the Adams's ideas showed that God was really unfitted for his position. The poor old man was disappointed, embittered, and broken in health; but why, as Mr. Birrell somewhere observes, "should the universe be stretched upon the rack because food disagrees with man and cocks crow?" But God is merciful. He spared the old man knowledge of what his grandson was going to do to his remains. Had he foreknown it, any murmur at the dispensations of Providence would have been blotted out by the Recording Angel.

John Quincy Adams was, in the opinion of his grandson, "the most interesting and suggestive personage of the early nineteenth century," and Henry Adams in his philosophy "certainly one of the most so of the present century." We do not understand this stinted praise of Henry; although, as it incidentally appears that he found Brooks a bore, there is room for conjecture. It is understood that the "Education" has been read, or partly read, by a great many people. We are not confident that all these readers could give a clear statement of the principles of education, as a result of their labors, but it is reasonable to suppose that they found Henry Adams an interesting and suggestive personality. Such they may find him here. His essays, to be sure, have nothing to do with Democratic Dogma. One is entitled "A Letter to American Teachers of History." The other is "The Rule of Phase Applied to History." Those who are concerned to reconcile the mechanical theory of the universe with the existence of a vital principle, Sir Isaac Newton with Sir Oliver Lodge, and who succeed in their attempts, may possibly develop a philosophy of history satisfactory to themselves from these essays. To others it may not be satisfactory.

For neither a history nor a philosophy based on the meditations of the anthropoid ape a hundred thousand years ago deserves attention. This being is represented as employing his time, not in cracking nuts, but in considering the problem—"How long could he go on developing indefinite new phases in response to the occult attractions of an indefinitely extended universe?" Even if the problem is "the same as that addressed to the physicist-historian of 1900"; especially if he foresaw that in 1921 "thought will reach the limit of its possibilities," and that "only a few highly trained and gifted men will then be able to understand each other," we are sure that this ancestor of ours, although illiterate, knew enough not to spend his time over a riddle that after a hundred thousand years was to get no better answer than this. He probably tried hard to understand his brother apes and was proud of his progress; but if he had known that this was to be the long result of time he would have been discouraged at the start.

"You may be sure," Henry Adams tells the American Historical Association, "that four out of five serious students of history who are living to-day have, in the course of their work, felt that they stood on the brink of a great generalization that would reduce all history under a law as clear as the laws which govern the material world." At the same rapid progress in history which has been made during the last fifty years, another half century would carry historians over this "brink," our author tells us. He doubts if this rate can be maintained. "If not, our situation is simple. In that case we shall remain more or less where we are." This is sound reasoning, and as most terrific results will follow to church, and state, and property, and society itself if history is to continue its progress, we insist that it must remain where it is, "be the same more or less."

On the brink of one generalization the author not only has stood but has fallen over. "Man has always flattered himself," he tells us, "that he knew—or was about to know—something that would make his own energy intelligible to itself, but he has invariably found, on further inquiry, that the more he knew the less he understood. . . . He knew nothing at all! . . . No one knew anything." This is mere dogmatism. The author may speak for himself as to the limits of his own knowledge; he may possibly generalize correctly concerning anthropoid apes; but he has no right to measure the intelligence of his fellow creatures by his own ignorance.

The world has listened with equanimity, so far as it has listened at all, to warnings of philosophers as to the final crack of doom. One tells us that it is the height of imprudence not to see that—after some preliminaries—"the inevitable death of all things will approach with headlong rapidity." Our author inclines to this view, but at first he allows us time to get used to it, if that is any comfort. "Man and beast can, at best, look forward only to a diversified agony of twenty million years"; but it is miserable comfort to know that "at no instant of this considerable period can the professor of mathematics flatter himself or his students with an exclusive or extended hope of escaping imbecility." Still, this leaves a ray of hope to that large part of our race that has always despised mathematics and questioned the pretensions of its professors; but this ray is quickly extinguished. For another authority says, "An insane world is looked forward to by me with certainty in the not far distant future."

Yet even the most stolid of mankind may be startled to hear that the "catastrophe of civilization" is so near at hand as 1921. This date is indicated by the career of the comet of 1843, which is shown by an illustration to have whisked around the sun in twelve hours and flown off into space. Now a comet "resembles Thought in certain respects, since, in the first place, no one knows what it is, which is also true of Thought, and it seems in some cases to be immaterial. . . . If not a Thought, the comet is a sort of brother of Thought, an early condensation of ether itself, as the human mind may be another, traversing the infinite without origin or end, and attracted by a sudden object of curiosity that lies by chance near its path. If such elements are subject to the so-called law of gravitation, no good reason can exist for denying gravitation to the mind."

With this basis, by using the law of squares and some conjectures which space does not allow us to present, the conclusion is reached that Will and Reason "must submit to the final and fundamental necessity of Degradation."

In a review of Mr. Pinmoney's poems, Punch says of the most consummate of them, "Here we have the whole philosophy of life and the life hereafter summed up." As this poem also contains in a compendious form the whole of Henry Adams's philosophy, we present it for the use of readers whose time is valuable:

"Man comes
And goes.
What then?
Who knows?"

D. McG. Means

War-Time Reactions

The Call of the Soil. By Adrien Bertrand (Lieutenant Chasseurs Alpins). Translated by J. Lewis May. New York: John Lane Company.

The Judgment of Peace. By Andreas Latzko. Translated by Ludwig Lewisohn. New York: Boni and Liveright.

The Secret Battle. By A. P. Herbert. New York: Alfred A. Knopf.

Up and Down. By E. F. Benson. New York: George H. Doran Company.

WAR-TIME reactions and experiences are not for the moment of burning interest to most of us. Being no longer agrope among them we should more or less frankly like to put them out of memory for a time. Yet it is certain that their best records are still to come. Most of the immediate literature of the war was, and had to be, shortsighted, fragmentary, and often hysterical, whether with rage or with pity—when it did not cultivate a protective nonchalance, and a kind of hard tonelessness of style, also protective.

"The Call of the Soil," in French "L'Appel du Sol," won the Goncourt prize in 1916. Already it is a little quaint, like, say, a motor-car of that date. It is a story of the emotional order. Like Berger's "Ordeal By Fire," and many other French war novels, it expresses the triumphant merging of individual will and destiny in the service of France. Without going afield in pursuit of larger ideals—the preservation of civilization or democracy, or the vindication of an universal brotherhood—it is content to exalt love of country. It finds in patriotism a motive sufficient to justify if not the war, certainly the French citizen's part in it. The Frenchmen of the story, whatever their rank, or their personal characters, willingly die for France: "the power which guided them all was the call of the soil of France." To those who have faith in the validity of this species of sacrifice, the horrors of war do not cease to exist, but may be accepted like the natural horrors of whirlwind or earthquake. It is only those who see no meaning in war who gloat over its monstrous physical cruelties to the individual. . . . This is not an infallible distinction, after all, as witness "The Test of Scarlet," by W. Coningsby Dawson, than which nothing more naturalistically sanguinary or more romantically sanguine has come out of the war. But it will hold in the main.

Witness "The Judgment of Peace," by Andreas Latzko, a Teuton who significantly inscribes this work "To Romain Rolland, my great compatriot in the love of Man." His earlier war novel was acclaimed by all those who set the hatred of war above the love of anything whatsoever—or rather identify it with the love of humanity. That an Austrian officer in war-time should express so vividly, so furiously, his loathing for war and for the militarist spirit which brought the world to this war, was, to put it vulgarly, nuts for the pacifists. "Men in War" was indeed a fine and impassioned utterance of that saeva indignatio of the humanitarian which so ruthlessly visits itself upon all who are not professionally humanitarian. Latzko is an eagle of peace. The air winces under the buffeting of his wings, and echoes with a cry that might be curse or blessing. "The Judgment of Peace" does not release us from the bloody turmoil of "the front."

Here, as was the case in the war-fiction of Barbusse and Duhamel, are pitilessly exposed the squalor and the agony of forced marches, of trench life, of useless raids and unmeaning brutalities. Here, to the confusion or incredulity of non-Teutonic readers, are various incidental allusions to "atrocities" on the part of the Allies, all the more disturbing for being so unstressed. Ill-treatment of prisoners at French hands is alluded to as a matter of course, and as for the wounded: "With the hands of a veritable hangman the hate-maddened French staff surgeon had probed his wound and torn off his bandages. The attendants of both sexes had done their best to equal their commander in patriotic zeal until his vigorous organism had remained victorious and the hated boche had ceased spitting blood and was discharged." How familiar this would sound with the substitution of "Prussian" for "French"! However, there is solace for the other side in the picture of the devoted French Sister, who gives her tears as well as her tireless care to the dying German officer, while his wounded comrades curse him as a traitor for not playing the stoic to the end. . . . Shrill above the author's hatred of war as a crime against humanity rises that familiar note of rage against war for its indifference to the precious individual. Why should anyone so unique, so inviolable as I myself be thrown into the cauldron?

In a very different temper "The Secret Battle" is a study of the injustice of war to the individual. Being the work of a cultivated Englishman, it has the restraint of the famous public-school tradition. It wishes to betray too little rather than too much feeling. Its manner is tense with sympathy, but its matter approaches dryness. Its theme is the tragic fate of an ardent young Briton entangled in the meshes of the military system. He eagerly offers himself to England at the beginning of the war, with God knows what dreams of heroic service and its attendant glory. At Gallipoli he serves his bitter and disillusionizing apprenticeship in the drab trade of modern warfare. His valor is at first unquestionable, but his fortitude is not proof against the long strain of perilous service and the determined enmity of certain "superior" officers, the one a martinet, the other a slacker, in whose black books chance and malice have placed him. His nerve is broken before a wound sends him home. There, on his recovery, he is urged to accept a safe post. But his doubt of himself drives him back to the front, and this time chance and malice make short work of him. Now the author does not base upon this incident an indictment of warfare so much as record it for what it may be worth. "This book is not an attack on any person, on the death penalty, or on anything else, though if it makes people think about these things, so much the better. I think I believe in the death penalty—I don't know. But I did not believe in Harry being shot. . . . That is the gist of it; that my friend Harry was shot for cowardice—and he was one of the bravest men I knew."

Mr. Benson's "Up and Down" is a study of lighter tone and texture, but it is in no trivial sense of the term that we may call it a comedy of two friends in war-time. May, 1914, to April, 1917, are its containing dates. The scene shifts from Italy to England and back. The older person is (approximately) Mr. Benson himself; the younger a clever and indolent individualist who is perfectly happy in his Italian villa, means to live there always, and speaks of England as an unpleasant place from which he happens to have escaped. In July, 1914, the older friend is in England, and as the war cloud gathers he has a letter from the younger, in which he calls himself "a denationalized individual." He thinks he might fight for Italy—but how could he take arms against Germany, who "taught mankind how to think"? He thinks England ought to be able to keep out of it, though it will be "particularly beastly" there, "with all these disturbances going on." Why doesn't his friend pack his comb and his toothbrush and come back to Alatri? Then in a few days come the facts of England's entry into the war and Italy's declaration of neutrality—and on their heels a letter from our young dilettante, which says simply, "Of course we had to come in when Belgium was invaded. . . . By the way, if it is true that we are sending an Expeditionary Force to France, just send me a wire, will you?" So perishes the denationalized one, while a patriot is born for England. . . . The rest of the book is of less firm texture. The younger friend serves, and dies, though not at the front; and thereafter, by agreement, communicates fragmentarily, through a medium, with the older man.

Upon this episode Mr. Benson bears not too heavily. He believes it possible that on occasion we may be "brought into connection not with the soul of the departed, his real essential personality, but with a piece of his mere mechanical intelligence." . . . "I believe the door between the two worlds not to be locked and barred; certain people—such as we call mediums—have the power of turning the handle and for a little while setting this door ajar. But what do we get when the door is set ajar? Nothing that is significant, nothing that brings us closer to those on the other side. If I had not already believed in the permanence and survival of individual life, I think it more than possible that the accurate and unerring statement of what was in the sealed packet might have convinced me of it. But it brought me no nearer Francis." All of which is worth the consideration of both the bulls and the bears of the spiritualistic, or spiritistic, or psychical exchanges of the hour.

H. W. Boynton

Lessons from the Progress of Science

The Whole Armour of Man. By C. W. Saleeby. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott Company.

THE war-like title of this book was suggested no doubt by the author's experiences in the great war, but the conflict that he has in mind is the struggle between man and his adverse environment. The armor with which man must gird his loins is the knowledge furnished by the progress of science. At the end of the book, and in a way as a summing up of the whole truth of the matter, the author quotes almost with reverence the noble address delivered by Pasteur some thirty years ago, a message in which he declared his belief that "Science and peace will triumph over ignorance and war." To this belief the author is glad to give his enthusiastic adherence in spite of the untoward events of recent years.

The book consists for the most part of a series of papers and addresses previously published or delivered and brought together in this volume in a somewhat haphazard form. The author apologizes for this loose arrangement on the plea that the urgency of the matter treated did not permit time for the composition of an "organic volume." Hence the selection and publication of miscellaneous papers which cover the whole field of sanitation and preventive medicine, with something to spare, since he throws in such things as tributes to Carrel and to Horseley and disquisitions upon the evils of speculation and the solution of the world's wheat problem. In spite of this heterogeneity and much repetition, the volume is most readable. The author has a wide knowledge of the biological sciences, which, if not always accurate in details, is sufficiently sound in general; and, added to this, he has in high degree the gift of expression. His English is vigorous and epigrammatic. The latter quality is possibly too much in evidence. The author at times seems to succumb to the temptation to air this gift, as, for example, in his "slams" against the ancient and honorable game of golf, which he characterizes as "not a game but a treatment."

The conservative scientist lacking a personal acquaintance with Dr. Saleeby will infer from his writings that he belongs to that group of whole-souled reformers whose virtuous enthusiasm may make them at times uncertain guides, but there can be no doubt that he possesses to an unusual degree the art of popularizing scientific knowledge. It is a rare gift. The writings of most reformers, especially in matters of public health, are likely to be deadly dull, even though tricked out with a good deal of yellow science. In this country we need very much men who possess the gift to arouse our reading public to a realization of the extraordinary opportunities now available in the application of the results of science to the prevention of disease and death. Dr. Saleeby's breezy essays, although written especially for the British public and applicable in detail only to the conditions there prevailing, are entirely pertinent in general to the conditions existing in this and other civilized countries. In such matters we are all in the same boat. The author is very savage with the English as contrasted with the Scottish public, and particularly with the English politicians, on account of their alleged contempt for science. He finds evidence for this accusation, of course, in the conduct of the war.

He attempts to stimulate his fellow countrymen by pointing out how much better such things are done in France or in this country. But, so far as we are concerned, it is to be feared that the compliment must be passed back to him. In sanitary methods and in social economics we must award first place to Great Britain, and the book under review gives sufficient evidence, perhaps, for this belief. They have a Minister of Health, whom we have not, and the things done, together with the things contemplated, as set down in this book, are of a kind to provoke envy as well as congratulations.

The Run of the Shelves

THE dramatic editor of the Indianapolis News, Oliver M. Sayler, visited the theatres of Moscow and Petrograd in the winter of 1917-1918. His book, the "Russian Theatre Under the Revolution" (Little, Brown and Company), is said to give "the first complete record in English of the foremost dramatic movement of our time." In that winter Russia was staging a revolution. A visitor who should choose the moment when a man's house was on fire to inspect his cameos would not be a commonplace person. The exhibitor of cameos under those circumstances would likewise be exceptional. Mr. Sayler found his theatres. Escape from the Russian Revolution, which seems impracticable in Paris or London or New York, appears to be entirely achievable in the stalls and boxes of the Small State Theatre (conservative), which plays Shakespeare and Schilling and Hugo, of the Moscow Art Theatre (liberal), which features Tchekhov, and of the Kamerny Theatre (radical), which plays Kalidasa and Synge and Goldoni and Calderon and Beaumarchais and Benelli (of the "Jest"), and, to the unspeakable delight of the rhapsodic and phosphoric Mr. Sayler, Oscar Wilde's "Salome." A country which can maintain a literary art at the summit of histrionic perfection at a time when famine pinches and discord reddens its capital is a country to whose possibilities it is difficult to fix a bound.

For part of this miracle—that is for the unsurpassed artistic merit of the acting—we are obliged to trust to Mr. Sayler's word. His sincerity is unquestionable, but his temper runs to hyperbole. Moreover, he has the theatrical field in Russia for the moment all to himself—a dangerous privilege. No foreigner is by to check him up, and we suspect him of a tendency to that enlargement of vision and speech to which human nature is prone in the absence of challengers. Monopoly always raises the price of its own wares. His criticism is not daunted by his evident ignorance of the Russian language. In the point of analysis he is easily satisfied. For the acting at the Moscow Art Theatre his formula is "spiritualized realism." Spiritualized realism, at the first glance, would seem, like sentimental or mystic realism, to involve a contradiction in terms. Realism is uncolored fact, and spirituality and sentiment and mysticism are all colorings. Very possibly the point is answerable. No wise man will declare war on a phrase, any more than he will capitulate to one. But should not Mr. Sayler have given us something more than a phrase to make war on or make peace with? Sometimes his remarks (see page 78) reveal that artlessness with which sophistication is now and then so strangely companionable. In spite of all doubts and deductions, Mr. Sayler's book should be read by all students of contemporary drama. If it is not a striking history, it is a spirited and curious novel.

Poe has found much warmer admirers abroad than at home. American critics, from his own day to yesterday, invariably spill a bit of gall in the honey. Foreign recognition, says Brownell, rewards to a disproportionate extent the merits that especially appeal to foreigners. In the case of Poe, these merits, notably the single-eyed preoccupation with beauty, were of a sort which goes straight to the heart of Frenchmen in particular. Baudelaire, perhaps the only other poet in the world who was Poe's euphonic equal, put Poe's verse into marvelous French; and Frenchmen have ever since been charmed by his genius and shocked by his own country's callous ingratitude.

A new book by M. André Fontainas ("La Vie d'Edgar A. Poe": Mercure de France) is a biography of Poe, not a study of his writing. It is an enthusiastic retelling of his pathetic and often noble life, involving a passionate attack on his traducers. Poe was the only champion of art for art in his country and generation. Hence, it was inevitable that the Philistines, the materialists, the preachers, the reformers, all they who love dollars, decorum, or doctrines more dearly than art, should have misunderstood him, disliked him, attacked him, especially in view of his proneness to attack first. It is probable that few Americans can even yet read such a study as this of M. Fontainas with full appreciation, since most Americans are still enrolled in one troop or the other of the army against which poor Poe tilted single-handed. To most of us it makes little difference—since by his zealous biographer's own admission he was discharged from one magazine for drunkenness—whether or not he was dismissed a second or third time for a similar offense. We admire his genius, disapprove of his irregularities, regret sincerely that we have been inclined to exaggerate them, and take national pride in a detail which has apparently made no great impression on his French champion—the fact that, whatever his personal life may have been, and though utterly bare of didacticism, his writings, prose and poetry, are absolutely clean and pure. But for all our Philistinism, we can see that M. Fontainas has written a valuable book, accurate, abreast with the most recent discoveries, and pleasant to read. If we had been given our choice we should have preferred that the twenty-five pages given over to the sentimental poems of Poe's friend, Mrs. Whitman, had been devoted to a continuation of the, to us, much more interesting main subject in hand. Otherwise, the book is well-planned and skilfully executed.

In compiling the volume "Great Artists and Their Works by Great Authors" (Boston: Marshall Jones Company), Professor Alfred Mansfield Brooks has hit on an excellent idea. Excluding, in the main, artists' utterances, and giving rather little from professional art critics, he gleans general literature for comments on art in general, the particular arts, or individual artists and masterpieces. Thus he brings together for the use and pleasure of the art lover many significant passages which would otherwise escape him. So far as it goes, the book is acceptable, but the principle of selection seems pretty casual, and the omissions are disquieting. If it was worth while to collect a number of Goethe's rather commonplace observations on art, surely such real critics as Lessing, Winckelmann, and Schopenhauer should have been considered. The French list is blank as regards Diderot, Gautier, Taine, and Zola, not to mention the notable romantic, Baudelaire. On the English side why lug in Lord Leighton and George Clausen, when Rossetti, W. E. Henley, and R. A. M. Stevenson are ignored? To substitute in a second edition extracts from these writers for the present superabundance of Ruskin would remedy its somewhat parochial flavor.

"Lettres d'un Soldat" (Paris: Chapelot) first appeared in 1916 and has gone through several editions. It immediately attracted attention in both England and America, and two separate translations were brought out in 1917 by two different houses and under two different titles. Here the book was called "A Soldier of France to His Mother" (McClurg), in England, "Letters of a Soldier" (Constable); and now, oddly enough, a second London edition, newly translated and with still another title—"Letters from a French Soldier to His Mother"—appears from still another London publisher—Alexander Moring. It is also surprising that the present editor and translator still leaves the authorship of this book cloaked in anonymity, although it has been publicly admitted by the family for a year or more that these remarkable letters are from the pen of Sergeant Eugène Lemercier, an artist-soldier of great talent, killed on the Western front. Furthermore, his mother, also an artist and the one to whom the letters are addressed, is now engaged in making a selection from all of her son's writings which will be published next year in America, accompanied by a biographical introduction and a number of reproductions of the artist's best work.

Of Woodpiles

WE were walking, the poet and I, past a low white farm house and a tall red barn. Between the two was a woodpile, a noble one, ten or fifteen cords of straight, clean maple, hickory, oak, and birch.

"There's a handsome woodpile for you!" I exclaimed.

Even as I spoke, I was conscious that I had said something of the sort before. The poet had not forgotten it; he turned a curious eye on me.

"What are you so interested in woodpiles for?"

I found it hard to explain in a word. "Aren't you?" I countered.

"No more than in piles of coal," he returned, and with the word he forfeited all my poetic faith.

When I got home, I took up the emaciated volume he had given me, and discovered that he is in the habit of attaching a set of rather pale emotions to characters one seldom meets outside the appendix to the classical dictionary; I doubt, for example, whether he is to this day more than "half assuaged for Itylus" (whoever Itylus was). My heart does not leap up for such as these, but it warms to a woodpile. If I had ever with my own hands inducted a ton of coal from its lair to my hearth and warmed myself by its heat, I might love a coal pile as I do a woodpile, but I doubt it—I think it much more likely that I should hate it. I have toiled over woodpiles when the flesh was weary, but the spirit did not revolt. I have followed steep trails, and no trails, among the high snows with a heavy pack from dawn till "barely time to make camp," and down to timber-line with every muscle aching. I should have been glad to spread my blanket and let someone else rustle the night's supply of wood, and cook supper. But in the end, after putting my last ounce of energy into every log I brought in, when with a full stomach and a full pipe I watched the sparks eddy upwards among the pine tops and the stars, then the woodpile was not the smallest item in the sum of self-congratulation over the day's achievement, and scarcely less agreeable to contemplate than the fire.

My feeling for woodpiles has a background with which the poet's experience did not supply him. I am an amateur if you like, but I am a veteran. Under paternal supervision, I began early in life on a load of cottonwood logs from the head of the canyon. On them I worked hard, not for money, but because Jim Corbett was training just then with a bucksaw. There are years vacant of woodpiles between that time and the conveyance to me and my heirs of sundry acres (be the same more or less) of sprout land on the New England hillside where I still swing my axe, but always my devotions have been as steady as fate would allow. I do not boast of accomplishment worth while in itself, but merely of experience that makes the woodpile, which to the poet was nothing more, to me a stimulus to the imagination and a delight to the eye.

First, doubtless, for its flattering testimony to worthy accomplishment. The man is not human who, after a day with the axe, does not smoke his evening pipe in the presence of his woodpile to estimate in complacence the well-earned increment. In sympathy or emulation his spirit echoes the experience when he sees another man's woodpile. To Thoreau, the feeling was almost enough in itself to justify the accumulation of firewood. At the woodpile stage of the process he felt that he had had all the pleasure he was entitled to, and for any further glow to be obtained from his fuel he must render account in the form of tasks sternly done in the warmth of his fire. 'Tis the voice of the Puritan, the word of the miser. Thoreau is not of the true fraternity of axe and saw, for the woodpile teaches no creed of asceticism, but releases its treasure to whosoever will come. He was a miser if the accumulation of goods as a means became to him in itself an end. And to borrow a turn from one who had ever an answer ready for the Puritan: If to burn mine own wood freely be a sin, God help the wicked. If you cut your own wood, your fire can hardly beguile you to unearned idleness, and there can be nothing wrong with the man who in contemplation of his woodpile anticipates ease, or before his fire remembers industry. I like to meet the sticks on my hearth as old friends, and to recall former meetings. "I remember you well," I say to a gummy stick of wild cherry; "you are more affable than when I saw you last. I found you difficult of approach as you stood in the angle of the wall." Of course, almost any stick is companionable in the atmosphere of the fireplace, but those you have brought up yourself are always the most so. They are like college students as their teachers see them, sometimes a bit difficult when you are licking them into shape, but warmly responsive as you meet them later.

In days of exile the woodpile stood among the fondest of memories. Traveling inland from Brest on a raw January day, not a few of my shivers were anticipatory as I saw the woodpiles of Brittany and Normandy, bundles of twigs that no American would feel that he could afford to handle except to burn as slashings, hoarded like counted money against the winter's firing. In Paris as I paid seven francs a basket for wood that at home I should not have wasted time in cutting except for riddance, and burned it in a tiny roll-top fireplace, I fondly dreamed of the woodshed I had so warmly lined with solid sticks before I left home. At a hospital camp in Burgundy I saw the only woodpile that looked real to an American eye. A trainload of firewood had backed in on the camp siding, and squads of husky doughboys were pitching it off—the air was thick with it; it fell in a huge drift nearly as big as the train. It was poor stuff by American standards, but at least it was cordwood, and I took off my hat to the S. O. S. with something like my first realization of how highly France prized our help; nowhere did I see her burning such wood to keep herself warm. A few days later I learned the feel of a French axe. Three of us out for a walk came upon a peasant felling a poplar beside a ditch. We gave him cigarettes, took his axe, and worked by turns, two talking with him of his service and his wounds while one chopped. The axe had a long, narrow bit and straight helve; it drove like a chisel into the narrow cut, wasting little in chips and stumpage. We met its owner afterwards on many a white road thereabout, and always had from him a cheerful password of the universal brotherhood of the woodpile.

It was a serviceable axe and a thrifty, but I missed the sinuous, slender helve of my own "weapon shapely, naked, wan." Give me a blade that suggests the concave of a razor, and a helve of at least twenty-eight inches with no treacherous cross-grain to weaken its double curve. An axe like a pendulum has its rhythm according to its length, and if it does not suit me I can not keep step with it. With an axe that fits, a proper stance, and the right swing, chopping is not heavy or exhausting work. The feeling is that of controlling rather than exerting force, like swinging a weight round your head by a string. After the lift and poise, a twist of trunk and shoulders give the axe its planetary motion and speed; the arms hold it to its arc, muscles stretched taut by the centrifugal pull as if they were an extension of the helve, but neither they nor the grip may have the slightest rigidity. As in golf, do not "push" to gain force, but drive the bit deep by a flick of the wrists at the end of the stroke. Thus you may chop all day with a merry heart, laying each cut to a hair where you want it to fall, leaving the end of each stick as clean as if you had sheared it with a single blow. And when you read in your "red-blood" novel of what the hero performs "with a few well-directed blows of his axe" you will wonder whether the novelist knows as well as you do whereof he speaks. As you pile the freshly cut sticks, you become aware that the rows of upturned ends present a rather odd view of your wood-lot in cross section; almost as if you could see your village with the ends of the houses removed. Here are the intimate life-histories of the trees revealed in the tale of the concentric rings, stories of poverty-stricken years you never suspected, hoarded wealth you never knew, healed scars and hidden wounds, secrets of the birth of new branches, and revelations of the means of supporting them from the parent trunk.

Of the wood-lot in winter, normally its busy season, I have not had full experience. I know, indeed, the austere joy of a brilliant morning with the mercury near to zero, the air twinkling with snow-sparks, electric to sight and touch, when even double mittens can not protect finger-tips from aches as poignant as ever haunted a tooth—but as Uncle Everett, my neighbor philosopher, sagely remarks, "S'long as they keep on a-hurtin', you know they ain't relly damaged much," and you swish your saw prestissimo to drive the blood into every last extremity. Here the woodpile is as neat between its upright stakes as a box of dominos, till there comes the slow creaking sled and its "dumb old servitor" to bear it at a foot pace down the hillside, down the valley, to the scene of its translation into ashes and ethereal parts. But most often I must cut my wood out of season, in summer when it is heavy with sap. A morning in a tiny cubicle which represents "the study" at camp, at monk-like labor laying words end to end, brings me to the limit of my endurance. With axe and saw I retire to my laboratory where trees too thickly congregate. The sun slants shafts of powdered gold through the greenery overhead; the song of the woodthrush ripples the placid air; jay and chickadee cock beady eyes at my proceedings, one squawks derision, the other pipes companionship. I spy through the shot-windows of my high room tiny vistas framed in leaves, the far curve of a hill's bosom to the north, or a brush-point of Chinese white representing a church spire down the valley to the west. Here in reflective peace I fell gray birch and redundant maple, or plot and execute engineering feats to reduce the trunk of a big blighted chestnut. I hear a cautious rustling, and a terrier's towzled face peers round a laurel bush. He rejoices on me with flying paws and quivering tail, then retires beyond range of the chips. Next come small bipeds, proprietors and managers of the dog, and there follow endless tea-drinking ceremonies with clean chips and stumps, much sitting on logs and talking of things in general with observations on the theory of tittlebats. If there is the less wood cut, there is the more left standing.

With the saw as with the axe, "easy does it," or in Uncle Everett's words, "It's all right ter try 's hard 's you've a min'ter, but it ain't no use ter try no harder than ye kin." "Best recipe I know," he told me, "ter keep a saw runnin' smooth, is ter slip it back 'n forth through a log a little while every day." No stick ever pinches his saw, for he has the only perfect sawbuck, an old scarred veteran that looks like the vaulting horse in the gymnasium, with hickory pegs set solidly in its back to hold the log as in a mitre-box. Next best is one you may make but can not buy, with three X-shaped supports so spaced that your stick is held firm its whole length and can not sag where you saw it. If you would know comfort, make this creature with legs so long that when you have set it a foot in the ground for rigidity it is still high enough not to kink your back. For a saw, get a "one-man cross-cut" with teeth like a shark's, and you will find sawing a contemplative recreation, for you may handle your saw as lightly as a fiddle-bow with no fear of its sticking, and discharging your batteries of nervous energy in crackles of profanity.

My fireplaces are genially catholic in their tastes. I could call over the whole catalogue of the trees and find scarce one, however commonly despised for firewood, of which they have not at one time or another made good use. Of elm, for example, I have never heard a good word spoken, but I have had praiseworthy service from it as a green backlog "to hold the fire." Its unpopularity is due to its tough, interwoven fibre which makes it almost impossible to split, and slow to season. Of blighted chestnut I have burned my share or a bit more, and well I know its skill in high-angle bombardment with incendiary sparks. It does not suit all moods, for it makes of sitting by the fire a lively, hilarious game instead of a period of innocuous coma. Use your chestnut sticks with discretion; put one on the fire when you have a caller who needs periodical awakening—he will talk fast enough when a cubic inch of red-hot charcoal lands in his lap, and will display great agility in hunting sparks off the rug while you apologize for the misbehavior of your fire. Of course, the best wood for other purposes is also the best wood to burn. Hickory seldom comes on my andirons, but rock maple is nearly as good, burning with an intense, steady glow to a fleecy white ash. But gray birch, almost useless for anything else, is the staple of my woodpile when I go after firewood per se. If it burns fast, it is also fast to grow and fast to cut, and to take it out of one's woods is as good a deed as to weed the garden. The trouble is that cutting only encourages it; Hydra is a pale figure for its performances at producing in incalculable ratio many heads for every one you lop. Pear, cherry, and apple, when bad luck in the orchard brings them to the hearth, make the best of fires, slow-burning, but with abundant, steady heat. Oak and ash, butternut and poplar, even tag alder and pussy willow, I have burned them all as chance and change have brought them under the axe, and all, whatever their faults, give out warmth and glow, and provide excellent wood-ashes for garden and lawn.

Breathes there the man who does not deem himself competent above all others to manage his fire; who is not jealous of it as of his honor at the hands of another? So I feel about my fire, and scarcely less so about my woodpile. To carry heavy loads of wood with aching arms from the shed to the study is no joy, but even when I have the choice, I do it myself rather than leave it to one who does not understand the blending of firewood. He will bring it to me all green or all dry, all birch or all chestnut. The result is either no fire at all, or else a fire that is about as comforting as a cocktail made by a man to whom all bottles look alike. Besides, I like to keep an eye on my woodpile in its waning no less than its waxing. Even now I have more words laid up than cordwood; I ground my axe yesterday, and I know where stands a wild cherry tree that is waiting its chance to corrupt the orchard with caterpillars.

ROBERT P. UTTER

Music

"The Birthday of the Infanta"—D'Erlanger's "Aphrodite"

THE end of the short season at the Lexington was more sensational than important. Apart from two ballets, by Americans, and some remarkable singing by Titta Ruffo, Bonci, and others in old-fashioned operas, it brought the production (the first performance in this country) of Camille d'Erlanger's much advertised "Aphrodite." Before touching on the work last named, a few words about the new American ballets.

In "Boudour," Felix Borowski, the Chicago critic, proved his ability to compose vivacious music for a theme which, although modified and changed in various ways, was plainly suggested by the Russian ballet, "Scheherazade." Technically, Mr. Borowski did credit to himself. But he said nothing new.

Vastly more interesting, musically and in other ways, was "The Birthday of The Infanta"—a charming and effective reconstruction, in ballet form, of one of Oscar Wilde's most fanciful tales for children. The creator of this very dainty dance-poem was John Alden Carpenter (like Mr. Borowski, of Chicago). He had himself arranged the plot to suit his purpose, while Adolph Bolm, the Russian, had devised the dances.

Nothing that our composers have invented has been more satisfying than "The Birthday of the Infanta," which, by the by, is Mr. Carpenter's first effort to write music for the operatic stage. It gives one hope of even better things to come—perhaps good operas. The story that it tells concerns the love of the grotesque and tragic Pedro for the young Princess, before whom he dances. To reward him, the Princess sends him a gift which he construes into a sign of love. His broken heart and death wind up the tale. Incidentally, we have light and amusing dances, quaint pageants, and costumes such as Velasquez has immortalized. Above all, we have a burlesque bull fight in an improvised Plaza de Toros and, at the end of the first scene (there are two scenes in Mr. Carpenter's witching ballet), a pageant, full of monstrously hooped skirts and lights and color.

In his score Mr. Carpenter has expressed many moods with unusual eloquence; some humorous, others dainty, graceful or tragical. His music has subtility and elegance. It is sometimes brilliant, often sad and haunting. The most serious charge that can be brought against it (and that must be brought) is that it is not always really new and personal. In one episode the composer quotes Debussy with too much subserviency. In another he harks back to the "Carmen" and "L'Arlésienne" of Bizet.

The success of the whole work was much enhanced by two stage scenes—each of them simple to a fault and very modern—invented by Robert Edmond Jones. The first showed a conventional outer court or garden, with a mountainous background. The second gave a hint of the interior of a gloomy chapel. Each picture seemed to harmonize with the moods of Wilde and his interpreter. Each was a model of unforced and fitting taste.

If stage pictures of themselves could kill an opera, those which distressed the eye in the "Aphrodite" of d'Erlanger would have been deadly. They were crude and rude, and very "cheap" indeed. But they were good enough as accessories in the performance of a worthless work.

The interest of the public had been whetted by the high prices charged for the rather doubtful privilege of hearing the opera. And many who attended the performance doubtless did so hoping for scandalous improprieties. Nor can they have been greatly disappointed. The operatic version of the story by Pierre Louys, now familiar to the general public in another and much more spectacular form, through the entertainment now on view at the Century Theatre, is quite unabashed and odiously frank. I need hardly say that it revolves around Chrysis, the courtesan, who, as the price of her sophisticated favors, forces Demetrics, her lover, to commit murder and sacrilege. As to details, there are analogies between "Thaïs," "The Jewels of the Madonna," and "Aphrodite." But, in the opera of d'Erlanger, things are far more cynically harped on than in the other works.

The composer's setting is strangely futile—a vague and tame rehash of Massenet and Charpentier, devoid, except in the long overture, or introduction, and at moments in the lascivious orgy served up as a ballet of inspiration. A Temple scene and a brutal Crucifixion episode, contrived for the opera, were omitted. For this most in the audience should have felt grateful to the Chicago management. A closing scene—a sort of epilogue—in which two sister courtesans of the seductive Chrysis were seen sorrowing at her grave, after she had expiated her ill deeds by drinking poison, might also have been spared us. It was rank anti-climax. No analysis of the music is called for. Only by the least musical and most debased in taste will it be remembered, except with weariness.

The one redeeming feature in the performance of "Aphrodite" at the Lexington was Mary Garden, who sang the difficult and often exacting rôle of the ignoble but quite irresistible heroine with charm and expression. Miss Garden was a picture of half-veiled and unveiled loveliness. She had dressed (I use the term for the sake of decency) the part most conscientiously. So far as the chief character was concerned, no one could grumble.

Edward Johnson, the American tenor, was less romantic and less lyrical than he might have been as Demetrios; and, in a minor part, Marie Claessens sang impressively.

CHARLES HENRY MELTZER

Drama

Problem-Plays in New York

RACHEL CROTHERS IN "HE AND SHE"—LIONEL BARRYMORE IN "THE LETTER OF THE LAW."

IT is very difficult to stage a play in one's brain. I had read Miss Rachel Crothers' "He and She" with sympathy, in 1917; I read it two weeks ago with a pleasure which my occupancy of a sick-bed at the moment did not blur. I thought it a genuine, though chastened and reticent, stage-play. My surprise was accordingly great to discover that on the boards of the Little Theatre the play visibly blanched and pined. I still nurse the hope that the guilt lay in the cast rather than the play. The actors, inexpert as a group, saw that the play was quiet, feared that a quiet play might drowse, and hallooed and whistled to keep it awake. The great mistake, however, lay in the decision of Miss Rachel Crothers to impersonate her own heroine. The artist and mother which Miss Crothers, the author, had put into Ann Herford, Miss Crothers, the actress, was unable to re-discover or reclaim. Ann Herford is a sculptor, a shaper of things with the hands, and I have never known an acted part that seemed to me so obviously manipulated. There was plenty of study and determination; there was no substance on which that study and determination could effectually act. In the final effect there was something hungry and grasping which belonged neither to Ann Herford nor, in all probability, to Miss Crothers, but to Miss Crothers' convulsive but imperfect hold upon her part. It is unlucky for "He and She" that its subject should have been anticipated, not in composition but performance, by one of the eminent stage-successes of the season in New York, Mr. James Forbes' "Famous Mrs. Fair."

Both these plays deal gravely with a timely and serious problem—the relation of executive or artistic force in woman to the claims of motherhood. War-work in Mrs. Fair's case, sculpture in Mrs. Herford's, detach the mother temporarily from the child. The daughters rush into unimaginable follies, and are saved in the end by the mothers' passionate repudiation of every claim except the claim of contrite and self-spurning motherhood. This conduct is dramatically sound; the trouble is that, in seeming at least, the cry of an impassioned heart in the exaltation of a critical moment is presented as the final solution of a difficult and many-sided problem.

You may draw from "He and She" a thesis that is sound and tame, that in a conflict between motherhod and art the claims of motherhood are first. You may also put its thesis in a form which is bold, interesting, certainly questionable, and probably false, that no mother has the right to be a sculptor. It is not the first time that the problem-drama offers us the sorry choice between a sound but futile generality and a vivid but untrustworthy particular. To grant the priority of motherhood in case of conflict is not to grant that conflict is inevitable. In nine cases out of ten what is wanted is not heroism, but common sense, not sacrifice, but wise accommodation. Drama insists on the tenth case; that is its right as drama; the tenth case, the extreme case, is its property. If it wrote "Tenth Case" over its play, its conduct would be quite honest and quite harmless, but the more it poses as social instructor, the harder and harder do such acknowledgments become. Social science insists on the middle case, the type-case; that is its right as social science. What is left for drama, in its rôle of social philosopher, to do except to declare that the extreme case is typical?

(Continued on page 264)

The Pioneers

The Crocker-Wheeler Company is the pioneer manufacturer of commercial motors. Throughout an experience of more than 30 years the quality standards upon which this business was founded have been unbudgingly upheld.

The slightly higher cost of C-W motors pays for uninterrupted operating cost and longest life.

President

Crocker-Wheeler Co.

Ampere, N. J.

NEW YORK	PITTSBURGH
BOSTON	NEWARK
SYRACUSE	NEW HAVEN
CHICAGO	PHILADELPHIA
CLEVELAND	BALTIMORE
BINGHAMTON	SAN FRANCISCO

TIFFANY & CO.

DIAMOND AND GEM MERCHANTS

PEARLS DIAMONDS JEWELRY
SILVERWARE WATCHES CLOCKS
CHINA AND STATIONERY

EFFICIENT SERVICE BY MAIL

FIFTH AVENUE & 37TH STREET
NEW YORK

E. P. DUTTON & CO.

have just published a remarkably interesting book in

A Cloud of Witnesses
By ANNA DE KOVEN (Mrs. Reginald de Koven) $2.50

A record of personal experience which has given Mrs. de Koven such extraordinary and indisputable evidence of spirit communication that she has felt it her duty to the world to declare the facts. Dr. James H. Hyslop, the distinguished psychist, in an Introduction vouches for the good faith and the seriousness with which the experiments recorded were undertaken.

IMPORTANT BOOKS ON PSYCHIC MATTERS.

Voices from the Void
By HESTER TRAVERS SMITH $2.00

A record, the result of six years' study of automatic writing. Mr. Henry Holt writes: "I am tempted to say that the one hundred best pages written on psychical research are in this little book."

On the Threshold of the Unseen
By Sir WILLIAM F. BARRETT $2.50

"The best book of its kind in English." "The standard text-book on matters connected with the borderland of the unseen," say those who know.

The Reality of Psychic Phenomena
By W. J. CRAWFORD $2.00

A record of experiments with delicate physical apparatus which foreshadow radical modifications of the accepted theory of matter and spirit.

IN PREPARATION.

Proofs of the Spirit World
By L. CHEVREUIL Ready very shortly

A lucid analysis of representative reports of Psychical Societies, etc., which aims to determine if the evidence of survival is decisive.

Obtainable from any bookseller, or may be ordered direct from
E. P. DUTTON & CO., 681 Fifth Ave., New York

(Continued from page 262)

Miss Crothers proves her theorem by a special case the particulars of which are, of course, absolutely at her own disposal. But even here her embarrassments are great. The mother sends her daughter to boarding-school. Miss Crothers, however, has to reckon with an audience that knows that girls are sent to boarding-schools by mothers who are not sculptors, and are very good mothers indeed. What is left? The sculptor-mother refuses to let her daughter come home for the Easter vacation, and in this invaluable fortnight the Devil and Miss Crothers get in their work. The girl is at the school, and we get forward only on assumption that girls are unsafe in vacation in the same places and hands in which they are safe in school-time. But we are thankful to get forward at all. The girl's brains have next to be immolated to the thesis, and one regrets that in a drama which sets out to prove that friezes are worth less than girls, the frieze should be excellent and the girl vapid. I will not follow the case into all its details; the difficulties, as I think, are plain. Miss Crothers herself is less to blame than the disparity between drama and social science, the difficulty of adjusting an art which is anything but discriminative to the necessities of a science of which discrimination is the soul. The trouble lies in the fact that drama, if it teaches to any purpose, must teach common sense, and that the business of common sense in this unromantic world is to destroy the occasions for drama.

Eugène Brieux is one of the most honest men alive, and the hope of a decent, kind, and upright France, which might be clouded by a perusal of his works, is rekindled by the thought of their author. The retort to Brieux's France is—Brieux. The largeness of his spirit is finely evident in the hand reached out to America in "Les Américains chez Nous," from which the February number of La France has reprinted a discerning extract. The man is half artist, half dramatist, wholly crusader. Such a rôle might have made a German, possibly an Englishman, intolerably heavy; but this man sprang of a vivacious and dramatic race, and, if Brieux himself be a trifle solid, France is sprightly even in Brieux. He has given himself to the problem-play with a Dickensian mixture of artlessness and energy, and some of his work reveals the peril of a combination of drama and science both in the weight which it takes from science and the weight which it adds to drama. One might wish, perhaps, that the scope of Brieux's attack on social evils had been less extensive. It is hard to believe that a man whose work proves that he was half a novice in his own specialty was an expert in a dozen other fields. The combination of philosopher and dramatist may sometimes evade the censure which either part would severally attract. Has he defects in knowledge? We excuse them in a dramatist. Has he blunders in dramatic art? They are venial in a philosopher.

Brieux's art is best when simplest; the "Red Robe," inaptly called the "Letter of the Law" in the English rendering at the Criterion, is a play of large area—and, what is more to be dreaded—ill-defined frontiers. It is a large, loose, decentralized attempt to prove that the French judiciary—impenetrable to gold—is pervious to every other species of corruption. Its power is less the power of a play than of a speech; Brieux is the prosecutor of the whole judiciary. Narrative of a kind is present, but there is no current in the narrative; it loses itself in the exposition as a stream merges in a pond.

A further difficulty arises from the fact that there are primary and secondary interests in the play, and that the interests which are primary in importance are secondary in power. At the end a judge is stabbed by a peasant woman, and his colleagues, pouring in from the corridor, exclaim: "Another vacancy." Murder is subordinated to epigram. It is as if Brieux had taken up the dagger reddened by the crime, and slit an envelope with the still dripping edge. In the second act, likewise, a man accused of murder is examined by a magistrate. Brieux's eye, the play's eye, is on the prosecutor, but who can persuade an audience to look at a magistrate when a cutthroat, real or supposititious, is in the field of view? A lighter treatment, a treatment modeled on that of Gogol in the "Inspector-General" or perhaps on that of Le Sage in "Turcaret," would have been deadlier in the end. Indeed, in this play, the rare comic strokes are the strokes of power. In Madame Vagret a society that eats, drinks, and breathes promotion is caricatured, and its passage into caricature completes the proof of its reality.

An inoffensive and uninteresting cast, to which Miss Doris Rankin and Mr. Charles White impart vigor in certain episodes of peasant life, need not arrest us in our passage to Mr. Lionel Barrymore's exuberantly sordid Mouzon. Mouzon is a vulgar rascal; the actor's task is to make him odious, yet keep him tolerable; and Mr. Barrymore's success in this ticklish enterprise is considerable. He made Mouzon despicable, yet protected him from our contempt. The original point in Mouzon is that he is both jovial and stony; or, if the reader pleases, he is hard and unctuous like a waxed floor. In the rendering of this combination Mr. Barrymore was happy; he even put shading into a character to which Brieux has not been liberal of shades. Mr. Barrymore's Mouzon is a really able performance. Whether ability spent on such an object is finally remunerative is a point on which I can not free my mind from indecision.

O. W. FIRKINS

The Advertisees

YOU know them, of course. Every magazine devotes pages and pages to them; you are sure to find some member of the family in any newspaper you may pick up. They are the Advertisees.

It was my good fortune to visit them during the printers' strike recently. Many of them were taking their first vacation in years, and time hung heavily on their hands. But they were happy, very happy, so happy that they seemed not quite—well, you know.

Grandfather met me at the door. As he opened the door he rattled the knob proudly and said, "It locks." I remembered that that was the slogan of the Yell & Pound Lock Company. (A rival firm had been campaigning with the slogan "It unlocks." Grandfather did not approve of this.)

I had been walking fast. "Rather warm," I remarked as we entered the sitting-room.

"Ah, not if you wear Neverich Underwear. See?" He rolled up his trousers to show me. At that moment practically the whole family trooped down the stairs, and like a well-trained chorus, shouted, "So do we! We wear Neverich." Smiling, they surrounded me and started to undress. I assured them that I could believe without seeing. And I was relieved when Father slapped me on the back and exclaimed heartily, "You are just in time for dinner. Come in and sit down with us."

I followed him into the dining-room and took my place at a large table. As I pulled back my chair to sit down, it slid from my hand and caromed across the floor.

"Oh, I should have told you before," Mother apologized. "All of our chairs are fitted with Nobs of Noiselessness. 'They glide.'"

Thinking that I might not believe her, the rest of the family coasted about the room on their chairs until I began to fear a collision and begged them to stop.

With indelible cheerfulness they gradually composed themselves, and a servant in a handsome livery brought in a silver tureen and set it on the table. Father raised the cover and beamed with satisfaction as the steam floated up. "I eat Macpherson's Macerated Mushine," he murmured devoutly. "I also," added Grandfather, who looked exactly like Father except that his hair was white. "I have always used Macpherson's Macerated Mushine," echoed Baby, who

(Continued on page 266)

THE EQUITABLE

LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY OF THE U. S.

120 BROADWAY, NEW YORK

The year 1919 was the most productive in the Equitable's history.

NEW INSURANCE issued and paid for in 1919 .... $454,839,437

An increase of $181,615,878 over the previous year.

During the year the Two Billion mark in Outstanding Insurance was passed.

OUTSTANDING INSURANCE, Dec. 31, 1919 .... $2,270,903,931

An increase of $346,365,353 over the previous year.

PAID TO POLICYHOLDERS IN 1919 .... $73,990,176

97% of the domestic death claims paid in 1919 were settled within one day after receipt of proofs of death

PAID POLICYHOLDERS Since Organization $1,302,291,677

ASSETS, December 31, 1919		$599,423,919
INSURANCE RESERVE	$493,390,577
Other Liabilities	17,418,765	510,809,342
SURPLUS RESERVES:
For distribution to policyholders in 1920	17,191,084
Awaiting apportionment on deferred dividend policies	54,300,085
For Contingencies	17,123,408	$88,614,577
		$599,423,919

The above figures are from the 60th Annual Statement which will be sent to any address on request.

The Equitable issues all standard forms of life insurance and annuities, including the following:

A LIFE INCOME POLICY
under which the beneficiary receives a monthly income for life—the safest and the best kind of insurance for family protection.

A GROUP POLICY
by which an employer protects the families of his employes.

A CORPORATE POLICY
to safeguard business interests.

A CONVERTIBLE POLICY which can be modified from time to time to meet changing conditions.

AN INCOME BOND
to provide for the declining years of the purchaser.

AN ENDOWMENT ANNUITY POLICY
maturing at age 65, providing thereafter an income for life.

AN EDUCATIONAL POLICY providing a fund for the college training of a son or daughter.

A CASH REFUND LIFE ANNUITY under which the total return may be more, but can never be less than the purchase price.

The following provisions will be added to the policy when desired:

1. In case of total and permanent disability:

(a) Premiums will cease. (b) The Insured will receive a monthly income. (c) The beneficiary will receive full face of policy at maturity.

2. Double the face of the policy will be paid in case of death from Accident.

A non-cancellable Accident and Health policy completes the circle of Equitable protection.

W. A. DAY
President

(Continued from page 264)
looked exactly like Grandfather except that he didn't have any hair.

I was given a large plate of the tasteless, colorless stuff, and as I was endeavoring to choke down a hunk of it I became alarmed at the apearance of Aunt Clara, who sat opposite me. I had never seen any one so haggard and emaciated; her skin was yellow and there were dark circles about her eyes. For a moment I expected her to faint, but she summoned strength enough to reach for a glass of water. Dropping a blue pill into it, she gasped "Before," and drank. Immediately her cheeks grew pink and plump, her gray hair turned to gold, and crying "After!" in a triumphant tone, she dashed to the sideboard and wrote a testimonial.

Cousin Ralph was late. He came in just as Baby was pleading, "More Mushine, please. And be sure that it is Macpherson's. Seven thousand eminent physicians state that it can not harm the growing child."

Ralph dashed into the room with his face half lathered, and a safety razor in his hand. When he saw me he grinned and shouted, "It shaves!" All the family applauded; Ralph says such clever things, and he has appeared on the back-cover of every magazine in the country.

"My dear," said Grandmother to little Bobby, "you may run the Simpo Washing Machine. 'A child can operate it.'"

"Oh, thank you," said little Bobby, "and may I develop my power and personality in ten days, if I be good?"

Grandmother's reply was interrupted by a confusion in the hall. Edythe, the eldest daughter, the beauty of the family, entered and flung her arms about Father.

"Why, darling," Father exclaimed. "What's the matter?"

"I asked for a tube of Molar Sunshine."

"Naturally," commented Father. "We use no other brand."

"But this brute, this scoundrel, offered me something he said was 'just as good.' He tried to sell me a substitute!"

"Good Lord!" Father jumped to his feet in anger. "It's a crime against your honor and your copyright! The fiend! I'll get him for this."

Murmuring something about "the unwritten law," he started for the door, brandishing a revolver.

"Be careful with that gun!" I cried.

He stopped and turned to me with the same benevolent smile he had worn a few moments before. His old habit had conquered his new passion.

"There's no danger with this revolver," he explained. "It's a Hitt & Missen Automatic, and it's perfectly safe. You can jiggle the trigger. 'It won't shoot.' For sale at all dealers."

WEARE HOLBROOK

Books and the News

Turkey

ONCE more the Turkish Empire seems to be drawing back into Asia, and again its claws cling around Constantinople. Will our Allies permit this? Can the American Executive, whose prestige is so diminished, prevent it? The severest indictment of Turkey can be found in the histories of Armenia (some of which were named in this department of the Review on November 1, 1919), but a few books on Turkey will be interesting now. Many of them are by writers influenced by the romantic charm of the East, or by the amiability of the people they knew, and these, if read alone, without the antidote of history—especially the history of Armenia—do not lead to clear thinking on international politics. One may be too far from a country and its people to see the truth—or too near. Witness a number of learned gentlemen in America who were unable to see anything evil in the events in Belgium in 1914-15, because they viewed affairs through a prismatic glass created for them by an hour or two at the Kaiser's luncheon table, where the food was evidently good and the Imperial host most condescending. So the romantic writers upon the charm of the Orient must be salted with the bitter salt of historical fact.

A brief history of Turkey is Stanley Lane-Poole's "Story of Turkey" (Putnam). A longer, older work is the "History of the Ottoman Turks," by E. S. Creasy, which derives from the learned German, von Hammer Purgstall. Two commentaries upon recent history are F. G. Aflalo's "Regilding the Crescent" (Lippincott, 1911), concerning the results of the revolution prior to the great war, and E. F. Benson's indictment, "The Crescent and Iron Cross" (Doran, 1918).

For the history, family life, and religion of the Ottomans, as well as of other races in the Turkish Empire, there is Sir Edwin Pears's "Turkey and Its People" (Methuen, 1911). The writings of Lucy Garnett upon Turkey are important. They include "Turkish Life in Town and Country" (Putnam, 1904), "The Turkish People" (Methuen, 1909), for the social and domestic life, and "Turkey of the Ottomans" (Scribner). In "Turkey and the Turks" (Pott, 1911) Z. D. Ferriman describes the people, their life, and customs. Stanwood Cobb takes a favorable view in "The Real Turk" (Pilgrim Press, 1914). Sidney Whitman's "Turkish Memories" (Scribner, 1914) tells of his visits to Turkey between 1896 and 1908, with historical chapters for that period, and comments upon the land and the people.

Two famous stylists have described Constantinople—Edmondo De Amicis in his "Constantinople" (Putnam) and Théophile Gautier in a book with the same title. Both books have been rendered into English. Three recent writers upon the Sultan's capital are H. G. Dwight, whose "Constantinople, Old and New" (Scribner, 1915), is interesting and well illustrated; W. H. Hutton, who, in "Constantinople: the Story of the Old Capital of the Empire" (Dent, 1900), has written a brief and attractive history (it is in the Medieval Towns Series), and Alexander Van Millingen, whose "Constantinople" (Black, 1906) is also notable for colored pictures by Warwick Goble. Art, architecture, history, and travel are combined in Anna Bowman Dodd's "In the Palaces of the Sultan" (Dodd, 1903).

EDMUND LESTER PEARSON

Books Received

FICTION

Aranha, Graca. Canaan. Translated from the Portuguese by Mariano J. Lorente. Introd. by G. Ferrero. Four Seas Co. $2 net.
Bain, F. W. The Substance of a Dream. Putnam.
Brooks, Charles S. Luca Sarto. Century. $1.75 net.
Daviess, Maria T. The Matrix. Century.
Hewlett, Maurice. The Outlaw. Dodd, Mead.
Hutten, Baroness von. Happy House. Doran.
MacNamara, Brinsley. The Clanking of Chains. Brentano's.
McKenna, Stephen. Sheila Intervenes. Doran.
Miln, Louise J. Mr. Wu. Stokes. $1.75 net.
Serao, Matilde. Souls Divided.

BIOGRAPHY AND HISTORY

Aslan, Kevork. Armenia and the Armenians. Macmillan. $1.25.
Boswell, A. B. Poland and the Poles. Dodd, Mead.
Firkins, O. W. Jane Austen. Holt. $1.75.
Pepper, Chas. M. The Life and Times of Henry Gassaway Davis. Century.
Van der Essen, Léon. A Short History of Belgium. Univ. of Chicago Press. $1.50 net.

DRAMA AND MUSIC

Huneker, James. Bedouins. Scribner. $2 net.

GOVERNMENT AND ECONOMICS

Brasol, Boris. Socialism vs. Civilization. Scribner. $2 net.
Goricar, Joseph, and Stowe, Lyman Beecher. The Inside Story of Austro-German Intrigue. Doubleday, Page.
Keynes, J. M. The Economic Consequences of the Peace. Harcourt, Brace and Howe.
Lippman, Walter. Liberty and the News. Harcourt, Brace and Howe.
Lynd, Robert. Ireland, A Nation. Dodd, Mead.
Montgomery, R. H. Excess Profits Tax Procedure, 1920. Ronald Press.
The American Labor Year Book, 1919-1920 Vol. III. Edited by Alexander Trachtenberg Rand School of Social Science. $2 net.
York, Thomas. Foreign Exchange: Theory and Practice. Ronald Press.

LITERATURE

McFayden, Donald. The History of the Title Imperator Under the Roman Empire University of Chicago Press.

THE REVIEW

Vol. 2, No. 45 | New York, Saturday, March 20, 1920 | FIFTEEN CENTS

Contents

Brief Comment 267

Editorial Articles:

What Kansas is Doing About Labor 269

The Stock Dividend Case 271

Irish Surprises 272

Russia's Substitute for "Wage Slavery" 273

Experimental Allegiances. Part I. By W. J. Ghent 275

The Plight of Russian Peasants. By Jerome Landfield 276

The Erzberger-Helfferich Trial and the Aftermath. By Christian Gauss 277

Correspondence 279

Book Reviews:

Republicanism in China 281

A Treatise for the Man in the Shop 282

L'Affaire Caillaux 283

Three Ways of Looking at Ireland 284

The Run of the Shelves 285

The Company Stores at Lawrence. By Staff Correspondent 286

Church Unity. By Theologian 287

Drama:

Percy Mackaye's "George Washington" and St. John Ervine's "Jane Clegg." By O. W. Firkins 288

Music:

David Bispham's Memoirs. By Charles Henry Meltzer 289

Educational Section 290

Books and the News: Woman Suffrage. By Edmund Lester Pearson 294

BY the time this issue of the Review reaches our readers the treaty vill probably have arrived at the inal stage of failure in the Senate. That faint possibility which, two veeks ago, we pointed out has not developed, as indeed there was little eason to hope that it would. On neither side of the quarrel has there been manifested any trace of that argeness of mind which befits the ssue, and for the lack of which the ountry has been dragged through an xperience upon which one can not eflect without a feeling of shame almost as deep as of regret. It ought ot to be necessary for the Review to xplain that in saying this we do not mpute low aims or dishonest purose to those whose position was at ither extreme or in the middle. What we do mean is that, from whatver standpoint the subject may be viewed, those upon whom the duty chiefly rested of bringing matters to some kind of tolerable conclusion in a reasonable time fell shockingly far below any respectable standard of statesmanlike conduct. The President's arrogant and offensive attitude, and his failure to bring to bear upon the question any resources either of argument or of conciliation, form one side of the picture. The meaningless shiftings of position, and the absence of the essentials of leadership, on the part of Senator Lodge form another side, on which it is hardly pleasanter to dwell. There were deeper elements in the case, to be sure. The discussion of these may be postponed until the final result has actually been recorded. In the meanwhile, one can but be filled with mortification at the story so far as it has gone, while cherishing a faint glimmer of hope that the end of it may prove other than now seems certain.

THE ease and swiftness with which the counter-revolution at Berlin was put through has proved to be no evidence of its strength. The plot was evidently well engineered, and was carried out with all the advantage of the discipline and skill which the Prussian militarists have so abundantly at their command. But they seem once more to have underestimated the power of the human factors against which they are arrayed. If, as seems highly probable, they counted on powerful support from the Socialist extremists who hated the moderate Ebert régime for reasons opposite to their own, they have been disappointed in their sinister calculation. In the chief German states other than Prussia they encountered immediately the resistance of the established Governments. As for the masses of the German people in general, it seems clear that they are ready to use against the Junkers the weapon of the strike, a weapon peculiarly powerful in the present economic condition of Germany. As we go to press, the indications are that the Ebert Government will put up an uncompromising fight, with the prospect of a speedy dislodgment of the usurpers.

"AN overdue attempt" the Junker party's coup d'état was called in the proclamation issued by the new Government. Overdue it may have been from the standpoint of internal politics, for the militarists might have made an even more successful haul, perhaps, in the troubled waters of last year's labor unrest, when the Spartacans seemed not averse to an alliance with the reaction. But in the light of the international situation the adventure seems rather immature than overdue. Dr. Kapp and his associates chose a most inopportune moment for what he calls "the laying of the foundations for the economic resuscitation of Germany." This is the voice of the incorrigible Prussian. At the very time when, partly under the impression of urgent representations of both the authorities and the press in Germany, the British and Italian Premiers, under protest of their French colleague, draw up a plan for the economic rescue of the Empire, the bankrupts announce to the astonished world that they will resuscitate themselves. The manifesto of the Supreme Council is impertinently scorned as a superfluous act of unsolicited generosity. Thus that "most influential leadership" which, according to President Wilson, has of late gained "ascendancy in the counsels of France" is entitled to a frank admission, by those who accused it of militaristic aims, that events in Berlin have justified its insistence on military preparedness against a revival of Prussian militarism.

FOR that is what this revolution, if it should be maintained or revived, will come to. Cheap promises to "use every effort to maintain internal and external peace," gratuitous phrases about "the vital interest to foreign countries not to have a Government in Germany which in any way could or might endanger the peace of Europe," can not delude anyone as to the real purposes that these "Umstürzler" have in view. A Government headed by the founder and former president of the "Vaterlandspartei" is bound to initiate, sooner or later, a policy of revenge. That outspoken character is, indeed, also its great weakness. For to the non-Prussian German it means a resumption of Prussia's military and political leadership, and the other states are not at all inclined to support a policy for whose success that hated supremacy is a conditio sine qua non. "Attempts to separate from the Empire," the new Government immediately found it necessary to announce, "will be dealt with by court-martial as high treason."

EVERYTHING is going well with the Turk. Lloyd George's threat of drastic measures to be taken at Constantinople appears to have been an empty word, having no other effect than heightened self-confidence for the Porte. Syria, which was to receive a French protectorate as a blessing from Allah, has proclaimed her independence, and takes to the blackmail policy of demanding her recognition from the Powers under threat of joining the Turkish Nationalists under Mustapha Kemal, if she does not get her wish. The Christian population in Jerusalem protests against the Zionist invasion, and seems ready to support the Mohammedans in their agitation against the severance of Palestine from Syria. In Mesopotamia plans are said to be on foot to proclaim the country a state, which, under the regency of a younger brother of Prince Feisal, now King Feisal of Syria, is to form a joint Government with the latter country. The revolution in Berlin has brought the associates of Enver Pasha and Talaat Pasha into power again, and causes France to concentrate all her watchfulness on the further development of affairs in Germany. And meanwhile the Premiers of the three great Powers are patiently waiting for the opinion of Washington on their decisions with regard to the Sublime Porte.

IT is reported that Congress will this year abandon the free distribution of seeds. The apartment dweller will no longer receive his five tiny packets—beets, usually, and lettuce, and marigolds, were there not? We forget the others. But there was always the touching request that in return for its bounty the Government would dearly like to know of our success with the little seeds. We, too, always felt a desire to know what became of them. We trust they fell on good ground, and that the earth was made fruitful and glad by their power. But of course we never did know what ultimately happened to the contents of the waste basket. Congress no doubt regrets the discontinuance of the practice; it loves to give things away. Perhaps it is trying to console itself for the lost seeds by taking an interest in a bonus for the ex-soldiers.

Seed distribution began with the laudable motive of aiding in the testing and introduction of new or improved varieties of useful plants. This was a perfectly legitimate aim, but the development of agricultural experiment stations, both national and state, furnished a far more effective instrument. Deprived thus of its one possible reason for being, seed distribution from Washington sunk rapidly into one of the pettiest of all pilferings of public funds for the purpose of making the folks back home think that their Congressman had not forgotten them. In just what remote corner of the country the game any longer has the pragmatic sanction of "working," no one has been able to find out; and yet the farce has gone on. One of the blessings of an intelligently organized national budget system should be its facilities for discovering and checking a multitude of treasury leaks of this kind.

THERE will be no general strike in England to force nationalization of the mining industry, not just yet, as Mr. Veblen would put it. Last week, 524,000 miners voted in favor of such a policy, and 346,000 against it. The miners agreed, however, to abide by the decision of the Trade Union Congress, to be rendered the following day. In this body the miners' demand for "direct action" was presented by their Secretary, Mr. Hodges, and opposed by J. H. Thomas, leader of the railwaymen, Thomas Shaw, Secretary of the textile workers, and John R. Clynes, President of the National Union of General Workers, and former Food Controller. Tom Mann supported Mr. Hodges. In the vote immediately following, cast by the delegates in attendance, who held proxies for the entire membership of their local unions, the general strike lost by the overwhelming majority of 2,820,000 in a total vote of 4,920,000; in other words, those who took the conservative side of the question immediately at issue outvoted the radicals by nearly four to one.

WE have no very full report of the discussion which led up to this vote, but cabled extracts from the speech of John R. Clynes are significant. "The man who would most welcome direct action," he said, "is not at this conference, but is in Downing Street. If we announce a general strike, the Premier will give us a general election, in which we would find our class rent in twain, while the other classes would be united to fight what would be called this aggressive move by labor." The issue in such a contest, he predicted, would be the conduct of the laboring classes themselves, and not the question whether nationalization would work an improvement in industry. "Force, as it has been proposed to employ it," he added, "is not a British but a Prussian characteristic."

When a speech of this kind is sustained by almost a four-fifths vote, it is evident that the British laboring classes are in no mood to seek nationalization of industry at the cost of violent revolution. In choosing, as they did by a second vote, to work for nationalization through ordinary political methods, they voluntarily assume the burden of proving to the majority of British voters that it is wise. And in the open and protracted discussion thus insured, they of course assume the risk of having it proved to the satisfaction of a very large portion of their own number that it is unwise. This is genuine democracy in action, and gives promise that England may settle down to the work of post bellum reconstruction with some assurance of industrial stability and prosperity.

THE vogue of evolution was supposed to have put an uncompromising "never" into the old saw that "history repeats itself." North Dakota's Commissioner of Immigration, however, who has been in the East hunting up prospective citizens for the realm of the Non-Partisan League, tells a story to the contrary. League politics has gone back to the simplicity of primitive Rome. Like Cincinnatus when summoned to the dictatorship, Lynn J. Frazier was at home at the plow, wholly unsuspicious of any impending change of fortune, when men came to tell him that he had been nominated to be Governor of his State. We are not told whether, like Cincinnatus, he was first enjoined to send his wife back to the house for his toga, that the news might be received in raiment sufficiently dignified for its importance. But Virgil's nudus ara—plow naked—is a detail of Roman simplicity a little too exacting for one who has to plow in the blasts that come down from Medicine Hat over the plains of North Dakota. And for still other reasons Governor Frazier's friends can not afford to press the parallel too closely. Cincinnatus was once more called away from his plow, this time to quell by force an uprising of the discontented masses, then known as "plebeians." A little study of the original sources may convince Governor Frazier that it will be well to switch the Cincinnatus parallel of his nomination at the first available sidetrack. The Roman farmer who could get his name into the official calendar in the days of Cincinnatus was altogether too individualistic and aristocratic to hold the respect of the socialistic Non-Partisan Leaguers, if once they find him out.

THE smallest newspaper in the world is called Better Times. It is a monthly magazine, rather, with illustrations, special departments, the whole apparatus, in fact, "and are to be sold," as the bibliopoles put it, for half a dollar a year. Its aim is to keep the public aware of the work of the Neighborhood Homes of New York. Settlement work comes to the present problem of "Americanization" with thirty years of experience behind it. The public should accept the modest and highly proper invitation to examine the work of the Settlements in this and other fields.

WITH this issue, the Review initiates a special Educational Section. It has for its purpose careful discussion of the manifold educational tendencies which are observable throughout the nation to-day. Like the good democrats they are, the American people, having done their duty in the conflict of arms, now turn with renewed enthusiasm to the one institution which can safeguard their future—education. The impulse is commendable, but it harbors a danger which, if not seen, may produce a mass of disillusion comparable to that which political "idealists" are already beginning to experience from having built up hopes of an entirely new world emerging from the war. Education is now relied upon to create simon-pure Americans. It is charged with propaganda which may set our teeth on edge, if it is not checked by common sense discussion. In its Educational Section the Review plans, by means of collaborators throughout the country, to keep in touch with the new impulses. It desires to promote the effort to increase and vivify instruction, both of youth and of adults, but at the same time to help to keep education within the bounds which it must respect if it is to be a truly vital and wholesome force in our life as a nation.

What Kansas is Doing About Labor

THE police strike in Boston made Governor Coolidge a national figure. The crisis in Kansas, brought about by the great bituminous coal strike, has made Governor Allen a national figure. Between the two situations, as well as between the proceedings of the two governors, there were striking points of resemblance. In both cases the vital interests of the community were acutely menaced. In both cases the head of the State planted himself on the paramount rights of the commonwealth, and appealed with signal success to the support of the great mass of its citizens. In both cases the lesson was impressively taught that no group, however strong its apparent position, can, in an American State, achieve its end by methods which arouse the resentment of the great body of right-minded citizens.

But the problem with which Governor Allen had to deal was incomparably broader and more complex than that which confronted Governor Coolidge. In Massachusetts the issue was that of the supremacy of government in a domain which belonged unquestionably and exclusively to it. In Kansas it was necessary to assert the jurisdiction of the government in a field in which its functions are of limited application—to extend them beyond their usual bounds on the ground of imperious public necessity. Governor Allen did not hesitate. The people were not to be allowed to starve and freeze while the mine owners and the mine workers were fighting out their differences. As a temporary measure he obtained through the courts the power to operate the mines; and to prevent the recurrence of similar evils he procured from the Legislature the passage of a bill establishing a "Court of Industrial Relations," with powers so broad that, if it shall prove a success in practice, no such disturbance of the life of the people can again be possible.

Both phases of this remarkable story are worthy of the most serious attention. It is worth noting in the first place that Governor Allen, in his writings and speeches on the subject, clearly recognizes that there was wrong on both sides in the coal dispute itself. The miners had a just grievance—as the Review has stated all along—in that holding them to their war contract long after the real close of the war was grossly inequitable and based on the worst kind of technicality. On the other hand, the demands of the miners themselves were utterly unreasonable. But the thing that was intolerable was their attempt to extort what they wanted by a threat designed to intimidate not the mine owners but the whole people of the State and of the country. What made Governor Allen's achievement so splendid was the promptness with which he asserted the paramount rights of the public, and the effectiveness with which he marshaled in support of them the voluntary efforts of thousands of stalwart Kansans. It would be hard to find a more inspiriting picture of patriotic energy, and cheerful sacrifice, than that presented by the host of young men from town and country who responded to the Governor's call. They at once began operating the mines, flooded and dismantled as many of them were, in the midst of bitter winter weather. It took but a few days of this to bring the miners to their senses. Within two weeks the strike was over. The example is one that will long remain a landmark, a guide to the people of every State in the Union.

The establishment of the Court of Industrial Relations raises questions that are more difficult. As an experiment, it will undoubtedly prove of great value. Its object is broadly stated in the following declaration:

> It is hereby declared and determined to be necessary for the public peace, health, and general welfare of the people of this State that the industries, employments, public utilities, and common carriers herein specified shall be operated with reasonable continuity and efficiency in order that the people of this State may live in peace and security and be supplied with the necessaries of life.

The chief means by which this object is to be attained is the substitution of the decisions of the court for the methods of the strike and the lockout in the settlement of disputes in the industries coming within its scope. There is nothing in the law that interferes either with labor organizations or with collective bargaining; but neither the strike nor the lockout can be resorted to. If the parties can not settle their differences by mutual agreement they must refer them to the court. The law makes no provision for arbitration. On the contrary, Governor Allen assigns as perhaps the chief reason for the establishment of the court the inefficacy of arbitration, which he feels that experience has shown to be incapable of bringing about just and stable settlements. "Arbitration," he says, "holds no guaranty of justice to either side," and adds:

> When each side appoints an arbitrator and these two select a third party, this umpire may do one of three things: He may join one side or the other and obtain a partisan decision, or he may dicker back and forth and obtain a temporary compromise which does not satisfy either side.

On the other hand, the Court of Industrial Relations "represents government, with all its pledge of justice."

If one inquires as to the principles by which the new court will be guided in its decisions, one finds little in the way of an answer except that it will be governed by the principles of common sense. It will feel its way. It will try to settle each case in such a way that plain men will feel that it has given a "square deal" to both sides—or rather all three sides, labor, capital, and the public. The three members of the court are to be appointed on the same principle as the members of any court are appointed, not as representatives of any side, but simply as men pledged to do what is right. The result will be watched with keen interest. Kansas will be doing what our Federal system has enabled so many of our States to do in so many directions—working out an important experiment within her own borders, the trying of which on a national scale would involve great difficulties and enormous risk. The rest of us should look on with every wish that the experiment may, either directly or through the lessons that it will teach, prove a great contribution to the solution of the labor problem. But to acclaim it, in advance of experience, as being manifestly the key to the situation, would be rash in the extreme.

"Justice" is an easy word to say, but a very difficult word to define. Governor Allen's enthusiastic reliance on the analogy between the decision of civil and criminal cases by judicial process and this proposed settlement of labor disputes by judicial process overlooks an essential element. It is true that the time was when individuals used to fight out issues which now everybody leaves to the courts; but the justice which the courts mete out does not consist in an assignment to each party of what the court thinks is naturally his due, but in a determination of what the law commands. When a court decides that a certain piece of property belongs to A and not to B, it does so on the basis of contracts, or title deeds, or the like. When A sticks a knife into B, the court does not inquire whether he stuck it no deeper than his grievance justified, but whether he did it at all. Of an entirely different nature are those questions which come up in the chief labor disputes. The work that this new court will have to do will, after all, be essentially of the nature of arbitration.

It does not in the least follow that the court will be a failure. On the contrary, the more it confines itself to that modest function, and the less it attempts to dispense anything like abstract "justice," the more likely it is to succeed. We must wait and see. When New Zealand introduced compulsory arbitration, and for a number of years after, that country was pointed to as the pioneer that was blazing the way for the rest of the world to the goal of industrial peace. All that has gone by; and now here is our own progressive Kansas basing her new departure chiefly on the fact of the failure of the New Zealand idea. In this there need be no discouragement, but sensible men must see in it a warning. Let us watch Kansas with hope and with friendly interest, but let us keep our heads. And in the meanwhile, the best of good luck to Governor Allen, a right-minded, stout-hearted, and level-headed American!

The Stock Dividend Case

THE reasons why a stock dividend can not justly be regarded as income are stated with such lucidity and force by Mr. Justice Pitney, who delivered the opinion of the Supreme Court, that the first feeling one must have in reading that opinion is a feeling of wonder that the decision was made by a five-to-four vote. That feeling, however, is considerably modified when one notes the character of the two dissenting opinions. The opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Brandeis, and concurred in by Mr. Justice Clarke, controverts the conclusion of the majority that stock dividends are not in any true sense income. But that is not the case with the dissenting opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Holmes and concurred in by Mr. Justice Day. On the contrary, the first sentence of the short paragraph which constitutes the whole of Judge Holmes's dissenting opinion is as follows: "I think that Towne v. Eisner, 245 U. S. 418, was right in its reasoning and result, and that on sound principles the stock dividend was not income." Accordingly, upon the question whether stock dividends really should be regarded, "on sound principles," as income there is no dissent from the opinion of the Court except on the part of Judges Brandeis and Clarke. We shall endeavor briefly to indicate the grounds of the decision, and to discuss the objections made to it in the two dissenting opinions.

So far as the decision is concerned, it is needless to do much more than make a few quotations from Judge Pitney's opinion. In the case of Towne v. Eisner the Supreme Court had decided that stock dividends were not income within the meaning of the law as it stood at that time (1916). The Revenue Act of September 8, 1916, made a change in the law, designed to bring stock dividends within its definition of income. In the case decided last week the crucial question was whether, under the Sixteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution, Congress had power to tax such dividends as income. The Court adheres to the view it took in the case of Towne v. Eisner, "not because that case in terms decided the Constitutional question, for it did not; but because the conclusion there reached as to the essential nature of a stock dividend necessarily prevents its being regarded as income in any true sense." Nevertheless, in view of the importance of the matter, and of the subsequent legislation by Congress, the Court not only reviews the argument in the previous case, but enters afresh into its merits.

A few extracts will suffice to give a clear impression of the basis on which the decision in both the cases rests:

> A stock dividend really takes nothing from the property of the corporation, and adds nothing to the interests of the shareholders. Its property is not diminished, and their interests are not increased. . . . The proportional interest of each shareholder remains the same. The only change is in the evidence which represents that interest, the new shares and the original shares together representing the same proportional interest that the original shares represented before the issue of the new ones. . . .
>
> In short, the corporation is no poorer and the stockholder is no richer than they were before. . . .
>
> The essential and controlling fact is that the stockholder has received nothing out of the company's assets for his separate use and benefit; on the contrary, every dollar of his original investment, together with whatever accretions and accumulations have resulted from employment of his money and that of the other stockholders in the business of the company, still remains the property of the company, and subject to business risks which may result in wiping out the entire investment. Having regard to the very truth of the matter, to substance and not to form, he has received nothing that answers the definition of income within the meaning of the Sixteenth Amendment.

It is impossible, of course, to do justice in a brief space to the whole argument; but there is one more point of great interest which we can not omit. The case against the Court's view rests essentially upon an ignoring of the difference between income accruing to the corporation, and retained by it as part of its assets, and income actually put into the hands of the shareholder. On this point the Court says, among other things:

> We must treat the corporation as a substantial entity separate from the stockholder, not only because such is the practical fact but because it is only by recognizing such separateness that any dividend—even one paid in money or property—can be regarded as income of the stockholder. Did we regard corporation and stockholders as altogether identical, there would be no income except as the corporation acquired it; and while this would be taxable against the corporation as income under appropriate provisions of law, the individual stockholders could not be separately and additionally taxed with respect to their several shares even when divided, since if there were entire identity between them and the company they could not be regarded as receiving anything from it, any more than if one's money were to be removed from one pocket to another.

In opposing the view of the Court Judge Brandeis makes not a frontal attack but a series of flank movements. His argument is of a complicated nature, but it is safe to assume that he regards as its pièce de résistance what he puts forward at considerable length, and with a good deal of a flourish, at the beginning of his opinion. The point of this argument is that it has been customary in the past for corporations to adopt, with apparent indifference, as though they were substantially identical, either of two methods in issuing new stock. One is that of the stock dividend, by which the new stock is distributed pro rata to shareholders according to their existing holdings. The other is to give the shareholder the option of taking his pro rata amount of the new stock or a cash dividend equal to the par value of that amount of stock. "Whichever method was employed," says Judge Brandeis, "the resultant distribution of the new stock was commonly referred to as a stock dividend"; the fact being that, as a rule, the stock was worth so much more than par that the cash option was hardly more than a formality. Until the Federal Income tax made a difference between the two methods they were regarded in practice, says Judge Brandeis, as substantially identical; and from this circumstance he draws the inference that the stock dividend must be regarded as income.

But the conclusion does not follow from the premises. Corporations, in adopting either one method or the other, were not concerned with drawing any distinction regarding the classification of the dividend as income or not income. The fact that they treated the two things alike—granting that it is a fact—has no force whatever in determining the question. So far as that mere circumstance is concerned, it might as logically be argued that because stock dividends are not income cash dividends are not income, as that because cash dividends are income stock dividends are income. Neither conclusion would be justified; the point has to be determined by consideration of the real nature of the facts, and not by the action taken by corporations or anybody else in transactions which did not involve the point at all.

There is only one more point of which we can take notice in Judge Brandeis's discussion. He says:

> It is argued that until there is a segregation, the stockholder can not know whether he has really received gains; since the gains may be invested in plant or merchandise or other property and perhaps be later lost. But is not this equally true of the share of a partner in the year's profits of the firm or, indeed, of the profits of the individual who is engaged in business alone?

It is difficult to believe that so acute a thinker as Judge Brandeis can have put this forward as a serious contention. The gains of an individual, and even of a member of a partnership, belong to him, and it is not in any way the concern of the law what he may do with them. The gains of a corporation belong to the corporation, and do not accrue to the individual until they are distributed. He has no way of claiming control over them. If they are lost, they will be lost not by him, but by the corporation. And, what is also to the purpose, but what Judge Brandeis does not in any way refer to, those gains are taxed as income of the corporation, while the gains of an individual, or of a member of a partnership, can not be taxed except as his personal income, partnerships not being legal entities subject to taxation.

Judge Holmes's dissent rests on an entirely different ground. As we have already said, he admits that "on sound principles" the stock dividend is "not income." His dissent rests exclusively on a broad interpretation of the Sixteenth Amendment itself. He says:

> The known purpose of this Amendment was to get rid of nice questions as to what might be direct taxes, and I can not doubt that most people not lawyers would suppose when they voted for it that they put a question like the present to rest

On the other hand, the Court states its view of the Sixteenth Amendment as follows:

> A proper regard for its genesis, as well as its very clear language, requires that this Amendment shall not be extended by loose construction, so as to repeal or modify, except as applied to income, those provisions of the Constitution that require an apportionment according to population for direct taxes upon property, real and personal. This limitation still has an appropriate and important function, and is not to be overriden by Congress or disregarded by the courts.

Judge Brandeis's dissent is, in our judgment, invalid because it does not stand the test of sound logic. In Judge Holmes's dissent the issue is not one of logic, but of good sense and sound public policy. Is it right to call a thing income which is not income, simply because of a supposed intention of "most people" to get rid of "nice questions as to what might be direct taxes"? Would not the natural way to get rid of all such "nice questions" have been simply to repeal the clause of the Constitution forbidding (except by apportionment among the States) the imposition of direct taxes? If, as the Court declares in its opinion, "this limitation still has an appropriate and important function," is it sound policy to destroy that limitation by the rough-and-ready process of brushing aside the distinctions upon which it rests?

Irish Surprises

THE Government of Ireland bill has a "bad press" in the country which it is meant to benefit and pacify. That is the best reception which could befall it. Praise on one side and detraction on the other would rouse a suspicion of partiality on the part of the British Government. Unanimous disapproval, on the other hand, is the highest commendation any Home Rule proposal could meet with in Ireland. Lloyd George had no illusions as to the welcome his new Bill would receive. In the course of his speech in the House of Commons on December 22, 1919, he said: "Looking around I find no section that can accept anything except the impossible. There is no section in Ireland who will stand up and say: 'We accept this,' or 'we accept that,' except something which you can not put through."

The sudden volte face of Sir Edward Carson must, therefore, have come to him as a pleasant surprise! The motive which Sir Edward is quoted as having given for his change of attitude does not seem altogether convincing, for it leaves one important fact out of account. "It must be remembered," he said, "that the Home Rule act of 1914 is on the statute book, and unless an amending measure be passed, it will automatically come into force the day peace is officially declared, and then Ulster would be placed under the control of the Dublin Parliament." In other words, of two evils he chose the lesser one. But when the act of 1914 was placed on the statute book, Mr. Asquith, with the assent of the Irish Nationalist members of the House, gave an undertaking that it should not be brought into operation until an act of Parliament had been carried dealing with the peculiar position of Ulster. It was, therefore, not so much a choice between the act of 1914 and the present bill, but one between the two birds in the bush which he might catch with that promised act of Parliament and the one bird which the present bill places in his hand.

The features that recommend the bill to the Carsonites will naturally make it an object of suspicion to the Nationalists. The attitude of Sinn Fein can not be materially affected by Ulster's acceptance or rejection of the proposals. They demand the impossible, regardless of the consequences which the realization of their wishes might have for the Empire. To every fair-minded outsider it must appear as a matter of course that England can not possibly agree to an absolute severance of Ireland from the United Kingdom without recklessly jeopardizing her own existence. The experience of the late war has shown what would be the fate of Great Britain, if, with an independent Irish Republic at her very door, she would have to defend herself against an enemy's submarine fleet, which could use the Irish coasts as a maritime base. Sir Horace Plunkett, in a recent speech in which he assailed the Government's proposals, did the American people the justice of representing them to his audience as in favor of "as large a measure of self-government as is consistent with the military safety of the British Empire." This estimate of public opinion in America is doubtless correct. The average Englishman has a different impression. The active German-Irish propaganda for Sinn Fein has created the belief abroad that the United States is a hotbed of anti-British agitation. That evil force, which was Germany's accomplice in the big crime, continues, quite openly now and undisturbed, its sinister work for the estrangement of the two great English-speaking nations. Sir Horace, in the speech from which we have quoted, told as "a matter of personal knowledge that, from 1911 onward, the Prussian Government was organizing the German-Irish alliance in American politics with the view of the coming attack on the world's freedom."

These words are worth putting on record as coming from an Irishman who, though no Sinn Feiner and opposed to all plans for an Irish republic, is an ardent patriot and an advocate of Home Rule for his country. From the short summary of his speech that has appeared in the press it is not sufficiently clear what his chief grievances are against the new bill. One is the privileged position which Ulster would command, it being made "a virtual mandatory over Ireland without responsibility." Sir Edward Carson's support of the bill seems to add force to this charge. But it may be brought against any Home Rule scheme which does not propose an absolute surrender by the Imperial Government of all its powers. Sir Horace evidently fears that the Ulstermen, under the leadership of Sir Edward Carson, thanks to the favored position which their loyalty to England secures them with the London Government, will control the execution of the reserved powers in Ireland.

There certainly is some ground for his fear; but for a patient, sick to death, to refuse the experiment of a new treatment because of the possible danger to his health, is not the way to get better.

Ireland is, indeed, rapidly approaching a crisis in its chronic illness. "It is obvious," said Ian Macpherson in the House of Commons on March 5, "that we are up against a tremendously dangerous situation," and he added, by way of illustration, that "the Sinn Fein had at least 200,000 men prepared to commit murder at any hour of the day or night." There may be gross exaggeration in the oratio pro domo of the Chief Secretary for Ireland, but even if one-hundredth of that number were a more correct estimate, he would still be justified in characterizing the situation as grave. The aims of Sinn Fein are only negative. They know that their independent Irish Republic is a castle in the air, which even American money can not help them to build. But, their own scheme being impossible, they want to make any other plan impossible too. If they were in earnest about their Irish Republic they would not employ assassins to lay its foundations. It is the usual tactics of all revolutionary minorities. Not being able to rule by right, they try to overrule the right of others by a reign of terror. The results of the recent municipal elections in Ireland have shown that Sinn Fein, of a total number of 322,244 of valid votes, polled only 87,311. If the total poll of Labor, which is mainly Republican, be added to that number, the total Republican vote is less than 145,000, or a good deal less than half the country's total poll.

The Unionists have taken the first step towards a reconciliation. The Nationalists might spare their unhappy country endless misery if they would follow that example and submit to what they call the insult that Ireland should be given a start on self-government instead of the full measure of Home Rule which they desire. The bill offers to a divided Ireland the means of setting up divided legislatures, but paves the way for both parts to unite at what time and to what extent they choose. The very prospect for both parties of being able to discuss their common internal affairs without the interference of their present ruler should be an inducement for the Nationalists to accept any plan which made such freedom possible.

However, their opposition to the bill is not likely to subside, the less so since they have received the unexpected support of Mr. Asquith. Asquith naturally prefers his own Home Rule act of 1904 to the bill now before the House. But it is strange to find him reject the latter because of its plan for a dual government, as he himself, in 1914, conceded the justice of the Unionist demand for an Amendment act providing for separate legislative treatment for Ulster.

In the exciting game of politics strange surprises will happen. Who could have foretold that a Home Rule bill for Ireland would be opposed by the Homeruler Asquith and receive the support of the leader of the Irish Unionists?

Russia's Substitute for "Wage Slavery"

THANKS to extremely industrious propaganda, the idea has been very widely spread among American workingmen that the Soviet Government of Russia is a workingman's government. It is not fair to assume, perhaps, that the more intelligent workmen and trade-union leaders believe this. But there can be no question that the rank and file of labor is convinced that Lenin and Trotsky, exercising a "dictatorship of the proletariat," are acting as trustees for the power seized by the workers. Furthermore, they have had set before them roseate pictures of the labor Utopia which has been brought about by the communist experiment in Russia.

At the same time the propagandists hit upon a clever plan to prevent the enlightenment of the workman on this subject. They convinced him that all the reports derogatory to the Soviet Government, or exposing the failure of the Communist system, were lies circulated by the capitalist press, a press paid by the capitalists as a means of protecting their own interests. The result was that all the best sources of information were virtually closed to American workingmen. If a man came out of Soviet Russia, no matter what his experience or reliability, and told the simple story of the ruin wrought by Bolshevism, he was set down as the hired tool of the hated capitalist. But if a man like Arthur Ransome, or Isaac Don Levine, whose relations with the Bolsheviks were only too well known, came out with stories whitewashing the Soviet Government, though the stories continually contradicted themselves and were on the face of them lacking in credibility, they were exploited by the radical press and believed by the duped workingmen.

During all this time, the most damning evidence against the tyrants at Moscow was contained in their own official decrees and newspapers. But now there has been put out by them a document, which, if it is carefully read by American workingmen, must completely disillusion them. This is the Soviet Government's Code of Labor Laws, published in Soviet Russia in its issue of February 21.

To be sure, this Code makes some pretense at protecting the laborer and assuring to him some of the advantages for which labor everywhere has been agitating, such as the eight-hour day, disability and unemployment insurance, the right to labor, and the protection of women and children in industry. All of these advantages, however, are carefully circumscribed so that they can be suspended at any time by the higher authorities under the plea of necessity. In reality, the Code introduces labor serfdom of a sort far more tyrannical than even the peasant serfdom of half a century ago.

Article I of the Code provides that all citizens of the Russian Socialist Federated Soviet Republic between the ages of sixteen and fifty, unless incapacitated by injury or illness, are "subject to compulsory labor." This is the keynote to the whole Code, and the other sections, no matter how disguised in the wording, are merely provisions for carrying this tyranny into effect.

So, for example, each workman is assigned to a specific group or category, with corresponding wages, by the higher authorities, and he is required to carry a labor handbook in which must be entered his name in full, his category, when he goes to work, when he is paid, when he is absent, or when he is changed to other employment. It is, in fact, a sort of labor passport, an instrument of oppression to which no American laborer would submit for an instant. He must produce it on all occasions when demanded by the authorities, and the entries in it must be countersigned by his employer.

The laborer is bound to his job and can change from one employment to another only by permission of the authorities. Furthermore, he is not allowed to earn any extra pay under any pretense whatsoever while working at his job, and any remuneration so received must be deducted from his regular pay. Under the guise of the enforcement of the right to work, careful regulations provide for the assignment of laborers to their jobs, and especially for the distribution of the unemployed.

Ostensibly provision is made for the trades unions and works councils to have a hand in determining conditions of labor, wages, etc., but these are all subject to the approval of the higher Soviet authorities. Anyone who has read Mr. H. V. Keeling's account of his personal experiences in connection with the present trades unions in Russia will realize that these bodies are in no sense representative of the workers, but are dominated entirely by the Commissars. It is interesting also to note that the works councils have been abolished.

It is not only from the standpoint of labor that the Code is interesting. It also throws a light on other aspects of Soviet theory and practice. In the section dealing with rules for the determination of disability for work and the payment of sick benefits to wage earners, it is provided that the resources of the local hospital funds shall be derived:

(a) From obligatory payments by enterprises, establishments and institutions employing paid labor.

(b) From fines for delay of payments.

(c) From profits on the investment of the funds.

It is evident, therefore, that the hated institution of capital and interest, against which Lenin and Trotsky fulminated so violently, is now recognized as a necessary part of their system.

To one who has followed the previous Bolshevik propaganda addressed to labor in other lands, the question insistently presents itself as to why this Code of Labor Laws should be published at the present moment. The reason for putting into effect such a Code is evident. The Bolshevik experiment in Communism has failed and its industrial system is unable to produce. Partly this is due to the lack of fuel and raw materials, as well as to the breakdown in transportation. But according to official statements of the Bolsheviks themselves, one of the greatest of all difficulties has been the labor problem. It is therefore to put an end to labor troubles, and to put out of the heads of labor all pretensions to rights and liberties, that the Code was adopted. Why it was published abroad just at this time is less evident, but it seems reasonable to assume that it is addressed not to workingmen but to capitalists, and that the intention is to assure the latter that they can now invest their money in Russian enterprises in full confidence that there will be no strikes or other difficulties with labor. In other words, the Soviet Government, facing utter economic collapse, and begging the capitalists of foreign countries to come in and save the situation, offer, as a special inducement, to provide slave labor.

THE REVIEW
A weekly journal of political and general discussion
Published by
THE NATIONAL WEEKLY CORPORATION
140 Nassau Street, New York
FABIAN FRANKLIN, President
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER, Treasurer

Subscription price, five dollars a year in advance. Fifteen cents a copy. Foreign postage, one dollar extra; Canadian postage, fifty cents extra. Foreign subscriptions may be sent to Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons, Ltd., 24, Bedford St., Strand, London, W. C. 2, England.
Copyright, 1920, in the United States of America
Editors
FABIAN FRANKLIN
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER
Associate Editors
HARRY MORGAN AYRES O. W. FIRKINS
A. J. BARNOUW W. H. JOHNSON
JEROME LANDFIELD

Experimental Allegiances

(IN TWO PARTS—PART ONE)

FOR several years I have been striving to attain a workable understanding of the theory of the state known variously as Pluralism, Federalism, Administrative Syndicalism, and the Federationism of Experimental Allegiances. I have lingered curiously over the pages of Mr. Graham Wallas's "The Great Society" and of Mr. Harold J. Laski's "The Problem of Sovereignty" and "Authority in the Modern State." I have never failed to read the occasional expositions of the theory in the columns of the New Republic, sometimes anonymous, but usually signed by Mr. Laski, Mr. Herbert Croly, or Mr. Walter Lippmann. The faint foreshadowings of the theory appearing in the Nation at various times during the last year and in the Dial during its twelve-months' fling in the metropolis as an exponent of intellectual radicalism, have not escaped me. I have read them all, but I am still dissatisfied with my progress toward a rounded comprehension of this blend of theory, doctrine, and vision. In the belief that somewhere there may be some other person—some forlorn and baffled brother—who has striven as hard, with results as incomplete and unsatisfactory, and who, seeing, may take heart again, I set down this record of steps taken in the sands of endeavor.

Mr. Laski is by common consent the protagonist, the chief pleader, of the cause. In the columns of the New Republic and elsewhere, from time to time, he pays tribute to Mr. Croly and Mr. Lippmann as worthy coadjutors. But the reciprocal tribute from Mr. Croly and Mr. Lippmann to Mr. Laski is always the more glowing and expansive, and it points to the chieftainship of the cause in a way that is unmistakable. In a day when, particularly in the field of radical journalism, there is so much questioning of motives, detraction and sharp accusation, this frequent public exchange of encomiastic courtesies stands out as a wholesome and altogether admirable survival of more spacious times.

Mr. Lippmann concedes (N. R., May 31, 1919, p. 148) that the theory is not a popular one. All the stupendous labor Mr. Laski has brought to its formulation, and all that the New Republic has done for its propagation, have not availed to dispel the reigning prejudice against it. Of "Authority in the Modern State" and of Mr. Laski he writes:

> Dealing with matters which, if called by the names used in current headlines would arouse a fury of partisanship, arguing for a theory that is widely and deeply resented, he has protected his argument from the dust and heat of the outer world, from the anger of opponents and the clamorous approval of advocates, by the expedient of enormous scholarship. . . . The learning in which his ideas are contained is so vast and so recondite that I imagine even the sleuth-hounds of Mr. Easley will hesitate.

What "the sleuth-hounds of Mr. Easley" will do in the matter I can not guess. But I suspect that if they hesitate (to attack Mr. Laski, I presume Mr. Lippmann means) the cause of the hesitation will be found not so much in the brave show of vast, enormous, and recondite scholarship as in the difficulty of determining exactly what Mr. Laski is about. That he has "protected his argument from the dust and heat of the outer world" seems evident enough. But I suspect that the "protection" is more or less an involuntary one, and that the "expedient of enormous scholarship" is no expedient at all. Why, anyway, a pleader should seek to "protect" his argument, I do not understand; one would naturally suppose that the main business of propaganda is to get itself disseminated—from Severn to the sea and to all its shores the wide world round. By locking itself up in an academic vocabulary, fortified with a tremendous bibliography, it would seem merely to suppress itself.

No, the "protection" that encases Mr. Laski's argument seems to me largely that of unintelligibility. One may admit the scholarship—if by the word is meant the learning which enables him to cite innumerable passages from many volumes of forgotten lore which have only a conjectural relation, if any, to the subject in hand. But something more than scholarship (in this narrow sense) is needed for exposition; and that is the ability to set down, out of its accumulated stores, an understandable statement. Mr. Laski deals largely in abstractions, which may mean a number of things, and in generalizations so sweeping that sometimes they mean nothing. He hurries along with a copious rush of words—often unconsidered words, they seem to me—and the breaks in his sequences are sometimes so complete as to make one wonder what possible relation a certain sentence can have with the one on each side of it. He finds an enormous number of "obvious" things, some of them so obvious as to be banal and others the obviousness of which I have to reject; and he finds so great a number of "fundamental" things as to make one wonder if he is not frequently mistaking some part of the superstructure for the foundation. I do not say that there may not be others who fully comprehend him, despite Mr. Lippmann's testimony to the invulnerability to friend and foe alike of the armor in which his argument is encased. I say only that, so far as I am concerned, Mr. Lippmann is in this one matter approximately correct.

When Mr. Laski writes (A. M. S., p. 386), "For the obvious fact is that men will not peacefully endure a situation they deem intolerable," I think I understand. The statement seems to me to embody a simple thought simply expressed. Its obviousness seems conspicuously obvious, and as a datum of political science it seems to me one on which Bolshevik and anti-Bolshevik, Christian and Mohammedan, atheist and deist, Judge Gary and Mr. Gompers, President Wilson and Senator Lodge could all cordially agree. But when he writes (ibid., p. 385-86, "It ['the movement towards administrative syndicalism'] is not a revolt against authority but against a theory of it which is, in fact, equivalent to servitude," I confess that I am baffled. I can not comprehend how under any circumstances, in the world as we now know it, servitude may be equivalent to authority or even to a theory. When further he writes (ibid., p. 188), "Certainly if there is one truth to which all history bears witness it is that unity is the parent of identity," I am worse than baffled; I am tantalized by a fair, round abstraction which seems to mean something, but may mean anything or nothing. I could cite, if to do so were to the purpose, hundreds of such examples.

But not always is Mr. Laski so futile or so unintelligible. In his review of Professor Giddings' book on the State a year ago and of W. F. Willoughby's recent book (N. R., Jan. 7, 1920, p. 175) he has expressed himself in an "unprotected" way. The manner in both cases is arrogant, hoighty-toity, intolerant, and unfair; but at least there is some definiteness of substance. Further, and more to the matter in hand, is a statement in the New Republic for May 31, 1919 (the issue from which the Lippmann passage above is taken) in which he gives us something sufficiently clear and definite to afford us a starting point. Mr. Lippmann indites his glowing eulogy of "Authority in the Modern State" and then pauses. After all, there are some further considerations. Is it all so simple as it seems? May not Pluralism create new evils, or restore the old ones in a new guise? "In attempting to substitute coördination for hierarchy," he writes, "the result may well be a new hierarchy. And the reason is that since a man can not give equally steady allegiance to two authorities, he will end by exalting his immediate allegiance." He is troubled, and he suffers a momentary lapse of faith. Will Mr. Laski come to grips with the matter, solve it, and reconfirm the faith of a disciple?

Mr. Laski will; and obligingly and courteously he does so. That is, he responds. He fails utterly to meet the question, but he does something as well. He sums up, in fairly concrete terms, uncabin'd, uncited, and unencased, what he is trying to mean by the Federationism of Experimental Allegiances. From this statement, with help from other expositions by the three coadjutors, one may get something like the following:

"Personality is a compex thing, and the institutions—religious, industrial, political, in which it clothes itself—are as a consequence manifold." Human beings give allegiance, in varying degrees, to these institutions. They constantly experiment with new allegiances. The sovereign state demands a paramount allegiance to itself. The individual may or may not grant this demand. He may instead yield his paramount allegiance to an organization—local, national, or international—such as a church, a trade-union, a secret society, or a political party. The sovereign state is sometimes unable to enforce its demand, and by insistence may wreck itself. What society needs, in accord with its institutions and its psychology, is a system of coördinated and federated allegiances. "The pluralistic state is an endeavor to express in terms of structure the facts we thus encounter. . . . It destroys, if you like, the sovereign state, that it may preserve the personality of men."

All this is, in a sense, simple enough. It is merely an introduction to our old friend, Group Autonomy—older than Karnak or Cnossos, old as the first rude association of primitive men. It has a new vocabulary and a new bibliography—and little else. But these autonomous groups are to be federated, and the matter is no longer simple; for in what manner and to what degree they are to be federated there is little to show in all the writings of Mr. Laski, Mr. Croly, and Mr. Lippmann. On this, the crucial point in any social scheme, the expositors are nebulous or self-contradictory. On the matter of keeping allegiances coördinated and at par, which lately has troubled Mr. Lippmann, there is an utter absence of exposition. In the earlier days of his discipleship Mr. Lippman was more positive. He acknowledged the dilemmas, but he proposed an heroic remedy. "The dilemmas themselves have to be abolished," he wrote (N. R., April 14, 1917, p. 316), "and forms of coöperative allegiance devised." How? Even in his more confident days he did not know. "We have as yet," he then said, "only the vaguest notions as to how this is to be done." The other members of the firm, as I shall later show, are no better off. If during the intervening three years this vagueness has to any degree been clarified, the evidence has not yet been confided to the printed page.

W. J. Ghent

[To be concluded next week]

The Plight of Russian Peasants

WITHIN a brief cablegram, received last week from Harbin and scarcely noticed in our press, there is contained a story of pathetic heroism that deserves the attention and admiration of workingmen in all lands. The cablegram relates simply that thirty thousand Russian workmen and peasants from the Urals and Western Siberia, who formed a division in the anti-Bolshevik army, and who, it was feared, had been destroyed by the Bolsheviks since the defeat of Admiral Kolchak, had succeeded in cutting their way through the enemy forces and marching two thousand miles to Verkhne-Udinsk. The story of these fighting workmen is one of the romantic episodes of the war. They were chiefly the laborers of the Izhevsky and Vodkinsky works in the neighborhood of Perm. Last June, by resolution of the Ural Trade Unions, they sent a mission of four of their members to inform the people of England concerning conditions in Russia and of the Russian working classes. This mission was sent by the Unions themselves, without funds from other sources, and after great difficulties it finally reached England in December. It consisted of Upovalov, the president of the Vodkinsky Union of Metal Workers; Strumilov, a director of the Metal Workers' Union of Perm; Zhandarmov, vice-president of the Federated Trades Unions of the Ural, and Menshikov, member of the Executive Committee of the Izhevsky Union.

The statements of the delegates in which they explain the reasons why the peasants and workmen of the Ural region rose against the Soviet rule are clear and definite.

The Bolsheviks established their power by bayonets and broke the strength of peasants and workers, broke the Constituent Assembly, which was elected on the principle of universal, direct, equal, and secret voting; broke all the societies of a democratic nature, such as the Zemstvos, that self-governing body elected by universal, direct, and secret voting The Bolsheviks ruthlessly, like autocratic gendarmes, killed all labor, political, and Socialist organizations; throttled the labor press and finally established by decree the dawn of their own Tsarist Socialism. Who split up the reserve funds of the trade unions? The Bolsheviks. Who split up the trade unions as a class? By whose orders were all strikes put down by force of arms, amid plentiful executions? It was the Bolsheviks who broke the coöperative societies and converted their shops into Communist stores.

The Bolsheviks promised the working people peace, bread and freedom. Actually, in place of peace, they gave civil war, which destroyed all manufactures and stained the country with blood; in place of freedom—prison, exile, and the firing squad; in place of bread—famine and the grave.

So it was that, having drunk to the full the cup of humiliation and tasted this red-bayonet Socialism, the Izhevsky and Vodkinsky workers recognized that further life of this sort was impossible, and, though without weapons, and armed only with the armor of right, with only their blistered hands to fight with, united in spirit, to a man they rose against the oppressors, and, by virtue of their strength of will, snatched the rifles from the hands of the Red Guards and began the battle for citizens' rights and the freedom of the Russian people.

It was this division of workmen soldiers that bore the brunt of the Bolshevik attack last summer when the forces of Kolchak, without munitions and undermined in the rear, crumbled, and it was this division, faithful to the end, that covered the great retreat. Now, after untold privations and sufferings, they have, like another Ten Thousand, fought their way through to possible safety. It is to such sturdy champions of liberty that the new Russia must look hopefully when it is possible again to face the tasks of reconstruction. This episode is the best answer to those who would decry the qualities of the Russian peasants, and who would judge by the present supremacy of the Bolshevik minority that they were incapable of organized patriotic resistance and political self-assertion.

JEROME LANDFIELD

The Erzberger-Helfferich Trial and the Aftermath

ON Saturday morning of last week the cables brought the news of the verdict in the suit of Mathias Erzberger, until recently Secretary of State for Finance in the German Republic, against Karl Helfferich, former Vice-Chancellor and Secretary of State for the Interior and for Finance in the time of William II. Helfferich, a pronounced reactionary, was condemned to a nominal fine, three hundred marks and costs, yet he left the courtroom amid prolonged applause; and the trial amounted virtually to a condemnation of the plaintiff, for Erzberger had sued for slander and defamation of character, and Helfferich's fine was imposed, not on this count, the judge stating that Helfferich had acted from "patriotic motives," but because he had "shown hatred" in his persecution of the plaintiff.

The same evening brought the news of a reported and seemingly unexpected coup d'état by the German reactionary parties, the details and effects of which must for a time remain somewhat vague. The American press in general had paid but little attention to the Helfferich-Erzberger controversy, regarding it more or less as a private quarrel between politicians; whereas there is a close connection between the two events.

Helfferich's attitude, which differs little, if at all, from that of the counter-revolutionists, may be briefly stated as follows: Germany was not defeated through the military superiority of the Entente and the United States. She met disaster through her own internal dissensions, especially the unpatriotic attitude of the Social Democrats and those who, like Erzberger, sided with them, particularly in the crisis of 1917. This crisis, which forced Bethmann-Hollweg out of office, gave Prussia universal suffrage, and passed the famous Reichstag Peace Resolution, broke down the "Burgfriede," or truce of parties. On that occasion the Reichstag for the first time showed itself strong enough to prevail against the Emperor, Chancellor, and General Staff. From that time on, the Reichstag continued to undermine the power and authority of William II and of the German General Staff, which had been the secret of Germany's strength. The multiplication of stupid activities and pretensions by this incompetent Reichstag finally overthrew the German Empire and brought Germany to her present pass.

The feeling of Helfferich and his class is much less severe against the Social Democrats than against Erzberger and what following he may still have. The Social Democrats were an evil to which the old régime had been accustomed, and their status had been formulated once for all when William II on a famous occasion characterized them as "enemies of the Fatherland." From them nothing, therefore, had been expected. It had surprised no one that as the prospect of a German victory became more and more remote they should have protested more and more vehemently against the old régime. Ebert and Noske had always done this, and after the armistice had merely run true to form. They had balked at voting the war taxes in July, 1917, and had worked consistently to bring about parliamentary government. It was to have been expected that, after the revival of Socialistic hopes following the Russian Revolution of the spring of 1917, they would favor the Reichstag Peace Resolution. Indeed, they were its earliest advocates. Yet in the eyes of the reactionaries they could not have succeeded either in passing the Peace Resolution or in introducing parliamentary reforms without the assistance of other parties. It was, therefore, more reprehensible to support a Social Democrat than to be one, for to countenance such outlaws not only gave them political standing but also a cachet of respectability. Hence Erzberger's position as arch-villain in that tragedy, The Junkers' Overthrow.

It was excellent political policy, from the reactionary standpoint, to attack Erzberger. The move promised success, since as a personality he was, beyond doubt, the weakest spot in the Government's armor. The question of finance in Germany being particularly pressing, if it could be proved that the head of the Treasury was himself dishonest, self-seeking, and a war profiteer, all economic policies of the Republic would be discredited.

It seems that Erzberger was a sufficiently astute politician to realize the weakness of his position. If the verdict has in essence gone against him, he can at least urge in extenuation that unwillingly he came to sue. Helfferich, in his three volumes of "Der Weltkrieg," which has been very widely read in Germany, made statements that no respectable politician could allow to pass unchallenged. Yet Erzberger remained silent. Helfferich then published a pamphlet "Down with Erzberger," and has since improved every opportunity to insult him in public. Erzberger was probably forced by his colleagues to take action and, shortly after it was instituted, to withdraw from the Cabinet. The pamphlet, which reviews Erzberger's career, was read at the trial, and easily made him, not Helfferich, appear as the defendant in the suit. Hence the charges, which seem to have been virtually substantiated, not only have resulted in a personal triumph for Helfferich, but carry the implication that Erzberger's colleagues in the Government are likewise condemned. This assumption is, I believe, unfair to men like Ebert and Noske, who in their political life have acted consistently, and, on the personal side are respected.

Much which can only now be disclosed had been happening behind the scenes unknown to the Reichstag generally and, of course, to ourselves. At the beginning of April, 1917, Emperor Charles, Empress Zita, and Count Czernin appeared at the German General Headquarters at Kreuznacht and suggested peace. They made it plain that Austria's position was exceedingly serious. Not only did they talk of peace, they even suggested important cessions of territory. The Emperor and Empress and their Minister evidently returned home with the conviction that it was hopeless to obtain any concessions from the German General Staff. Shortly after, on April 14, a personal aide of Emperor Charles delivered to Emperor William a letter written in his own hand which was accompanied by a memoir from Count Czernin to the following effect: Austria-Hungary's clock was running down. Morale was bad and the revolutionary danger was increasing. The raw materials for war munitions were giving out and American intervention had rendered the situation still more acute. French, English, and Italian offensives were to be expected. "Before America can destroy the military situation for us we must make a far-reaching and detailed proposal of peace and not shrink from making eventually extensive and grievous sacrifices." Undoubtedly England and France were likewise tired, and, though the ruthless submarine warfare would not be decisive, the statesmen of the Entente would ask themselves "whether it was expedient and wise to carry on this war à outrance or whether it was not more statesmanlike to cross golden bridges if these were built for them by the Central Powers. In that case the moment had come for far-reaching, painful sacrifices by the Central Powers." These included, on Germany's side, the cession of Alsace-Lorraine, and on Austria-Hungary's part the giving up of the whole of Galicia and the Trentino. Austria-Hungary could not possibly look forward to another winter's campaign, and it was feared that such a campaign might likewise bring about in Germany political changes which the responsible defenders of the dynastic principle must consider as more serious than a poor peace negotiated by the monarchs.

The Emperor and German Headquarters refused to take so serious a view of the situation, because of the promising aspect of developments in Russia and also because of an alleged remark of Ribot's to the Italian Ambassador to the effect that France was bleeding to death. On German policy the most serious immediate effect of this communication was to arouse that bitter feeling against Austria which was to become more and more pronounced as the war progressed.

Czernin's memoir, like the visit of the Imperial pair to German Headquarters, proved unavailing for reasons that cannot here be discussed. Evidently the German militarists either were confident of a victory or believed that peace overtures would be made by the Entente. The developments in which Erzberger was to take so large a part came, therefore, as a most unexpected shock. The parties of the Left were to prove "ungrateful" and were to demand more than the Emperor had promised in the way of reforms in the Prussian system of elections. Also, a political cross-current set in; Ludendorff, Hindenburg, and the reactionaries demanded the removal of von Bethmann-Hollweg as Chancellor, whom the Left seemed quite willing to keep. In the Main Committee of the Reichstag the Social Democrats, with Ebert and Noske taking prominent parts, demanded a peace resolution announcing a programme of "no annexations." At this point Hindenburg and Ludendorff, growing impatient, sent in their resignations to take effect immediately unless von Bethmann-Hollweg were dismissed.

The storm would have been weathered, Helfferich believes, but for the fact that Erzberger of the Catholic Centre party joined with the Social Democrats and brought them an unexpected accession of strength. He painted an exceedingly dark picture of Germany's prospects. It is impossible to analyze in detail his actions in this crisis, and it is simplest to believe that he was improving the occasion to fish in troubled waters. He had been particularly close to von Bethmann-Hollweg and the German Foreign Office. Yet he suddenly turned against the Chancellor and was instrumental in his dismissal, as well as being the most important factor in the passage of the Peace Resolution. In the general turmoil the further reform of the Prussian system of elections was also carried. All of these measures were effected against the will of the Emperor and his Government. They were the most important concessions ever forced from him, and clearly indicated that his authority was beginning to wane. This undermining of the Imperial and military authority is quite properly regarded by the German reactionaries as the beginning of the end. Erzberger symbolized to them everything that is reprehensible in the new parliamentary régime. As he was, in addition, one of the plenipotentiaries who negotiated the armistice with Foch, he is regarded as one of those most responsible for the peace.

It will hardly assist us in our attempt to understand the present psychology of a large wing of German opinion to consider Erzberger, as has sometimes been done, a disinterested lover of peace and a thoroughgoing republican. Helfferich's charge that the German Republic's Minister of Finance frequently directed his political activities to his personal financial advantage must be taken seriously. Erzberger's support of the Peace Resolution was the more unexpected because of his previous attitude. He had in September of 1914 presented to von Bethmann-Hollweg, to von Tirpitz, von Falkenhayn, and others a programme of annexations which was excessive, even from the German standpoint. It included not only the annexation of the Flemish and French coast, but also the English islands of the Channel, as well as the French mining fields. Helfferich accused him of having accepted bribes in the form of directorates and other considerations from corporations whose interests he was to further in the Reichstag and in cases in which he acted as referee. Erzberger admitted having received a hundred thousand marks as a director in Thyssen's Iron and Steel Works. It was charged that he was paid this sum to purchase his influence for the company, and that in advocating the annexation of the French ore basins he was merely rendering his quid pro quo. It is probably true that Erzberger resigned after the passage of the Peace Resolution, though under what circumstances and for what reasons it is impossible to say at present.

Erzberger has also been accused of making unlawful use of Czernin's confidential memoir to Emperor William II. It was through him, according to Helfferich, that news of Austria's desperate situation reached Germany's enemies. On this count, certainly, Erzberger must be acquitted. Czernin had intended that his memoir should be seen only by the two Emperors. At the time of Emperor Charles's visit to Headquarters and of his letter to William II, Austria's situation was certainly desperate. Charles knew that he must make peace. His experience at German Headquarters made it impossible to entertain much hope of success from the "military masters of Germany," and both Czernin and Charles felt that if they were to obtain any result whatever it must be through the Reichstag. It was only natural that they should have attempted to act through the Catholic Centre party, and it has since been disclosed that Erzberger received his copy of the Czernin memoir through no less a person than the Emperor Charles himself. It was given him to use, the only injunction being that he should not reveal the source from which he had obtained it. Since at the same time the Emperor had written the well-known Prince Sixtus Letter and had sent Count Mensdorff, his former Ambassador at London, to Switzerland to establish contact if possible with representatives of the Entente Powers, it could hardly have been a secret in Entente circles that Austria was decidedly weary of the war and that her clock had "very nearly run down."

It is undoubtedly true that Erzberger was an exceedingly important factor in bringing about peace and in establishing the parliamentary régime in Germany. We may regret that his personal character seems to be so far from admirable, for it is useless to blink the fact that his overthrow will, temporarily at least, do much to increase reactionary sentiment in Germany.

Christian Gauss

Correspondence

Loose Talk Within the Church

To the Editors of The Review:

Turning from your thoughtful editorial on "Religion and the World's Need," in the Review of February 21, I happened to pick up a copy of the Churchman of the same date, wherein is reported an address before "the younger clergy of the metropolitan district" by the Rev. J. Howard Melish, of Brooklyn. Here are some of the things he said:

> Mark my word the time is at hand when men who speak as I speak, unwilling to compromise on the subject of the inherent rights of the laboring man, will be thrown out by the Church which is demanding suppression and end of free speech in this free Republic. . . . Is the Church's purpose a partisan one, or does it exist for religion? Is it to be buttressed by the rich and then used to exploit the poor? . . . As it is now, some men who are living on interest, rents, and coupons—and still not producing—are getting the cream. Until that sort of thing is brought to an end it is the Church's business to see that we are always on the edge of revolution.

"Mr. Melish took his seat," says the reporter, "amid prolonged applause, although several present were heard to say that they were in some respects directly opposed to the speaker's conclusions."

Talcott Miner Banks
Williamstown, Mass., February 21

Keynes and Dillon

To the Editors of The Review:

It does not appear to be realized by the general reading public that the two most ambitious and most entertaining volumes on the peace treaty which have thus far appeared—those of Mr. J. M. Keynes and of Dr. E. J. Dillon—are seriously untrustworthy in their statements of fact, and even in their accounts of the provisions of the treaty. Both writers set out with a manifest determination to prove that the treaty was conceived in sin and born in iniquity; that, under some hypocritical concealments, it repudiates most of the terms of the armistice agreement; and that, in essential matters, the principles and programme of President Wilson were set aside. Mr. Keynes, it is true, has done a useful service in urging—as others have done—that the framers of the treaty overestimated Germany's power of economic recovery under the conditions proposed, and that, in the general interest of Europe, many of the economic clauses require revision. But his attack upon the treaty is much more sweeping than this; and many of his other strictures upon it, especially on the score of good faith, are based upon misstatements or omissions of pertinent facts. As for Dr. Dillon, one is tempted to surmise that he regards his conversations with eminent personages in Paris during the Conference as absolving him from the tiresome task of reading the final text of the treaty; at all events, he presents singularly erroneous accounts of some of its most important provisions.

I give some examples of these inaccuracies:

1. By the clauses which reserve to the Allied Governments the right to take property of German citizens or corporations in ceded territory, "a wholesale expropriation of private property is to take place," says Mr. Keynes, "without the Allies affording any compensation to the individuals expropriated." In Alsace-Lorraine, for example, "the property of the Germans who reside there is now entirely at the disposal of the French Government without compensation, except in so far as the German Government itself may choose to afford it" (italics mine). In point of fact, the treaty makes provision for compensation to all Germans whose property is taken. Only by a breach of faith on the part of their own Government can they fail to receive such compensation. By Art. 297 (1), "Germany undertakes to compensate her nationals in respect to the sale or retention of their property, rights, or interests in Allied and Associated States"; and by Art. 74 the same provision is applied specifically to Germans in Alsace-Lorraine who may be dispossessed. Expropriated property, moreover, is to be used primarily to pay private debts owed by Germans to citizens of Allied countries through an international clearing office; if any balance remains and is retained by an Allied Power, it is to be credited to Germany on the reparation account.

2. As an example of the perversion of the plain meaning of the Fourteen Points through "sophistry and Jesuitical exegesis," Mr. Keynes points to the clause making Danzig a free city, with the proviso that it shall be included within the customs frontier of Poland and that its foreign relations shall be conducted by the Polish Government. Yet this clause merely translates into the concrete Point 13, which required that "the Polish State shall have free and secure access to the sea." This requirement, it is manifest, could not be effectually and lastingly realized by leaving the mouths of the Vistula in German hands; nor could it be realized by establishing a completely independent port, with its own customs system and the power to make commercial or other treaties on its own account. Under the treaty the town becomes self-governing, but with restrictions indispensable if Poland's access to the sea is to be really "free" and really "secure." Mr. Keynes's complaint seems to be that the Allies kept faith with the Poles.

3. "Clemenceau brought to success," says Mr. Keynes, "what had seemed to be, a few months before, the extraordinary and impossible proposal that the Germans should not be heard." That the German delegates were not "heard," in a physiological sense, is true. It is not true, as the reader would naturally suppose, that no hearing was given to their side of the case. They were in Paris for some seven weeks; during the whole of this time they were busily engaged in drafting and laying before the representatives of the Allies a voluminous series of notes in criticism of the treaty-draft, and in submitting counter-proposals traversing the entire field of the peace settlement. All these communications were received, published, considered, and answered in detail; and some alterations in the treaty were made in consequence, the most important being the provision for a plébiscite in Upper Silesia. The objections to the holding of a series of public oral debates (in three or four languages) between the Allied and the German delegates were surely obvious and sufficient.

4. Both Mr. Keynes and Dr. Dillon represent the arrangement concerning the Saar Valley as (in the words of the former) "an act of spoliation and insincerity"; and both, in order to prove it such, give misleading accounts of the provisions of the treaty. The reason officially given for the arrangement is that it was made "as compensation for the destruction of coal mines in the north of France and as part payment towards the total reparation due from Germany." Mr. Keynes, however, charges that this explanation is disingenuous. For, he asserts, "compensation for the destruction of the French coal mines is provided for elsewhere in the treaty." "As a part of the payment due for reparation, Germany is to deliver to France 7,000,000 tons annually for ten years," these deliveries being "wholly additional to the amounts available by the cession of the Saar or in compensation for destruction in Northern France." If these statements were accurate, they would, doubtless, convict the framers of the treaty of a deliberate attempt to mislead the public. But it is Mr. Keynes who misleads the public. The clauses to which he refers merely give France for ten years an option for the annual purchase, at the market price, of diminishing quantities of coal from Germany. The maximum (27 million tons) possible in any one year under the option about equals the 1912 output of the Nord and Pas de Calais mines; after five years the deliveries can not exceed 60%, and may fall to about 25% of that amount. These clauses provide an offset for France's future loss in coal production, but they manifestly propose no reparation whatever for the malicious destruction of the mines themselves, or for the loss of their output, or of that of the iron mines of Briey, during the past five years. Moreover, France is not assured of the fulfillment of this option. For the treaty provides that if the Reparation Commission "shall determine that the full exercise of these options would interfere unduly with the industrial requirements of Germany, the Commission is authorized to postpone or to cancel deliveries." And, as Professor Haskins has already pointed out, Mr. Keynes elsewhere seeks to prove that these clauses are an illusion, since it is impossible for Germany to furnish the coal required; so that his own arugments go to show that the Saar Valley provisions alone afford France a substantial guarantee of compenstion for the ruin of the greater part of her coal-mining industry. It becomes, in truth, increasingly evident that they give almost the only security for prompt reparation, of any kind, that France possesses.

Dr. Dillon, however, asserts (what Mr. Keynes apparently implies) that the purpose of the clauses relating to the Saar Valley was less to obtain reparation than to mask a design of eventual annexation. "For fifteen years," he writes, "there is to be a foreign administration there, and at the end of it the people are to be asked whether they would like to place themselves under French sway, so that a premium is offered for French immigration into the Saar Valley." But by Art. 34 "all persons, without distinction of sex, more than twenty years old at the date of the voting, resident in the territory at the date of the signature of the present treaty," will be entitled to vote in the plébiscite of 1934. No other class of voters is provided for; and no extension of the suffrage beyond the class thus defined could be accomplished without the vote of a majority of the Council of the League of Nations. Nor can it be assumed that the League will disregard the plébiscite. There is therefore no likelihood of annexation to France fourteen years hence, unless the present population of the district then desire it. Why the believers in "self-determination" should wish to withhold from this population, at the close of the existing temporary arrangement, the privilege of determining freely their future allegiance, is difficult to see. Dr. Dillon still more grossly misrepresents the facts when he repeatedly asserts that the treaty "makes over the German population of the Saar Valley to France at the end of fifteen years as a fair equivalent of a sum of money payable in gold." What he means to convey by this is that if Germany fails to repurchase the mines, the district and its inhabitants will be transferred to France. The treaty in its final form contains no such provision.

5. The confiding reader of Mr. Keynes's book could gain no other impression than that President Wilson's part in the Conference was essentially a passive one; that he gradually surrendered the substance of almost all the principles which he had previously so eloquently enunciated, content if only, by ingenious glosses and interpretations, some verbal show of conformity with the "Fourteen Points" were maintained. And Dr. Dillon quotes with approval the words of an American journalist: "Clemenceau got virtually all he asked. President Wilson virtually dropped his own programme and adopted the French and British, both imperialistic." The easy verifiable truth of the matter is that, while the treaty, as might have been expected, was made possible only by concessions on the part of all concerned, the concessions obtained by Mr. Wilson were of far greater significance than those which he yielded and that, but for his tenacity of purpose, the treaty would be immensely different from what it is, and incomparably more "imperialistic." A too easy plasticity is scarcely the fault with which the members of the Conference are most likely to reproach Mr. Wilson. It is indubitable that, up to April 6, the French delegation demanded the restoration of "the frontier of 1814," i. e., the actual annexation of the Saar district; and that on the morrow of the President's sending for the George Washington this demand was withdrawn. It is also a matter of official record, in the report of the Commission de la Paix of the Chamber of Deputies, that until the middle of March the representatives of France insisted that all German territory on the left bank of the Rhine should willy-nilly be separated from the German Empire. The Government explained to the Committee of the Chamber its reluctant abandonment of this demand on these grounds, among others: "That it had been objected that, without violating the principles adopted on November 4, 1918, as the basis of the peace [i. e., the Fourteen Points], it was impossible to separate from Germany five and a half million Germans with a plébiscite—which, moreover, if held, would result in favor of Germany;" and that "for these reasons certain governments refused to associate their troops [indefinitely] in the occupation" of the Rhineland or "to recommend to their parliaments the breaking of the bond between Germany and the left bank of the Rhine." It was, however, only after President Wilson's suggestion of the special treaties with England and the United States, as an alternative guarantee for the security of France against German aggression, that the French Government finally yielded the point.

Now these two French demands, for which M. Clemenceau seems to have fought with all his skill, resourcefulness and pertinacity, were obviously the supreme danger-points of the Conference. Their acceptance would have meant a clear repudiation of the principles of settlement agreed to by the Allies before the armistice; it would have made probable, and justifiable, a German irredentist movement of the most formidable proportions; and it would have been in the highest degree threatening to the peace of Europe. In this crucial issue, it was not Mr. Wilson who yielded the essentials of his position. This fact alone compels one to regard both Mr. Keynes's and Dr. Dillon's picture of the President's rôle in the negotiations as little better than caricatures. There are many other facts, easily ascertainable by any unbiased student of the treaty and of the history of the Conference, which justify the same conclusion. Like all clever caricatures, Mr. Keynes's picture has its touches of verisimilitude; but in the main, it can most charitably be described as a brilliant exercise of the creative imagination. But the public, it is to be feared, cares much more for brilliant exercises of the creative imagination than it does for facts.

ARTHUR O. LOVEJOY

Baltimore, Md., March 6

[As regards the facts mentioned in Professor Lovejoy's last paragraph, the reader is referred to an article in the Review for December 20, 1919, by Mr. Frederick Moore, who attended the Peace Conference, and who holds a very different opinion as to the amount of the President's yielding.—EDS. THE REVIEW.]

Fuel in Germany

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

In noting your issue of December 27 last under the heading of "Impresssions from Hungary," I was surprised at the following statement: "Germany, to the writer's positive knowledge, is the only country on the continent where the supply of fuel is adequate, and the factories are working day and night."

No statement could be farther from the truth. During the latter part of last year I was in Germany for about four weeks, and I was unable to make my purchases because of the fact that there was no paper to be had, on account of lack of fuel. In one factory, in Nürnberg, they were fighting desperately to keep the boilers going by using a combination of the poorest grade of coal, wood, and peat, and after I got to Paris I received word that the factory had closed down on account of this supply having become exhausted, and that they could not predict when they would resume.

W. J. LOWENSTEIN

Atlanta, Ga., March 5

Book Reviews

Republicanism in China

Modern China: A Political Study. By Sih-Gung Cheng. Oxford: Clarendon Press.

In Part II of this volume Mr. Cheng has dealt with China's foreign relations, extraterritoriality, tariffs, economic concessions, and foreign investments, but, with regard to these topics, has furnished no considerable information not already available in other works. In Part I, however, which deals with constitutional developments in China, he has presented a new and valuable account of recent political events in his country, an account which, besides being informing, raises questions which deserve some discussion because in the answers to them will appear not only an explanation of the happenings in China of the last few years, but a basis for judging whether a rapid development of constitutional and republican institutions in that country may be expected in the near future.

It has now been more than eight years since the Manchu monarchy was overthrown and a government, republican in form, established in its place. During these years, the domestic situation in China—not to speak of her foreign relations—has gone from bad to worse. As yet it has been found impossible to put into force a permanent constitution. The so-called "Provisional Constitution," hurriedly drawn up and promulgated early in 1912, and admitted by every one to be seriously defective as an instrument of government, is still in force as the fundamental law of the Republic. Twice the attempt has been made to reëstablish the monarchy: the first time by Yuan Shih-Kai, and the second time by the bandit general, Chang Hsun, who actually succeeded in maintaining the deposed Manchu boy emperor upon the dragon throne for something over a week. Twice the Parliament, without a shadow of constitutional warrant, has been dissolved by Presidential mandate, and, at the present time, most of the southern and southwestern Provinces refuse to admit the de jure character of the new Parliament at Peking or the legal title to office of the President elected by it. Instead—in form if not in substance—they give their allegiance to a body sitting at Canton which claims to be composed of a majority of the members of the old twice-dissolved Parliament. Attempts, continuing for nearly two years, have been made to compromise the differences between the Canton and Peking Governments, but as yet without success.

Meanwhile, there has been a steadily increasing domestic demoralization. The control of the Government at Peking over even those Provinces which acknowledge a nominal allegiance to it has almost disappeared; the civil authorities have not been able to control the military forces (the second dissolution of the Parliament by President Li Yuan-Hung was directly due to military threats); the construction of railways and other public works has been at a standstill; and the national revenues have been wholly inadequate to meet even primary governmental needs, with the result that repeated foreign loans have been a necessity, and these having been obtained in large measure from Japan have carried with them concessions not only economically onerous, but politically dangerous. In short, as yet the Chinese people have not been able to give substance and full constitutional operation to their republican form of government, but have been forced to endure a progressive breakdown of their civil administrative services, to see their northern and southern Provinces at war with each other, and to submit, as they did in 1915, at the time of Japan's Twenty-One Demands, to serious inroads upon their sovereignty and integrity as an independent nation.

Beyond doubt China has been greatly hindered in her efforts to develop constitutional government and to give reality to republican principles, by the constant interference of Japan in her domestic affairs; but, in addition, it is evident that the Chinese people were far from prepared by previous political experience and long-established conceptions of law and government for the plunge which, in 1911, they took into the troubled, if stimulating, waters of democracy. This is a matter which deserves some discussion in view of the statement so often made that the Chinese people were peculiarly qualified for the republican experiment by reason of the extent to which, for many generations, they had practised self-government in their local affairs, and because of the essentially democratic character of their social and economic life.

The truth is, paradoxical as it may seem, that it has been precisely because of these facts that the Chinese have found it difficult to maintain an effective central government founded upon a democratic basis. In the first place, republican or representative government, to be successful, must rest upon a constitutional basis; that is, it must be a government of laws and not of men. Now this very idea of government by uniform, imperative law, as opposed to personal authority, has, in the past, played a peculiarly small part in Chinese notions of rule. It has been said by one of the most philosophical of the writers upon Chinese history (Meadows) that "of all races that have attained a certain degree of civilization the Chinese are the least revolutionary and the most rebellious." By this statement the author evidently means that the Chinese have ever laid emphasis upon the personal character of their rulers and have consistently maintained their right to rid themselves of emperors or provincial governors as well as of lower public officials by whom they have conceived themselves to be oppressed or under whose rule they have, for any reason, failed to prosper. But not until 1911 did they show any desire to change the forms of government under which they lived. Personal rule they understood and seemed to prefer, and, having got rid of an incompetent or tyrannical ruler, they were satisfied to replace him with another ruler, with equal powers, from whom they might hope to obtain more beneficent government.

Again, in the adjustment of their personal differences, the Chinese were not accustomed to resort to law, as the western world understands that term, or to tribunals maintained by the state. Disputes between members of a family or clan were settled by the heads of the family or clan. Controversies between inhabitants of the same villages, or between the villages themselves, were settled by the "village elders," who owed their station and authority rather to tacit recognition of merit than to formal election by the villagers. Differences between merchants were almost always settled by the guilds, of which practically all the merchants were members. And, finally, even when there were orders issued by the political authorities, the obligation to obey was conceived to be a moral or rational, rather than a political or legal, one. It is true that these orders were issued as commands, and often had attached to them the admonition "tremblingly obey," but, in fact, they were commonly prefaced by argumentative statements which indicated that they were intended to be persuasive in character; that is, to appeal primarily to the reason and sense of moral obligation of the persons to whom they were directed. In this important respect, then, the Chinese were not, by their past practices and political philosophy, prepared for that rigid rule of law which a constitutional régime imports and which is a prerequisite to a Government which is to be legally as well as politically responsible to the governed.

In the second place, and closely connected with the first point, the Chinese in the past had been habituated not so much to self-government as to doing without government at all. It has been seen that the Chinese were wont to make comparatively little use of the judicial branch of their Government. The legislative branch meant even less to them, as they found the substantive rules of conduct in custom rather than in statute law. And as for the executive branch, they demanded very little of it. To the central Government they were willing to pay their very moderate taxes, but from it they expected little beyond protection against foreign aggression, and a few public works of too great magnitude for local undertaking, a general direction of state examinations for entrance to the public service, occasional aid in cases of great crop failures, floods, or other disasters, and protection against banditry when this evil became too serious to be met by the local authorities. And of their local Governments the Chinese people asked almost nothing—no administration of such local affairs as sanitation, education, fire protection, road building, and the like. Even as to local police protection, only a minimum was expected. Thus it happened that in many of the villages long periods elapsed during which, except the collection of taxes or the recording of land transfers, no distinctively governmental functions were exercised from one year's end to another.

The third respect in which the ground in China had not been prepared for representative government—and here another seeming paradox appears—was that the Chinese constituted such a socially and economically democratized people that there did not exist clearly defined classes or interests upon which political representation might be based. This was a feature emphasized by Dr. Frank J. Goodnow in an important memorandum which, as constitutional adviser, he submitted to the President of China.*

Finally, and perhaps the most important of all the circumstances which have made the republican experiment peculiarly difficult to the Chinese people, has been the lack of a politically effective national patriotism. No people have been more proud, and, in many respects, justly proud, of their civilization and national attainments than the Chinese, and few peoples in the world have been more clearly entitled to be deemed and treated as a single nation when viewed from the standpoint of an ethnic and cultural homogeneity reinforced by a long and unbroken history of political unity. But this feeling of national oneness had not, prior to the revolution of 1919, led to a patriotism that had made the Chinese willing to sacrifice individual, or family, or local interests to those of a national character. The Chinese were, and are, not without idealism, but they also have a very keen conception of what is of direct and immediate practical value to themselves. And thus, obtaining almost nothing for themselves from their central Government, and viewing, indeed, their political rulers in a peculiarly detached manner as concerned with matters with which they, the mass of the people, were not personally concerned, they were not willing to make considerable sacrifices in their behalf or in behalf of the political organization which they represented and operated. Politically, as well as economically and socially, their primary allegiance had always been to the family, the clan, or the village. The result was that, even prior to the revolution of 1911, the control which the central Government had been able to exercise over the Provinces and their lesser administrative divisions had always been a precarious one. Since the revolution that control has been almost non-existent. Because of this the central Government has been unable to obtain adequate revenues, and this in turn has tended to demoralize their administrative services and to place them at the mercy of the foreign Powers to whom they have had to resort for loans.

A false impression would be left, however, if it were not pointed out that, upon the credit side of the political ledger, there are important and growing items which, if allowed to increase, without foreign interference, may be expected, in time, to overcome the debit entries which have been spoken of. The mere fact of having a government that, in principle, is based upon the will of the governed, has had an enormously quickening effect upon the minds of the Chinese people. The remnants of the old antipathy to things western are disappearing with increasing speed. The idea that governments exist in order to advance, in an affirmative manner, the welfare of the whole people, and not simply to provide places of profit to those who happen to occupy the seats of power, is rapidly making its way. Government has become a matter of public discussion, and its acts are subject to a sustained, even if not as yet, in many instances, an effective public criticism. A true general will with reference to matters political is developing; the people are more and more tending to think nationally—a point that is of importance from the international as well as from the national point of view. And, in this connection, it is significant that, despite the contest and even open warfare that has existed between the northern and southern Provinces, there has been evinced upon neither side a desire that the solution should be found by dividing the country into two independent States. With the further development of means of communication and transportation this national solidarity, thus strikingly exhibited, will inevitably become more and more manifest. The Japanese, by the attacks which they have been constantly making against the territorial rights of the Chinese, are doing much to hasten the development of this national patriotism, for, uncomplimentary though it may be to the races of men, it seems to be a fact that a sense of injury or danger from an outside source is the most effective of all forces in creating a strong national feeling. If then, it be true, as has sometimes been asserted, that a centralized, energetic Chinese state will be a menace to Japan, or, at any rate, will render impossible the realization by her of certain of her ambitions, Japan, from the practical point of view, has been pursuing during recent years a highly inexpedient policy toward her neighbor.

W. W. WILLOUGHBY

*Later published in the American Political Science Review, VIII, 541.

A Treatise for the Man in the Shop

THE FLOW OF VALUE. By Logan Grant McPherson. New York: The Century Company.

MR. McPHERSON's subject is of such high importance that it is a pity he lacks an ingratiating style. Who could read the following without effort: "The ratio to the dollar of man-hours—that is, the wage of the employee—is determined by interrelations between the supply of and the demand for effort of the quality he is capable of applying toward the production of final utilities; and the ratio to the dollar of final utilities is determined by the interrelations between the supply of and the demand for final utilities of the respective kinds which find expression in the proportions of man-hours applied that final purchasers pay for final utilities of the respective kinds." Other passages quite as tedious could be quoted from the work before us. They impair the effectiveness of what is in many ways a very valuable treatise.

Mr. McPherson is justly entitled to this mild censure because it is obvious that his aim is to reach the man in the shop and the factory. That his intention is to be elementary is disclosed by his opening paragraph, in which he imagines the effect which our earthly affairs would have on a man from Mars. The presumption is, of course, that the man from Mars is utterly unfamiliar with the course of things in this world, but is the personification of that intelligence which enables him to perceive, prompts him to inquire, impels him to logical conclusion. Our author attempts to outline certain phases of human existence as they would have appeared to the Martian at any time during the years which preceded the outbreak of the war of 1914. This is not the way an economic writer would present the situation to economic thinkers; it is, however, one of the best ways to present it to those who are about to begin to think economically.

Mr. McPherson may be said to think aloud. We participate in the whole mental process by which he reaches the conclusions here embodied. Economics, supposititiously the driest of subjects, is related to the commonest and most necessary facts of life. The commonest facts of life, however, are the most instinctive facts and the ones which the ordinary mind cares least to think about. The difficulty of proving the obvious is, after all, what makes economics trying to most persons. Now, it is the obvious that Mr. McPherson is trying to prove, and perhaps we are a trifle unfair in calling him hard reading.

We hasten to add that we can recall no one who has been more successful in proving the obvious. Essential to property is the application of human effort, which first brings into possession that in which there is property, and the putting forth of effort, when necessary, to protect the rights of property in that which has been brought into possession. Such effort is primarily exerted by the person in protecting his rights. The right to property is not only the right to hold, use, and dispose of that in which a person has property, but also to hold, use, and dispose of that which is produced through the utilization of that in which he has property. Man not only uses and disposes of forms of matter, but he uses and disposes of measures of force. The very use and disposition of matter necessarily involves the use and disposition of force. The results of his efforts are due as much to the application of force as to the matter to which force is applied. The right to property in the force which man directs to his ends has an implied recognition in the law. In the sense that a man has the right either to use or to dispose of the right to use the force thereof, he has property in his body and his brain.

This is a common-sense deduction from the facts of experience and from a study of the mental constitution of the race. But the fact that it is common sense may not enhance its value in a revolutionary period, when the fact of individual ownership of matter, including gray matter, is generally questioned. Mr. McPherson declares, however, that the written law has defined the rights to property in matter, though it has not as yet fully defined the rights to property in force. There is lack of general recognition of the fact that to the mental effort of those who direct and coördinate the application of force, is due the production in greater volume than otherwise would be possible of the things that men use and consume. "It is not only the concrete things in which a man or a business organization has property that conduce to the most effective production of things and services that meet the wants of humankind, but in greater measure the brains of those who give that arrangement to these concrete things which enables their most effective utilization, and so direct and coordinate the application of force to them and through them that the most effective result is obtained."

Such is the theme of the present work. The development of the theme involves much minute investigation of the promptings and processes of human nature. Effect is traced back to cause; step by step the genesis and development of prices, wages, and profit are noted. "Toward meeting his wants," says Mr. McPherson, "man utilizes matter in vast aggregates, in manifold combinations, and in minute subdivisions. He utilizes force in mighty currents and in infinitesimal pulsation." And he tells us why and how. He deals with "utilities," showing why they come into being and how they are diffused. The exchange of utilities connotes "want," and in economic phraseology "want" signifies not only that a person desires a thing but that he has that in exchange for which it may be obtained. Similarly, in economic parlance, "demand" signifies the offering of that in return for which that which meets a "want" may be obtained.

The value of the present work lies in the clearness with which the fact is developed that all commodities and services are the product of human effort, and that the greater the production as compared to the effort the greater will be the supply, and thus the greater the well-being of every individual. The vigorous enforcement of this truth at a time when the world seems bent on a hunger strike is a real service.

L'Affaire Caillaux

The Enemy Within. Hitherto unpublished details of the great conspiracy to corrupt and destroy France. By Severance Johnson, special investigator and correspondent at the Peace Conference. New York: The James A. McCann Company.

THIS lamentable work reveals for the first time, if we may accept the publisher's announcement, "the ramifications of the vast conspiracy to destroy France" and "points out that the fate from which France escaped may befall the United States." These are praiseworthy objects. Caillaux is at the present moment on trial for treason during the war; it is well that we should know something of his career, his associates, and the charges brought against him. The book is lamentable because it defeats its ends by illiteracy and sensationalism.

The book contains a number of undoubted facts; it might be possible for a reader well acquainted from other sources with the history and politics of France for the last ten or fifteen years to compile from it a fairly accurate account of l'affaire Caillaux. But these facts are presented in such disorderly fashion, so blended with fiction, so unbalanced by reason of omissions, that they must inevitably fail to carry weight except with minds already as assured as the author's of Caillaux's guilt. For Mr. Johnson has no doubts whatever in this matter. He assumes from the beginning not only that Caillaux was in secret correspondence with German agents and statesmen during the war—very probably the fact, although it yet remains to be judicially proved—but also that even before the war he was the "Arch-German conspirator (p. xv), planning to become the Lenine of France" and building up a party "to set France aflame with a Bolshevist revolution as soon as Berlin gave the command."

It will be useful, in view of the exaggerations and distortions of this unhappy book, to state briefly what is known and what is merely suspected of Caillaux. His pro-German sympathies are nothing new nor strange. As far back as 1911 he advocated a policy of mutual concessions and a good understanding with the old enemy of France, as opposed to Clemenceau's policy of the Entente Cordiale with England. As Premier he negotiated over the head of the French Ambassador in Berlin a treaty which in return for Germany's recognition of France's position in Morocco ceded to the Empire a large part of the French Congo. There can be little doubt that Caillaux's policy was dictated by financial considerations. The long continued hostility between France and Germany and the ever-increasing cost of armaments was imposing on France a greater financial burden than Caillaux believed she was able to bear. A financier to the finger-tips, this seems to have been the only aspect of the rivalry that he considered, and there is no reason to doubt that he was sincere in his belief. His great influence with the Socialist parties in France sprang also, strange as it may seem, from his financial policy. His advocacy of an income tax by way of shifting to the bourgeoisie the burden of taxation made him as popular with the Socialists as he was detested by the respectable middle-class. He held the position of Minister of Finance under various Premiers, and was generally acknowledged as unrivaled in his knowledge and skill in this field, so much so that even to-day one hears voices in France asserting that only Caillaux can solve the financial problems confronting the country. Forced out of public life in 1914 by the scandal of his wife's murder of Calmette, editor of Le Figaro, he was still represented in the war-cabinet from 1914 to 1917 by his faithful henchman Malvy, who was continued in his post as Minister of the Interior to placate the large and powerful Socialist groups which had in the past followed Caillaux. As the war took on its long and indecisive aspect of trench-warfare, Caillaux seems to have resumed, naturally in profound secrecy, his policy of a rapprochement with Germany. There is little doubt that directly or indirectly he was in touch with German agents and statesmen, seeking to secure a statement of such German terms as would make it possible for a war-wearied France to conclude peace, with or without the consent of her English ally. In Italy, in particular, his conversations with various Italian politicians were so pessimistic as to the successful prosecution of the contest by arms that it is believed that the Italian Government was deterred from ordering his instant arrest only by the fear of the bad effect of such an action on her ally, France.

Meanwhile, a daring and scandalous defeatist propaganda sprang up in France itself. A group of adventurers flooded the country with journals, tracts, and handbills calling for peace at any price, and actually appealing to the troops in the trenches to turn their arms against a Government that persisted in prolonging the war. That this propaganda was financed by German gold there is no longer any shadow of a doubt, and the chief traitors, Bolo, Duval, and Lenoir, have already paid the extreme penalty. How far was Caillaux connected with this treasonable attempt? That is exactly the question which remains to be answered at his trial. All that is certain is that his creature, Malvy, who as Minister of the Interior was bound in duty to keep watch upon and suppress any such propaganda, not only failed to suppress it, but actually maintained friendly relations with one of its leaders, Almereyda of the pacifist Bonnet Rouge, and repeatedly interfered with the military police in their attempts to break up and punish the gang.

Finally, in 1917, after the terrible losses of the French offensive early that year, the situation grew impossible. It became plain that if the army was to be held to its task its morale must be delivered from pacifist propaganda and must be assured of a Government as determined as its own leaders, Pétain and Foch, to continue the struggle to the bitter end. Malvy was driven from office and later tried and condemned—not, be it remarked, for treason, but for dereliction of duty. Clemenceau was called to power, and one of his first acts was to initiate a thorough investigation of the defeatist movement. The band of wretched traitors whom Malvy had at least shielded were brought to trial and convicted, and Caillaux himself was arrested and imprisoned, in January, 1918. He has remained a prisoner ever since. Why was he not brought at once to trial? Nothing could have given better proof to the world of the determination of France to crush domestic treason than the conviction and punishment of so well known a figure in international politics. The only plausible answer seems to be that the French Government was altogether uncertain of being able to convict him of actual treason, and believed, no doubt correctly, that the acquittal of Caillaux would do more harm than his trial could do good. Circumstances have changed now; the acquittal of Caillaux will hardly cause a ripple on the sea of international politics. In the spring or summer of 1918, it might well have sufficed to overthrow the only Government capable of leading France to a victorious conclusion to the war.

Three Ways of Looking at Ireland

Irish Impressions. By G. K. Chesterton. New York: John Lane Company.

The Soul of Ireland. By W. J. Lockington, S.J. New York: The Macmillan Company.

Elizabethan Ulster. By Lord Ernest Hamilton. New York: E. P. Dutton and Company.

EACH of these three books has an interest of its own; they represent three types of mind which are occupied just now with Irish affairs. We know what to expect from Mr. Chesterton: vividness, color, wit, epigrams often a little strained but not seldom such as make one catch one's breath and wonder; clear-cut antitheses—sometimes cut too clear to correspond accurately with situations that are complex and confused, but always a stimulant to thought, and not least arousing when they are most provoking. And it is the true Chestertonian humor that greets us in these "Irish Impressions." G. K. C. paid his first visit to the Green Isle two years ago, and came back with his mind full of Irish romance and of well-intentioned Anglo-Irish blundering. He has set it all before us.

Everything he saw gave him food for reflection, and most of the things he seems to have seen—after his own habit of seeing—in contrasted pairs. There are two monuments near each other in Dublin, one to a hard-faced old monarch of German descent, which is fast falling into neglect, the other to the thriftless but lovable poet, Clarence Mangan, which is tended with affectionate care. Mr. Chesterton may be trusted to look at these together, and to point the moral about Irish temperament. He draws our attention to such facts as that the English think of people individually, while in Ireland they are considered in families—never Murphy or O'Sullivan, but always the Murphys and the O'Sullivans. Somewhere in the records of Grattan's Parliament he has unearthed a rather nasty illustration of this habit. It seems that in those hot days an orator while denouncing his opponent in the House caught sight of the sister of his enemy in the Ladies' Gallery. He at once burst into his peroration, invoking wrath upon the whole household of them "from the toothless old hag who is grinning in the gallery to the white-livered poltroon that is shivering on the floor!" It consoles one's wounded national pride to remember that this happened in the Anglo-Irish Parliament of the English pale.

Mr. Chesterton tells how he went on a mission to stimulate recruiting in 1918, and how he found that the gross mistake had been made of sending "elderly English landlords" to carry on this campaign in the south and west of Ireland. He whets an appetite, which he will not gratify, by saying that it would be too cruel to "recount their adventures." He drives home his own favorite lesson against Socialism by describing a road along which he passed, and which on its left side showed a modern estate lying waste, while on the right side peasant proprietorship was successfully garnering the harvest. And he has stories for us about "Belfast and the religious problem" which set the capital of Ulster in a most unkind similitude with Berlin. We must not take everything he says too seriously; for, if we did, Mr. Chesterton would feel that he had said it wrong. But even when he jests there is a background of sober meaning. He rather neatly says of himself: "My life is passed in making bad jokes, and seeing them turn into true prophecies."

Father Lockington's book is quite different, and a critic who does not belong to the author's faith must not dissect too minutely a work that is in essence one of Catholic devotion. The "soul of Ireland" is for this writer to be found in Irish fidelity to the ancient worship, and he presents us with a moving scene of priests and nuns, of the festival of Corpus Christi and the cloisters "lit by the soft glow of the tabernacle lamp," of the long years of martyrdom for conviction and the innate joyousness which the Church sustained in her children throughout their trials. Even those who stand outside the sacred circle for which he writes and who can not share the glowing devoutness of his symbolism must be moved by the enthusiastic tenderness with which this Jesuit priest idealizes the land of his ministry.

If there is genial humor in Mr. Chesterton and poetic pathos in Father Lockington, the reader must not expect much of either spirit in the brochure by Lord Ernest Hamilton. It is in cold facts that this historian has endeavored to specialize, and he often makes them so cold as to excite suspicion that he has given us those half-facts which are the most misleading things of all. If mere hard work could produce a good history, Lord Ernest Hamilton would have done very well indeed, for beyond doubt he has been industrious, though his labor is rather of the kind which makes a Blue Book or a catalogue. It is a dull thing that he has given us, but not without its value. Tale follows tale about the misdeeds of Shane O'Neill and Hugh Roe, and other Irish chieftains, whose deplorable addiction to strong drink the author dwells upon again and again with most decorous regret. He does not fail, indeed, to chronicle some corresponding defects in the English and Scottish settlers of the period, and it is but fair to say that his record of the efforts to Anglicize Ireland under Elizabeth has brought together in compact form much that is of antiquarian interest, not easily accessible to the general reader elsewhere. The chief fault of his work is his obvious inability to think himself back into an environment and a mode of life quite different from that of the year 1920; so that he has produced a criticism of Irish character in Elizabethan days such as might be given of Homeric warriors by one who judged them in the light of modern methods of warfare. This is not what is known as the "sympathetic tone" in history. But we must remember that Lord Ernest Hamilton is an Ulster member of Parliament.

HERBERT L. STEWART

The Run of the Shelves

During the war, Professor W. S. Davis, who is as favorably known for his historical novels as for his more serious work in history, began a little sketch intended to tell the men of the American Army something of the past of the great French nation, on whose soil they were battling for liberty. The early armistice enabled him to expand this into a considerable volume of six hundred pages for all Americans: "A History of France from the Earliest Times to the Peace of Versailles" (Houghton-Mifflin). Though very sympathetic to his subject, and though he often animadverts to the ravages of the Hun in the present when telling of the past, his tone is scholarly and his attitude sufficiently impartial. In his survey of twenty centuries he has skillfully selected only those events which were of permanent importance. He believes in using the past to interpret the present. He suggests, for instance, interesting analogies between the Jacobins of Revolutionary France and the Bolsheviki of Revolutionary Russia. He supplements his narrative with a number of good illustrations, and for those of his readers who are stirred to a further study of French history, Mr. Davis has added an excellent select bibliography. Unfortunately, there is almost nothing of French literature and art—virtually nothing of the Chansons de Gestes, nothing of the Renaissance under Francis I, and only a scant page given to the dazzling age of Louis XIV. Yet who can doubt that this great national literature has been one of the strongest, though perhaps quite unconscious, forces in giving the French those splendid national traditions and ideals which fortified their spirit so remarkably during the dark months following 1914?

"Spain's Declining Power in South America" (Berkeley: University of California Press), by Bernard Moses, Emeritus Professor of History and Political Science, presents a consideration of the last decades of colonial dependence in Spanish South America. He finds that during the period in question, in spite of certain measures of economic progress, the authority and efficiency of the Government were declining. The policy of the Crown to confer important offices in America only upon persons sent from Spain led the creoles and mestizos gradually to constitute themselves a society apart from the Spaniards and in opposition to the established administration. Revolts against the policy of this administration and against its imposition of specific fiscal burdens constitute a feature of this history, and indicate that the colonies were slipping away from the grasp of Spain, even before the creole-mestizo elements in the population had clearly formed a design for emancipation. The author gives a somewhat extended account of the expulsion of the Jesuits as an act depriving the dependencies of their ablest and most effective teachers, as well as of their most energetic and farsighted industrial and commercial entrepreneurs. By this act, moreover, the Government removed the only body of residents who manifested any clear conception of the proper relations to be maintained between the Spaniards and the Indians.

Writing recently from Paris, where he now resides, Professor Moses says:

> Since my last book was finished, I have been studying the colonial literature of Spanish South America; but this is only for the fun of doing it. No normal person in these times is likely to be interested in this subject, and when the book is finished it will have to take its place in the morgue of subsidized publications, such as the universities are supporting nowadays.

The Bulletin Italien, devoted to things Italian, was issued for eighteen years under the auspices of the University of Bordeaux; "but we were forced to suspend publication at the end of 1918," writes Professor Georges Radet, dean of that institution, "for two reasons. In the first place, and principally, for lack of funds and the increase of fifty per cent. in the cost of printing, and in the second place because the managing editor of the Bulletin, Professor Bouvy, who filled the chair of Italian literature, was transferred to the University of Paris and no successor was sent us."

But the suspension at Bordeaux really meant only enlarging the field of the Bulletin, for it soon followed Professor Bouvy to Paris, where it began, in January, 1919, to appear under another title, Etudes Italiennes, and has become "the only French review whose sole object is the historical study of Italian civilization." The editors, three Sorbonne Italian scholars—Professors Henri Hauvette, Eugène Bouvy, and Edouard Jordan—unite in declaring that they owe much of the success of their undertaking to the support of their well-known publisher, M. Ernest Leroux, "whose habit of taking the initiative outweighed any hesitation he might have felt in continuing the good work of the Bulletin in the midst of the printing crisis through which we are now passing." The editors also announce that the number of pages of the periodical, now some 130, will be increased "as soon as this crisis ends."

The editor-in-chief, M. Hauvette, is the leading Italian scholar of France, where he organized the Italian courses and studies of the colleges and universities and where he has been since 1893 a professor of the Italian language and literature, assuming the chair at the Sorbonne in 1906. He is also the president and founder of the Union Intellectuelle Franco-Italienne, under whose auspices the new quarterly appears, and the author of many volumes on Italian literature and art, his new translation of Dante's "Inferno" being now in press.

The three or four numbers of Etudes Italiennes which have reached this country speak well for its present character and its future success. The articles are printed either in French or Italian, though the first of these languages largely predominates. The third number contains a very eulogistic review of the three books on Dante by Professor Grandgent, of Harvard, who was recently chosen a corresponding member of the famous Florentine Accademia della Crusca, and who was an exchange professor at the Sorbonne in 1915-1916. At the end of the review his former colleague pays him this very high compliment: "May we not expect some day from Professor Grandgent a complete translation for the American and British public of the poetical works of Dante?"

Mr. Brand Whitlock, American Ambassador to Brussels, writes in a recent letter, apropos of his two remarkable volumes, "Belgium: A Personal Narrative," in many ways the best of the American war books:

> Payot is about to bring it out in a French edition at Paris, as well as a French edition of my little "Life of Lincoln," which I translated myself. By the way, I had hoped to stay on awhile in America, but the King asked me to accompany him home, and so here I am.

The Company Stores at Lawrence

ON the banks of the Merrimac at a point where its busy waters take a slithering slide of some twenty-six feet and in the process produce annually $200,000,000 worth of woolens, stand the city of Lawrence, Massachusetts, and the great hills that dominate it not otherwise than anciently the cathedrals dominated the towns that gathered in their shelter. The carvings are not there, nor the painted windows, nor choirs to chant their orisons in the still, chill air of winter mornings. But for all that, he who finds in the contrast of the elder day with our own no sign but of spiritual decadence, should pause to consider many things before he seals his judgment, and not among the least of these, some very recent happenings.

Just at present those in the little Massachusetts city who are looking for some new thing may be abundantly satisfied. The streets, in fact, are all agog with the pros and cons of the newly established Company Stores of the great American Woolen Company.

Is the whole thing a bluff? Will it last? Was it justified? Will it do any good? —these are but a few of the innumerable questions that are on every tongue and they are asked in English, French, Italian, Portuguese, Polish, Russian, Syrian, and languages even more foreign to American ears. For of the ninety-odd thousand inhabitants of Lawrence, seventy-eight thousand are foreign born or of foreign parentage. It is not quite true that these various nationals live in separate quarters—the city is too small to allow of that. Nevertheless, there is a natural grouping of that sort, and in each neighborhood are several small, "one man" stores where the people may bargain in their native tongues. Then, of course, there are the main streets, where the larger and more pretentious emporiums keep company, and carry on a thriving trade—rather too thriving, according to William Wood, president of the American Woolen Company, who challenged them, one and all, to show cause why he should not take a hand in the game, to prevent the alleged exploitation of his employees.

Now, the uneducated foreigner with his pocket full of good American wages is not often miserly. He lounges into the best store in town—it is shirts he wants—that fine silk one with the broad stripes—too large? No matter; it is what he wants. Out of his pocket comes an enviable "roll" and the requisite number of bills are proudly peeled off. Under such circumstances human nature does, sometimes, I doubt not, profiteer. Temptation of that sort is rather more abundant in Lawrence than in most Massachusetts cities, so that it seems not altogether improbable that the charge made by the head of the American Woolen Company to the effect that the cost of the necessities of life was higher in Lawrence than elsewhere was not without some justification.

But that is really a very small part of the story; the cost of living is always highest at the point where one happens to be paying one's bills. The merchants of Lawrence met Mr. Wood's demand for lower prices by a denial of his statements of fact, and, after one or two rather sharp passages, it was formally announced that the American Woolen Company would reduce the cost of living for its employees by establishing stores where they could buy without paying retailers' profits. A beginning was made and enthusiastically received by the workers, an organization is being perfected to enlarge the scope of the enterprise, and the merchants of Lawrence are out of luck—that is about all that the public knows of the matter.

The talk that froths and foams about these surface facts follows the partisan sympathies of the talker. Some say that Mr. Wood is caught in a trap of his own setting, that by a hastily and ill-advised statement which pride has compelled him to back up, he has forced his own hand, and that he will soon weary of the experiment. Others say that the merchants of Lawrence misjudged their man, and have got themselves into a scrape from which many will not come out with whole skins. As always, there is the man who buttonholes you and leads you aside to insinuate darkly that organized labor has got the big corporation into a corner and forced it to act against its choice and better judgment.

A few who think more deeply say that the president of the American Woolen Company is not a man to make an important move from impulse, or under the stress of outside compulsion; that he would not commit the great company of which he is the head to an important business policy merely to put a few town merchants in a pickle; they say that Mr. Wood is a "policy man," and acts only with some farsighted aim. This aim, according to these knowing ones, is to hold his labor for the evil day that draws nigh when immigration will no longer afford an unfailing supply.

It does not appear to be in the nature of the "nigger in the wood pile" type of thinker to accept so simple and luminous a statement as that which Mr. Wood himself made at the dinner of the National Association of Clothiers:

"I will not trouble you with the narration of what we have already done, but I will say that we intend to lose no opportunity to promote wisely and justly, the happiness and prosperity of those upon whose labors this great industry depends. . . . In the past we have had our disagreements. Demands have been made by the workers which I have felt, in justice to the investors and to the public, I could not grant. But sometimes, no doubt, I myself have been mistaken. . . . I am happy to say that with the experience of these years I think I now know my job better. . . . Things have happened of late in the relations of our employees and the management that have touched me very deeply and that have given me a new confidence in the future as well as a deep satisfaction. I indulge in no illusions. I know that we shall have our troubles and disagreements in the future somewhat as we have had in the past, but I hope and believe that we shall approach them with a new spirit and a new appreciation and a new regard each for the viewpoint of the other."

In few words, it would appear from this that the company has moved in the direction of really helping its employees, and the workers have shown a disposition to meet the company half way; that the conduct of so great a business has had an educative effect on all concerned; that the experiences of the great war have deepened and quickened these lessons; and that the prosperity brought about by war-time profits has softened the way and opened the door for a new attitude, first on the part of the employer, and, in response, on the part of the workers.

If the American Woolen Company persists in its enterprise—and it is generally believed that it will, as it is reported to have the solid backing of organized labor and of its own workers —the weaker merchants may be forced to close their doors, but the stronger ones and the better ones will remain, and perhaps make more money than they ever did—why not? For the more wholesome the conditions, the better for all concerned.

As to the future—well, they are a mercurial lot, these Italians, Poles, Russians, and Syrians of whom only about one-half speak English well. It is more than probable that the waters will again be troubled. It is not inconceivable that again, as in 1912, wild mobs, led on by wilder leaders, may surge down the streets of Lawrence calling for the destruction of the mills, of the city, of the Government. All of this may happen. But it is the belief of your correspondent that the corner has been turned in the Americanization of this cosmopolitan mass of workers, and at the same time in their relations to the industry by which they are supported. The company stores are an incident only of a movement that has in it a very real promise of better things.

STAFF CORRESPONDENT

Church Unity

THE movement of present-day thought about church unity offers many striking analogies to that noticeable in the ideas of political reform. In the world of politics we find at once the widest internationalism and the narrowest nationalism. On the one hand we are exhorted to learn the difficult art of thinking internationally; on the other we are urged to shun all such vague generalizations and to lend all our energies to the fostering of an aggressive national spirit. And then, of course, between these two apparently irreconcilable opposites there is a "new school" of mediators who insist that there is here no opposition at all, but that internationalism is only nationalism in its social expression. I need not love my country less because I love "humanity" more.

Precisely the same lines of thought are followed by those who concern themselves with the subject of church unity. Here, too, we find the party of frankly avowed sectarianism and the party of intersectarianism, or, as they are more prone to call it, "non-sectarianism." And then between the two we have the mediators again, those who would maintain their allegiance to their several sects, not merely out of a traditional loyalty, but because they believe, or would like to think they believe that only through this narrower loyalty can the remoter end of a true Christian unity be attained.

